

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, 17th September, 1894.

Death of the Hon. Mr. Hart.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

DEATH OF THE HON. MR. HART.

Mr. SEDDON.—I rise to move, That the House do now adjourn. I do this as a mark of respect to the memory of the Hon. Mr. Hart, Member of the Legislative Council, who has passed from amongst us. He was one who connected us with the past. As a colonist he has done his duty well. As a resident of Wellington, with those who have known him, from the first to the time when he passed away, he has always borne the highest respect. As a public servant he was ever conscientious, ever willing, and he performed the duties of his position in a manner which reflected credit on himself, and which was of great benefit to the public. As a member of the Legislative Council, though of late years he has not taken a very active part, yet his works in his prime speak for themselves. He was ever looked upon as one desirous of doing that which was right. Those who knew him best spoke well of him. Knowing him as I have done, and as those in the House have done, in matters that came before the Council, his words were words of wisdom, and his actions those of a conscientious public man.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—I rise to second the motion. This is one of those melancholy occasions which we all regret, but which it is usual for the House to take notice of. I quite agree with what has fallen from the Premier in regard to the late Mr. Hart. He was one of the first colonists to arrive in New Zealand, and continued to reside in the land of his adoption for over half a century. He was a member of the first Parliament in New Zealand, and occupied a seat in the Legislative Council for over twenty years; and there is no doubt that the public of New Zealand owe his memory a debt of gratitude for the services he rendered to the colony.

Sir R. STOUT.—Sir, as one who knew the late Mr. Hart for over twenty years I may be permitted to say one or two words. Those of us who are lawyers knew him as a distinguished lawyer: indeed, thirty years ago he was looked upon as one of the best lawyers in New Zealand, and, though he has not practised his profession since 1878, yet even almost up to the last his opinion has always been valued by any one who wanted a clear exposition of the law. What, perhaps, was his leading characteristic was his extreme conscientiousness and high sense of duty, both public and private. Those acquainted with him could not but be struck with these characteristics. In every act of his life—and he has lived in the colony for now over fifty years—he has always won the highest respect. His whole life has been patriotic, and was one against which no one could say the slightest word. Our old settlers are passing away, and, for the sake of the memory of one who bore the heat and burden of the day in the days of early settlement, I am exceedingly glad that the Premier has moved the adjournment of the House. I do not think it necessary to say more than to express, as I feel sure every member of the House would wish, our sympathy with his widow in her affliction.

Dr. NEWMAN.—As one who lost in the late Mr. Hart a personal friend of many years' standing, I should like to say a few words. His death is the more remarkable because he was the last link to bind the first Parliament of New Zealand in 1854 with this. He was the only man of either House who sat in our Parliament forty years ago, so quickly does everything change. Several others are alive who were in that Parliament, but he alone has more or less had a seat in Parliament ever since; and though, of late years, failing health has caused his attendance to be irregular, those of us who were privileged to know him know that to the last he kept an interest in everything. I believe that almost the last thing he did in Parliament was to come off a sick-bed to vote for the enfranchisement of women. Though he never achieved Ministerial honours, yet forty years ago he was considered one of the ablest members in Parliament, and one of its leading speakers. Almost the first Bill he introduced was a Bank of New Zealand Bill, to improve the condition of banking in the colony, and, like many other things in these days, it was a slaughtered innocent. From that time he took a very keen interest in the colony, and, as the honourable the senior member for Wellington City has said, he has always borne the highest name amongst those who knew him best.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at twenty-five minutes to eight o'clock p.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Railway Officers—Taumutu Block—Death of the Hon. Mr. Hart.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock p.m.

RAILWAY OFFICERS.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR asked the Colonial Secretary, Whether he has any objection to lay on the table of this Council, before the Railway Bill is brought before the Council for discussion, the classification of railway officers which has been in force for the past fourteen years? And whether the said classification has been suspended, and, if so, from what date and under what authority?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he had the honour to lay on the table of the Council the regulations referred to in the question.

TAUMUTU BLOCK.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA asked the Colonial Secretary, Why there has been so much delay in sanctioning the removal of restrictions applied for by Rewi Kōruarua and others with respect to Subdivision 5b, Section 901, Taumutu, and recommended by the Native Land Court on the 29th April, 1894? He was compelled to ask this question, because the Natives concerned had been waiting for some months already.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said this was one of a number of matters which were under the consideration of the Government, and as soon as a decision was arrived at he would inform the honourable gentleman of the result.

DEATH OF THE HON. MR. HART.

A message from His Excellency the Governor was received, announcing the death of the

Dr. Newman

Hon. Robert Hart, and declaring his seat vacant.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, I believe that, in the discharge of a melancholy duty, I have had the misfortune to announce to this Council the death of more of its members than any other honourable member who has occupied this position. Some of them, Sir, have left in our memories recollections which we can never forget; some of them were very near and dear to us, and have left behind to this Council a character which I trust it will ever maintain. In announcing the death of an old friend, I feel that I am quite unable to convey in any language at my disposal or at my command anything like what I should wish to say about him. It was my good-fortune to have been his partner, and to enjoy the closest intimacy and friendship with him for a period of over forty years, and I have no hesitation in saying that during that time I do not think we have had a single unpleasantness. To speak of him to honourable members in this Council who knew him would be talking about what they already know. In his domestic life he left nothing that could be desired. He had a refined taste and every quality to make him happy, and I am quite sure that no two people I have ever met have been so thoroughly happy as my late honourable friend and his widow. He was the personification of honour; he was a brilliant orator; he was probably the best man who ever addressed a jury in this country, and the very fact of having retained Mr. Hart was almost a passport of success, for he never undertook a case in which he did not fully believe. I feel that I am unable to give expression to my feelings about him, and trust that it will be some comfort to his widow to know that the entire sympathy of this Council will be extended to her without a single dissentient voice. In paying this small tribute to an old friend, I will ask the Council to adjourn out of respect to his memory, and I therefore move, That the Council do adjourn.

The Hon. Captain BAILLIE.—I desire to second the resolution of the Hon. the Attorney-General, and in doing so I may say that our honourable friend who has just departed has been known to me for upwards of thirty years, —twenty years of that period in this Council. He was one of the most able-minded men, and was able to grasp everything that came before him, and the assistance which he gave to the counsels of this country was invaluable. He also had a clear head, and on every point his legal knowledge was of a high order. He was kindly disposed to everybody acquainted with him. I may say he was also a man of considerable artistic taste, and of very great literary ability. I feel that I am unable to express the feelings of the Council in its sincere sorrow for Mrs. Hart in the loss of a faithful friend and husband.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—As one of the oldest members of this Council, I cannot allow the present opportunity to pass without saying a word or two in support of the motion which has been so ably proposed and seconded by my honourable friends. As one of the oldest members of the Council, I can speak of him not only as a public man, but also as a private citizen, and I can only say that I most thoroughly concur in the expression of opinion which has fallen from those honourable gentlemen. He was a kind friend and an able man. I desire also to express the deepest sympathy with the widow he has left behind.

The Council adjourned at a quarter to three o'clock p.m.

FIRST READING.

Wilson Land Bill.

CHINESE AND OTHER ASIATICS.

MR. MEREDITH moved, That a return be laid before this House showing—(1) The number of Chinese, and (2) the number of all other Asiatics, exclusive of Chinese, in the colony on the 31st March, 1894; (3) the number of Chinese, and (4) the number of other Asiatics, exclusive of Chinese, in receipt of charitable aid during the year ending the 31st March, 1894.

MR. SEDDON said, so that the honourable gentleman might not be under a misapprehension, he had made inquiries as to how much of the information asked for in the return could be given. Although it was unusual, this being an unopposed motion, he would ask the leave of the House to read a statement from the department as to the information which could be supplied:—

"In reference to the above, I would remark that (1) the number of Chinese in the colony on 31st March, 1894, can be given; but, as regards; (2) the number of all other Asiatics (excluding Chinese) for the above date, it cannot be stated exactly. The latest information is that of the census of April, 1891, at which time the number must have been exceedingly small. Of 1,168 persons born in India, only seventeen were stated to be of the Asiatic race. There were, besides, 276 persons born in various foreign countries other than those of Europe, China, the Continents of Africa and America. A few of them may have been Asiatics, but details have not been kept."

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS REVENUE.

MR. MITCHELSON asked the Colonial Treasurer, If he will state for the information of the House the amount of revenue received by the Customs for the month ending 31st of August last? He would ask the honourable member if he would, in addition to supplying the information asked for in the question, be good enough to adopt the course which had been usually followed by previous Governments, and, after the rising of the House, give the public that information as to the Customs revenue which was previously supplied monthly by all Colonial Treasurers, and even by the honourable gentleman himself until December last.

MR. WARD might say that the honourable gentleman appeared to have a misconception of what his idea was in not giving this information monthly. He had informed the House before, and he repeated it now, that the withholding of this information monthly was not done for the purpose of keeping back from honourable members or from the country the particulars of the revenue. The object of the change was to insure that the information should not be misleading, as they knew very well that in some months there was a falling-off in the revenue, while, perhaps, the next month there might be an excessive amount, so that the state of the monthly returns did not give a proper idea of what the position of the Customs revenue was. The right way was to take the quarterly statement, which would give a fair estimate and a correct idea of the returns from the Customs Department during the three months. He thought the former system, which the honourable gentleman wanted him to revert to, was a mistaken one. He was, however, prepared to consider whether it was desirable to revert to the old system or not. As to the question whether it was not his intention to lay the statement the honourable gentleman referred to for a particular month on the table of the House, he might say that at the end of this month the quarterly statement, covering this particular month, would be laid on the table in the usual way. He could inform the honourable gentleman that the revenue for last month was considerably beyond the average of the monthly statistics of the Customs Department, and in that respect was very satisfactory. He could assure the honourable gentleman that he was not withholding the particulars merely for the purpose of not giving information, but because this was a bad way to give it. He thought the course which he (Mr. Ward) suggested was the one which would give the House the fullest information at the earliest possible time.

NORTH ISLAND MAIN TRUNK RAILWAY.

MR. MITCHELSON asked the Premier, If he will, in the Public Works Statement, announce the decision of the Government respecting the route determined upon for the North Island Main Trunk Railway? His reason for asking this question was that, owing to the delay in the settlement of the route to be adopted for the North Island Main Trunk Railway, a great portion of the money set apart for the construction of the railway had been devoted to the purchase of Native lands, to surveys, and also to road-making in the interior of the Island, and to snagging the Wanganui River. He thought it was advisable that the Premier should indicate to the House and the country the route it was proposed to recommend for the construction of this railway, and also whether more rapid progress might not be made with the construction of the railway than had been made during the last five years.

Mr. SEDDON said it was not necessary for him to inform the honourable member as to the necessity there was for the Government, when bringing down the Public Works Statement, to set out what they intended to ask Parliament to

30. make appropriations for. The question of route was not before the Government at all; it was a question of what allocations would be made out of revenues available for the Main Trunk Railway. That was the only question before the Government. The question of the route had been before a Committee of the House, and that Committee had reported. They had the Engineers' reports now, and it was his intention to refer the reports of the Engineers upon this railway to the Railways Committee, and ask the Committee to report thereon. The reason why the Select Committee appointed to deal with this question could not finally report was obvious, and arose from the fact that they had insufficient information. However, the information was now in possession of the House, and he intended to move, as he had said, that the Engineers' reports be referred to the Railways Committee.

WARKWORTH ROADS.

Mr. MASSEY asked the Premier, In what way he intends to give effect to the promise which he made to a deputation of settlers at Warkworth when he told them that the Government would either take over the main road or provide funds for the local bodies to do the work?

Mr. SEDDON said he thought the honourable gentleman should first have ascertained whether or not any such promise had been made. He had no recollection of having made such a promise; consequently it was scarcely fair to ask him in what way he was going to give effect to it. The honourable gentleman knew very well that this matter was brought up in the middle of an election, and that, under such circumstances, it would have been improper to have made such a promise. He was very much amused when he read the question, as he saw what was beneath it. However, he would not refer any further to that, as he might be brought up for breach of privilege. It would be seen from the Press reports that he had informed the deputation which waited upon him at Warkworth that the Government would take the matter into consideration; and it had been under the consideration of the Government, and the Government were of opinion that there were places in the colony in which there were main roads that it was almost impossible for the ratepayers or the local authorities to maintain. There were proposals before the House at present, and, if those proposals were carried, his colleague the Minister of Lands would no doubt give favourable consideration to such requests as were contained in the question, both from this local body and from other local bodies similarly situated.

EXHIBITION.

Mr. E. M. SMITH asked the Government,— (1.) If they will favour a Grand National Exhibition of Arts, Manufactures, and Industries, to be held in Wellington, to illustrate the rise and progress of New Zealand, the said exhibition to be held in the year 1900? (2.) If they approve, will they recommend the setting aside of £3,000 a year for this national purpose, and make a start at once, so that the greater part of this work may be done by the Government staff, such as preparing ground and plans, &c.? (3.) Will they submit this scheme to their Engineer, with a view to getting him to report if it is feasible or practicable to build the said exhibition of brick and stone, so that it can be used afterwards for a permanent Parliament Building or National Museum, or for any other national purposes? This was a most important national question, and the reason he had placed it upon the Order Paper was that for a long time it had been suggested that the House should set aside a vote of £10,000 for the construction of a brick library; if his suggestion, however, were carried out, it would get over the difficulty. He awaited patiently the reply of the Government, knowing their desire to see the colony progress.

Mr. SEDDON said the Government were of opinion that one of the safest ways of providing for the arts, manufactures, and industries of the colony was by making the country progress by placing the people upon the land. If they found the country prosperous and land-settlement going on, the arts, industries, and manufactures would progress also in the towns. Those matters would not be lost sight of; but he thought the money asked for by the honourable gentleman would be better expended in making roads and bridges for settlers in the country districts. There was another objection to granting the honourable gentleman's request, which was that, even if the matter were taken up by any of the large centres, unless the public generally went into the question it would not be a success; and for the Government to take it up under any other circumstances would, in his opinion, result in failure. If any part of the colony should propose anything of the kind, and apply to Parliament for assistance, that would be the proper time to carefully consider it, but for the Government to take the initiative would, in his opinion, be a mistake.

SHEEP DISEASE IN NORTH ISLAND.

Mr. MASSEY asked the Minister of Agriculture, Whether he will direct the veterinary surgeons of his department to take whatever steps may be necessary to discover, if possible, a remedy for the sheep disease from which most of the flocks in the North Island are suffering at the present time?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE replied that the Government had already an experimental farm in existence, near Waverley, in which those inquiries and experiments were being carried out, and every care would be taken that every case brought under the notice of the Government should be subjected to experiment at this farm.

Mr. MASSEY asked if experiments were being made at the present time.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said, Yes.

CLOVER-SEED.

Mr. BUDDO asked the Government, in view of the successful cultivation and production of red-clover and cowgrass seeds in New Zealand, will they take into consideration the question of granting a bonus on the export of clover-seeds, such bonus to be granted on per hundred-weight of red-clover and cowgrass, but would require to be on per pound on the finer clovers, such as white-clover and alsike? He might state there was a large amount of money leaving this colony annually for grass-seeds, and, though they had nearly overtaken the colonial demand in the heavier seeds, such as cowgrass and red-clover, he believed that, with a little care, they would be able to export in the course of a year or two a considerable amount of red-clover and cow-grass seed; and we ought to encourage the growth of small seeds, such as white-clover and alsike. Those seeds were more difficult to grow, and the amount of labour required was nearly double that required in growing the cow-grass or red-clover seed.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said the Government had considered this matter very carefully, and had come to the conclusion that it would not be advisable at the present time to grant a bonus for this purpose.

STATE FARM.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON asked the Minister of Lands, if he will furnish some information to the House touching the progress of the State farm, and generally its aims and objects as a State institution? He understood that there were State farms, more than one, and a statement from the Minister in regard to any of them would give the information required.

Mr. REEVES said there was a statement with regard to the State farms in the annual report of the Labour Department, and there would be, of course, special statements with regard to the matter in every annual report issued by that department. Since the report was written he might state that considerable progress had been made. There were now fifteen families there, and there would be three more very shortly. The work of cultivation and of felling the bush was going on steadily. People were erecting cottages—he thought there were seventeen erected there now—and generally speaking the condition of the place was satisfactory. If the honourable gentleman cared for any more specific or detailed information he should be most happy to give it to him, as he had a good many details in his possession in regard to the matter.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON understood the State farms were under the Minister of Lands, and he had, consequently, expected a reply from him.

Mr. REEVES said, No; he was the Minister in charge.

MATATA NATIVE SCHOOL.

Mr. W. KELLY asked the Minister of Education, if it is correct that the Native school at Matata, in the Bay of Plenty, has been closed; and, if so, why this was done?

Mr. REEVES said the work at that school was still going on, and he trusted it would continue to go on in future.

GRAPES.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Commissioner of Customs, whether he will take steps to remove the prohibition on the importation of grapes to the colony?

Mr. WARD said that, from information the Agricultural Department had received during the last twelve months, it was considered absolutely necessary to take precautions against phylloxera, which was very destructive in Australia, and it was not considered desirable to admit grapes into this colony at the present time.

Mr. PIRANI asked why the Government considered it necessary to prohibit the importation of other fruits which this disease did not affect?

Mr. WARD would be glad to find out, and let the honourable gentleman know.

INTERCOLONIAL FREE-TRADE.

Mr. O'REGAN asked the Premier, if, in view of the revulsion of feeling in the neighbouring colonies in favour of intercolonial free-trade, the Government will at once communicate with the Governments of the Australian Colonies, with a view to holding an intercolonial conference for the purpose of adjusting trade relations between the various colonies? He need hardly say this was a very important question, and one which, unfortunately, had for a long time been overlooked, on account, probably, of a number of other minor questions having to be considered. He would very much like to see the different colonies come to some understanding with regard to the tariffs, and he hoped to receive a satisfactory reply.

Mr. SEDDON said the Government were not at all sure that there had been any general revulsion of feeling in the colonies in reference to this matter. They had only the honourable gentleman's authority for it. It was quite true that the Free-traders had carried the elections in New South Wales; but he might say that the Government on two occasions had made some advances in this direction. On one occasion the Colonial Treasurer, when he visited Australia, was empowered, on behalf of the late Administration, to make every effort to reciprocate with one or the whole of the Australian Colonies. His advances, however, were met rather coldly at that time. On a later occasion, when a representative of the colony went to the Canadian Conference, he was requested to ascertain what the feelings of the people were in regard to a proposal to reciprocate with New South Wales or other colonies, in the event of his having an opportunity of meeting the Premiers of those colonies. He might say that the information he had received from that gentleman was not at all of a favourable character — in fact, quite the reverse as regarded New South Wales. However, the elections had since taken place, and there might be a change. He hoped there was a change for the better, and that the retaliatory tariff of that colony would be repealed, or amended in the direction of allowing, on terms fair to both colonies, the products of New Zealand to enter New South Wales. The Government would not lose sight of the question. He thought he was voicing the feeling of the House and the country when he said they had nothing to fear from the neighbouring colonies, and they were quite prepared to reciprocate with either one or the whole of them.

POLICE-CONSTABLES MOVED.

Mr. BUICK asked the Government, If it is the practice of the Defence Department to pay the expenses incurred by constables in the Police Force who are shifted from one part of the colony to another at the instigation of the department?

Mr. SEDDON said, Yes; it was the practice, when removing any constable, to pay all reasonable expenses.

H. GAY.

Mr. DUNCAN asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will direct the Railway Commissioners to forward an official reply to the petition of Mr. Henry Gay, of Oamaru, and their decision upon the recommendation of the Railways Committee of this House? This was a question which would interest a great many members of the House, who would like to understand how the Commissioners could be approached. There was a recommendation from the Railways Committee a month or more ago, but since then he had had no intimation officially as to what action was to be taken in the matter. He would like to know from the Minister whether the Railways Committee or the House could in any way approach the Commissioners in order to get answers to questions from them.

Mr. SEDDON was afraid there was no way of approaching the Railway Commissioners direct. That, he thought, had been ruled previously. It was a very good reason why the House should place itself in the position of being able to deal with matters of such importance. He, at all events, would write to the Commissioners and ask what their intentions were in respect to the petitioner mentioned in the question. He might say that the rule followed was for the Clerk of the House to communicate with the Minister for Public Works, and through the Minister for Public Works communications went to the Commissioners; and replies were sent by the same channel. He would make inquiries into the matter, and ask the Commissioners to send a reply.

WELLINGTON-PALMERSTON TELEPHONE.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Postmaster-General, If he will arrange for the completion of telephone connection between Wellington and Palmerston North, and between the telephone exchanges in those centres? He would like to point out to the Postmaster-General that already there was telephonic communication between Wellington and Palmerston, with the exception of two small gaps between Paraparamu and Otaki, and Shannon and Longburn. If these two gaps were filled up there would be complete telephonic communication. That would be a great advantage not only to the public generally, but to the residents in the places named.

Mr. WARD said if the completion of the gaps referred to would enable this work to be done the Government would be very glad to have it done; but, unfortunately, the line was 100 miles in length, and if a No. 8 iron wire, which was the wire now used in the colony, were erected between Wellington and Palmerston the continued induction would be so great as to render the wire useless for telephone purposes. The only way in which that could be done would be by erecting a main trunk copper wire, and to do that would cost over £2,000. It seemed to him, under the circumstances, that it would not be possible to have such a line erected between here and Palmerston, or, he might say, between any towns at such distances apart in New Zealand, until the copper-wire system was adopted. Under present arrangements the telephone system for such long distances was absolutely useless. He had tried the experiment himself, and he might assure the honourable gentleman that it was absolutely unworkable.

"SARAH AND MARY."

Mr. TANNER asked the Minister in charge of the Customs Department, Whether he will cause inquiries to be made, and the result communicated to the House, as to the seaworthiness or otherwise of the "Sarah and Mary," which is reported to have left the Thames in June last with a cargo of timber for the South, to have been compelled to put into Napier for refuge, to have partly unloaded and undergone repair at Napier, and to have reached Lyttelton on the 21st July in a sinking condition? He had been induced to ask the question in consequence of the singular agreement in sequence of events as shown in newspaper statements. The House would probably pardon him for a moment if he quoted some of the statements which were made in reference to this vessel. The Hawke's Bay Herald of the 29th June stated, "The brigantine 'Sarah and Mary' put in here yesterday in a sinking condition. Captain reported had left Thames on 19th; scarcely clear before vessel began to leak badly; crew took to pumps, and captain took refuge under Mercury Island, where, in smooth water, crew were hardly able to keep water under by constant pumping. Left Mercury Island, and, when off Portland, the leak increased to 10in. per hour; and the crew, quite worn out by incessant working, demanded that the vessel should put into Napier, which was done." The Hawke's Bay Herald added, "The 'Sarah and Mary' is an old vessel of thirty years, labours very heavily in rough weather, and is now in such a rickety condition that it was fortunate for the crew no catastrophe occurred." The Lyttelton Times of the 23rd July stated that of her cargo of 130,000ft. of timber 45,000ft. were discharged at Napier. The Evening News and Hawke's Bay Advertiser of July 12 reported, "The 'Sarah and Mary' towed out this morning. She had taken on board an American patent pump with her, which would enable the crew to keep her dry should she commence to leak again on the passage. As she was considerably lightened, she should reach her destination without further mishap." The Christchurch Press of the 23rd July said, "Extra hands were shipped at Napier for the voyage down." The Lyttelton Times of the 23rd July said, "'Sarah and Mary' left Napier, making 10in. of water per hour, increasing to 15in., 16in., 17in., 18in. at sea; pumps kept going the whole voyage. Off Cape Palliser met particularly stormy weather; pumping had to be kept going if ship kept afloat to reach Lyttelton. When entering Lyttelton Heads she was making 16in. per hour, on the 21st July." It was right to state that the newspapers said that the "Sarah and Mary" belonged to Mr. W. S. Waterson, of Invercargill, who, during the year, had lost the iron barque "Gazelle." The barque "Othello," on the eve of very extensive and necessary repairs, was sold for a coal hulk. The schooner "Crest of the Wave" was lost on the voyage from Timaru to the Bluff. The "Circe" was lost on the Australian coast two years ago.

Mr. SPEAKER thought the honourable gentleman was introducing debatable matter.

Mr. TANNER said he thought a case had been made out for inquiry.

Mr. WARD said he knew Mr. Waterson, and he might state that he was one of the most careful men in this colony, so far as ships were concerned, and he thought there was no shipowner in the colony who expended more money for the purpose of keeping his vessels in thorough repair than Mr. Waterson did.

An Hon. MEMBER.—He does not insure.

Mr. WARD said, in addition to that, Mr. Waterson did not insure.

Mr. TANNER asked if that was not rather a proof that his ships were not worth insuring.

Mr. WARD might state that one of the vessels which the honourable gentleman had named as having been lost was one of the finest vessels in the colony. She was a splendid vessel in every sense of the term. As a reflection had been made upon an enterprising shipowner—from want of information, he had no doubt—he thought it was only right that he should say what he knew upon this matter. The "Sarah and Mary," he was informed, before leaving Napier on the voyage in question, was surveyed by two shipmasters, Captains Dawson and Todd, who recommended that before proceeding to sea a certain quantity of her cargo—timber—should be discharged at Napier. The quantity of timber so discharged was 45,000ft. Certain repairs recommended by the two shipmasters were also done. The whole crew were willing to go to sea in the vessel, and she left on her voyage. On reaching Lyttelton she was docked, and underwent a thorough overhaul, and the surveyor certified that the vessel had been thoroughly overhauled and repaired. She was thirty years old, but was not at all unseaworthy. There were many other vessels of that age at sea. If it were necessary to have an inquiry into the matter he would afford the honourable gentleman the fullest facilities for it, but he could assure him that the Customs Department had a certificate from the surveyors of the Underwriters' Association stating that the vessel was in a thoroughly seagoing condition, and that nothing further was required.

Mr. TANNER said he neither desired to cast, nor had he cast, the slightest reflection on the owner of the vessel. All his statements were copied word for word from the newspaper reports, and he did not add any comment to those reports.

AUDIT DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Colonial Treasurer, If he intends to appoint a Commission of inquiry into the methods and working of the Audit Department? He might remind the Minister that, when he was asked early in the session as to an inquiry being held with regard to the Public Trust Office accounts, the honourable gentleman stated that accountants would be appointed to make an inquiry into both the Public Trust Office and the Audit Office. The result of the inquiry into the Public Trust Office had been made known, and it was satisfactory, he supposed. Therefore there must be a screw loose in the Audit Department. He trusted the Colonial Treasurer would have a Commission appointed to inquire into the system adopted by the Audit Department.

Mr. WARD said the inquiry to which he formerly alluded, so far as the Audit Department was concerned, was as to whether they conducted their system of audit with reference to the Public Trust Office in such a way as they ought to do in such an important branch of business. The investigation into the Public Trust Office accounts showed that the accounts were thoroughly well kept. He might say that the Government were of opinion generally that the audit system in this colony required reorganizing, inasmuch as the separate system of auditing accounts at present in existence was very unsatisfactory. To have a proper audit it should be under the complete control of the Audit Department. During the recess the Government would consider this matter, and they hoped to be able to deal with the whole question when Parliament met next year. It was a very important matter.

INEBRIATES.

Sir R. STOUT asked the Minister of Education, Whether he is aware that some Judges of the Supreme Court have refused to commit inebriates to the asylums; and what steps he proposes to take to provide sufficient accommodation for such persons? It was sixteen years since this question first came before Parliament. A Bill was introduced into the Legislative Council by Sir George Whitmore, then Colonial Secretary, to have this question put on a proper footing, but nothing had been done; and now one or more Judges of the Supreme Court refused to send any inebriates to an asylum, because there was no special provision made for their treatment. He thought it was necessary, in order to comply with the Lunatics Act, that there should be put up at one of the asylums in the North Island, and perhaps also in the South Island, some special buildings in which special treatment could be given to those people who could not keep away from drink so long as we had drink sold in the colony.

Mr. REEVES believed that Judge Williams, two years ago, on the appeal of a patient detained in the Ashburn Hall, decided that the patient should not be detained because he could not be kept in a separate ward.

Sir R. STOUT.—He has refused to send them since.

Mr. REEVES said the Judge on that occasion refused to sanction the detention of the inmate at Ashburn Hall because he was not being kept in a separate ward there—away from the other inmates—although, under the Lunatics Act, that was absolutely necessary in the case of inebriates. It would be therefore necessary for the department either to build a separate inebriates' home or a separate wing to an asylum. Perhaps the better course to pursue would be to build a separate home altogether. There was a home built at Sunnyside a number of years ago, but in 1881 Mr. Dick, then Colonial Secretary, had it converted into a doctor's residence. He believed that in Victoria they had established two inebriates' homes, but that since then they had been both closed on the ground of expense. So far as his department was concerned, it was absolutely a financial matter. When the Cabinet saw their way to grant the money he would be most happy to establish an inebriates' home. He thought it would be a very good thing. It was purely a financial matter, and, so far, the Government had not seen its way to grant the money.

Sir R. STOUT asked if the honourable member would look at some of the old buildings connected with some asylums, and see if they could not be used for the purpose.

Mr. REEVES said he would do so.

GOVERNMENT ADVANCES TO SETTLERS BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

5.30. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Sir, on Friday night we listened to a very interesting speech by the senior member for Wellington City on the subject of the Bill which is now before us—the Government Advances to Settlers Bill—and we listened to it with the more interest because it was naturally thought that he, being a critic of the Government, would endeavour to put his finger on the weakest points in the Bill. This, I think, he did in many instances. Many of the points he brought forward were undoubtedly weak points in the Bill, and deserve the best attention of the Colonial Treasurer. For instance, the objections he made with regard to the expense seemed to me vital objections. The proposal to have District Solicitors and District Valuers seems a very complicated scheme. He raised that objection, and I think rightly, and hoped that some simpler scheme would be arrived at. Then, I agree with him with regard to the land-bonds. The issuing of land-bonds seems to me an unnecessary and complicated proceeding; and I am also inclined to agree with him in connection with the last remark he made, with regard to the Bankruptcy Act, when he said it was entirely unfair that the Bankruptcy Act should not apply to debts to the Government incurred under this Bill. I agree that the Bankruptcy Act should apply to such debts. It would be quite unfair that, where a settler has gone through the Bankruptcy Court and has been freed from his liabilities with regard to other creditors, has had his land sold up, and is, in fact, worth nothing, he should still be obliged to owe a debt to the State which he does not owe to other creditors. That, however, is a Committee objection, and I hope in Committee it will be obviated. But I was sorry to notice in his speech the same note of pessimism with regard to advances to colonists which he struck in speaking on the Financial Statement. He said he thought it was impossible that this loan could be raised at 3½ per cent. when the previous loans had not been raised at that, and he thought the credit of the colony was not good enough to enable it to obtain money at that rate. Now, I do not think he gave sufficient reason for his belief. He said—or rather he asked whether the Agent-General had not telegraphed that the colony could not obtain money at 3½ per cent.; and it was replied by the Colonial Treasurer that it was not a fact, and that the Agent-General had not done so. He did not, I think, give sufficient reasons why we should not be able to raise money at that rate. When we look at what the neighbouring colonies are doing, I see no sufficient reason myself why we should not. I read in the newspaper on Friday that New South Wales is floating a loan of £832,000 at 3½ per cent., with a minimum of 100, and that the tenders are to be opened on the 20th. It said the success of that issue was certain, as it was already quoted at a ½ premium. Now, if New South Wales can raise a loan at par, which is quoted at a premium, I think New Zealand should be in a condition to do the same. If we look at the condition of New South Wales stocks and the condition of New Zealand stocks we shall find that, whether it is $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. or 4 per cent., New Zealand stands the highest, and I see no reason why we should not do the same as New South Wales. Then, Sir, I think he might have left out one word in his speech, and that was the word "repudiation." He introduced it towards the end of his speech. It was entirely unprovoked, absolutely uncalled-for; and there is no reason why any New Zealand statesman should introduce such a word in the debate in this House. If there is one word more than another which ought to be considered unparliamentary it is that. I hope, when our credit is the highest of any of the Australasian Colonies, we shall not hear even a passing remark with regard to repudiation. Now, Sir, I am supporting this Bill on its second reading because I believe in this policy of lending cheap money to farmers—the policy which the Colonial Treasurer has proposed. I say there is a necessity for some Bill of this sort when we consider that the average rate of interest in this colony is, we will say, at least 7 per cent., and that will not include loans to small farmers. The loans to small farmers run to 8 per cent., and, perhaps, to 9 per cent.; and when the Treasurer proposes to reduce the rate of interest, and to make it 5 per cent., we see that this is something which is not only necessary but which will be a great gain to the country. That is an object which it is worth legislating about. If the rate can be reduced, it is a "consummation devoutly to be wished." We often hear it said as a joke that what the people want is a Government that will raise the price of mutton 1d. per pound, or the price of wheat. Well, Sir, of course we cannot do that; but I think, if we succeed in reducing the rate of interest by perhaps 2 per cent., we shall be doing something that is at least as good. Besides the effect of reducing the rate of interest on the loans actually made by the Superintendent of the Government lending body, it will have very considerable indirect effects. It will, I think, tend also to reduce the rates of interest charged by the large lending bodies of New Zealand, for, when they find that they cannot get the same interest on good security since the Government are taking up the loans, they will naturally lower their charges, and we shall have the charges lowered all over New Zealand. It will also be especially beneficial to small farmers and settlers, who at present have to pay large charges before they get their loans at all. There is often a fee charged for obtaining the money, and this and the valuation and solicitor's fees run away sometimes with as much as one or two years' interest on the loans. With this scheme, which puts valuation and all fees on a simple system, with the money obtained at a cheaper rate to begin with, with lessened initiative charges and lessened expenditure, there will be less difficulty in obtaining loans. The senior member for Wellington City said that this measure would have the effect of driving capital from the colony,—of driving away the loan companies. If we drove away the loan companies, what would that mean? It would mean, if they were driven away, that the rate of interest had been lowered to 5 per cent. That is exactly what we are trying to bring about. But I do not think it will drive away the loan companies. I do not think that at all probable or even possible. I think the natural effect will be that it will tend to lower the rate of interest—that the loan companies will find it necessary to lower the rate of interest, and will do so in consequence all over the colony, so that instead of driving capital out of the colony it will succeed in keeping in the colony 1 or 2 per cent. of the capital that would otherwise go out of it in order to pay interest on loans. Now, a great deal has been said with regard to the margin of the loan—as to whether we had sufficient margin or whether we had not. It was said that we had not, and it would be a loss to the country. But, before I say anything on this question, I should like to ask the Colonial Treasurer a question. The question I should like to ask is this: Under this system, are the mortgagors to pay the land-tax, or are they not? I should like the Colonial Treasurer to answer that,—Yes or No,—because I should then know how to proceed.

Mr. WARD.—I will answer the honourable gentleman when I reply.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Quite so, Sir. Then I say—

Mr. WARD.—"Yes" or "No" would not suffice; it would require an explanation.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I do not know what the explanation may be; I only know that this is a very important point—a point without which it is almost impossible to discuss the question of margin at all, because the land-tax comes to about $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and the question of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. one way or the other is a question of very large importance as affecting the margin. But I will say, if the mortgagors are to pay,—and I believe, whether they are to pay or not, there ought to be no question whatever about the margin,—there should be a very safe margin for the difference between $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and 5 per cent. for the charges of raising the loan, the Assurance Fund, which is $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., and the management expenses. Now with regard to these expenses of management. Of course we cannot tell accurately what they may be; although we make an estimate, we can only guess at it to a certain extent; but it would be interesting, perhaps, for me to read what the expenses of management have been in other countries in which they have some system of crédit foncier similar to this, and I have made a note of what they are in several countries. In Pomerania the expenses are $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., in Galicia $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., in Würtemberg $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., in Hanover $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., in Bavaria 1 per cent., including management and reserve fund. These, Sir, are the rates in countries in Europe, and, of course, it is naturally to be expected in New Zealand we, having to pay higher salaries, shall have to pay more. At the same time, it seems to me there is a margin, between the rates I have quoted and what we should have to pay, of from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 per cent., according as to whether we pay the land-tax or the mortgagors pay the land-tax. It seems to me that there will be a sufficient margin. Of course it will be a matter for time to decide, but, looking at it now, I think there will be. I, however, think, if we are going to make this a safe scheme, we must, if we can, certainly reduce the amount of the expenses. We can reduce the expense of the District Solicitors and the Valuers. It is quite true, as the Colonial Treasurer has pointed out, that they would also do other Government business, and relieve the Government of a good deal of expense; but it is to be noted that we have it in the Bill that they are to do only Government business—that it is to be impossible for them to do any private business of their own. I think there may not be, perhaps, in some districts, sufficient Government business for them to do. At any rate, I believe it would be cheaper to employ a solicitor to do the work.

Mr. WARD.—That can be considered in Committee.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—The Colonial Treasurer says he is prepared to consider this in Committee, and I hope he will consider it with the suggestion I am making. If the business is given to a private solicitor he can undertake to do it more cheaply, because having the Government business will attract to him other clients he would not otherwise get, and so I should think he could do it as cheaply as any one. Then, if we are to have only ten districts, it means, perhaps, that there will be only one Solicitor for Canterbury, and it would be a long way for some to go if they wanted a loan—to perhaps the centre of the district—whereas, if there was a system of employing private solicitors, a man might go to the solicitor in his district and have the business arranged there. The same thing would, to a large extent, apply to the Valuers. It seems to me unnecessary to have an official Valuer who could do no other business. And, while speaking of Valuers, I would say I hope the Colonial Treasurer will also reconsider the question of Valuers' fees in Committee. It is not necessary to have high fees, but it is necessary that the fees should pay their way. We should be able with the fees to pay the Valuers; they should be sufficient to do that, and just at that lowness, and no more. Now I come to the question which is to some extent the critical point of the Bill—namely, with regard to the amount to be advanced. We see it stated in the Bill that the amount is to be two-thirds valuation; and we have in the Financial Statement this statement: "To stipulate that these advances should only be made upon a 50-per-cent. valuation would, in my opinion, entirely neutralise any general good that the scheme is intended to confer." I fail to see how it would neutralise this general good. In nearly every country in the world in which a State bank or a crédit foncier has been established it is the regular practice to have a one-half limit. I have made a list of the places where the advance is to one-half, and where it may be two-thirds, which I will read. In Poland, Galicia, Württemberg, Saxony, Hanover, and Nassau, one-half is the maximum; and there are only one or two cases I have been able to find where two-thirds value is advanced—namely, Belgium and Denmark; and in those two countries, as one knows very well, like all old-settled and old-established countries, the land is not very variable in value. We have it stated that in the Government lending departments—in the Trust Office and Government Insurance—the maximum is also one-half; and we have heard the Colonial Treasurer tell us what a very great business they have, and how much they lend out. He said that what they lend is a very considerable sum, that they had succeeded in lending on a one-half basis, and the Insurance Department had only lost about £1,000 since the present Board came into office, which appears to be a very successful result of their business. It has been said by the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs that this Bill has been taken from the Victorian Bill—a statement in which I do not agree with him, because any one who reads the two Bills will find that there is not one single clause the same. But there is one remarkable thing in the Victorian Bill, which is a Bill that is to give advances to settlers and others, called the Savings-bank Bill, and that is that the limit there proposed is one-half. If we go to the most spendthrift country in the world—the Argentine Republic—where they issue cedulas and pay 6 per cent. on them, we find it there also insisted on that the value of the land shall be double the amount of the loan. If we look at these precedents all over the world we shall find the fallacy of the Colonial Treasurer's opinion that having a limit to 50 per cent. of value would entirely neutralise any general good that the system is intended to confer. We shall find these systems have been established, and have done a great deal of good, and that the good has not been neutralised by the 50 per cent. which is insisted upon. And we have a particular position here as compared with the countries of Europe. In those countries, as I said with regard to Belgium, which have been long settled, the price of land does not vary as it does here. In New Zealand we depend so much on the frozen-meat trade, the dairy industry, and the price of wool that it is not uncommon for the land to vary one-third in value within six months. This does not happen in the old countries. There are additional uncertainties here that we should do well to guard against. Then, we know it has been the custom to advance up to two-thirds, and we know what the result has been for the last few years—that nearly every loan company and private capitalist has lost money by it, and especially so on town property. Town property is much more variable in value than country property, and if it is to be included in the Bill—and it is included in the Bill as it stands at present—I hope the Treasurer will favourably consider a proposal to reduce the maximum in the case of town property, even if he does not in the case of country mortgages.

The first thing, to my mind, for us to consider is safety. We must remember we are experimenting with the money belonging to the taxpayers, and we ought therefore to be most specially careful. We cannot think, of course, of avoiding all risk. We must take a certain amount of risk and uncertainty; otherwise it would be like saying that we must not go into the water before we learn to swim. But we must make it as safe as possible. We must make this such a Bill that the taxpayers and the House, and the country in general, will feel that there is some security in the measure being brought forward; and I venture to say, if the Bill is amended in the direction I have suggested, it will command more hearty support than when the maximum is placed as high as two-thirds. In the Financial Statement we have it stated that the first essential to the introduction of money into the colony is to give an assurance to those from whom it is obtained that their loan is safe. It is equally essential to any security of that sort, I consider, to give an assurance to the taxpayers of the country that the scheme proposed—for which they will be responsible—is safe and secure for the colony. With regard to the length of term of the loan, I find no difficulty whatever, although the senior member for Wellington City did find some. He said that for a man to take up a loan for so long as thirty-six years was not desirable; and, when I interrupted him to say that it was optional to pay it off at any time, he said if he paid it off the State would not be able to reinvest it. If, Sir, we can come to a state of things when the State is not able to reinvest money at 5 per cent, we shall have attained, to a large extent, the object the Colonial Treasurer has in bringing in the Bill, and have succeeded in reducing the rate of interest in the colony. And, with regard to reinvesting, we shall want money in other ways. We shall want it for public works, and, in fact, we shall have no difficulty in finding what to do with any money we want to invest. A word with regard to the class of security. I entirely agree with the proposal to advance this money on leasehold lands—on eternal lease and perpetual lease. The primary object of the proposal is, to my mind, to advance the settlement of the land. It is impossible to settle the land, it is impossible to settle the country, if we are not going to give advances on improvements, and it is with the object of using this Bill to help struggling settlers that this clause has been put in; and I give it my very hearty support. But I will say this: it may be a little cavilling, but if you read clause 42 it seems to want a little amendment. It says,—

"No advance on the security of leasehold lands shall be granted unless and until—

"(a.) All covenants and conditions on the lessee's part contained or implied in the lease are complied with; and

"(b.) The lessee is entitled under his lease to compensation for all improvements made by him on the land comprised therein."

Now, I think I have never learned yet that the eternal lease has any clause about compensation at the end of 999 years. It seems to me that this clause will require a small amount of amendment in Committee. In the lease in perpetuity there is a clause with regard to improvements.

Sir R. STOUT.—How can they make improvements, when they have not got any money?

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—If they succeed in making improvements at present, without having State advances on their improvements, surely they will be in a much better position when the State will advance from time to time on the improvements they have made. Then, in connection with the class of security, we have the question of town lands. I am sorry to see town lands left in the Bill; I hope we shall be able to amend it in Committee, so that it shall be what it is intended to be—financial aid to settlers. That is what we have in the Financial Statement. We do not call "settler;" people on Lambton Quay with a large warehouse. It was not intended, in the first place, I think, to apply to town properties. I quite see there is a little difficulty with regard to town members. But the first intention of the scheme was to encourage settlement in the country by advancing money to settlers, and I think, until we have ascertained this to be a success with regard to settlers, it should be confined to these, and not introduced into the towns in any way. With regard to the land-bonds, this is quite a new matter, as has been pointed out by the senior member for Wellington City, and it is not, in my opinion, a desirable complication. It will be very difficult to raise money on them. I presume they will be for £10, £20, £100, et cetera, and those are not the sort of amounts which capitalists will invest their money in. They much prefer to invest it in larger amounts. Then, it is understood that these are to be payable in Wellington, and it is to be presumed, therefore, the Treasurer means to issue them in New Zealand. When we have Colonial Consols at 4 per cent., I fail to see how people will invest in land-bonds at 3½ per cent. And if you read clause 31 it says that the land-bonds shall only be sold at par:—

"No bond, debenture, or other security issued under this Part of this Act shall be sold or otherwise disposed of at a price which will yield to the purchaser thereof a higher rate of interest by the year than four pounds for every one hundred pounds of the purchase-money given for the same."

The effect of this might be that some investor in England might have a number of bonds in England, and might not be able to sell them. If the colony refused to buy them back he would have them on his hands, and be unable to realise on them. Of course, this clause can be amended; but I do not think, if they are to be sold at par, it will be possible to satisfy the taxpayers that they are a security which will commend themselves to the English investor. Then, with regard to the money being raised for a number of years, I think it will be quite enough to start with one year at a time. It is part of the system of Parliament that every year we shall vote so much for all money to be expended within the year; and if this proposal is to be carried out we should vote it year by year. There is no satisfactory reason why we should not. It should be submitted to Parliament every year, with the whole outline of the scheme and the operations that have been carried out in former years under it, and we should have an opportunity of voting on it. We should then have the opportunity of having a voice as to whether we should increase the amount or reduce it. This is one of the privileges of Parliament that should not be lost sight of. My time is now practically done, and, in conclusion, I will say to the Colonial Treasurer that I have not made these criticisms or remarks with any desire to cavil at the scheme, or to throw cold water on it, or to damage it in any way whatever. I have done so in response to what is stated in the Financial Statement, where it says, "I ask honourable members, as they have the welfare of the country at heart, when the Bill is before the House for their consideration, to assist in making it, where necessary, a better Bill, and to bring about that which is so necessary to the well-being of the colony." It is on this invitation that I have made the remarks I have made and the criticisms the House has just heard. I support the second reading of this Bill, fully believing that the scheme is a beneficial one, which is much needed. If it can be carried out and made self-supporting, and if it succeeds, it will be a great boon to farmers and country settlers all over New Zealand. And I have criticized it with the desire, and the sole desire, to make the scheme as safe as possible, in the one hope that some of the suggestions I have made may be favourably considered by the Colonial Treasurer when the Bill gets into Committee.

40. Mr. DUTHIE.—Sir, in the Financial Statement, and when introducing this scheme, the Colonial Treasurer drew attention to the high and increasing rate of interest in the colony; and the other night, in his speech, he also drew attention to the fact that at the present time there is a plethora of money in the English market, that the rates of interest are lower there than he had ever known them before. Well, he so admitted the fact that the rates of interest have recently advanced in this colony; and I think that, before embarking upon a large financial scheme such as this, the Government ought to determine why it is that the rates of interest, which had been decreasing from year to year in the colony, are now again advancing. For instance, about twenty years ago 10 per cent. was the current rate of interest in the colony; but it has been gradually falling, until, say, about four years ago, when those honourable gentlemen came into office. Mortgages were then freely taken at 5½, 6, and 6½ per cent. Those were the highest rates then prevailing; but there is now no denying the fact that the rates of interest have since advanced, and you cannot borrow in any sum and on the best security at 5½ in the colony to-day. I suppose that, upon the average, there has been an advance of ½ per cent., notwithstanding the fact that money is cheaper than ever in the English market. There can be little doubt but that the cause of this is the legislative measures introduced by this Government, and which have given rise to a feeling of insecurity on the part of investors and capitalists. As an instance of the effect of legislation on rates of interest, I mentioned to the House a few weeks ago the case of a Wellington merchant who recently visited Edinburgh, and, being a member of an influential firm, met a representative body of capitalists in that city, with a view to arranging for money for investment. With them he found the lower rates of interest proposed no bar to business, but the liability to our mortgage-tax, from which there is no escape, was a formidable obstacle. Our law provides that the mortgagee alone must pay this tax; and the meeting would not agree to lend in a distant colony, subject to what might be made at any time a penal tax; and hence in practice a higher rate of interest has now to be paid on money so borrowed to cover this risk, and so to the loss of our settlers. Then, the Treasurer says that renewals of mortgages are difficult; but I do not think that is the case. For mortgages falling due, I think, if there is anything like good security, money is available; but property has generally depreciated, and, consequently, further security may now be demanded. Still, in the true interests of the colony, it would be best if we were to repeal this Act, and admit the error we then made of interfering between capitalists and mortgagors. That is the true course we ought to adopt; but I suppose it is useless to urge it. Before proceeding to examine this scheme, it is assumed as a basis that we are going to borrow this money at 3½ and at par. As pointed out by the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs, when the Bank of New Zealand guaranteed debentures were put on the market a few weeks ago they fetched very little over par at 4 per cent.; and it is therefore well that we should not deceive ourselves, or be led to adopt such a scheme, because there is a plethora of money in the market. All our experience points to the impossibility of placing a loan in London, however favourable the market, to yield anything like par for even 3½ inscribed stock. It is true we see in the telegrams that our 3½-per-centa are quoted at a large advance upon par.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They are going down now.

Mr. DUTHIE.—Not so, taking the cable quotations given last night: but I say they are very misleading, and that quotation is altogether insufficient to justify this House in adopting a departure of this sort. Really the cable quotations are very misleading, because, if we take the most recent returns, we find that in January £60,000 was converted at 96 and 96½, and in February we converted the sum of £10,000 at 98½. These are not large transactions, but they are the most recent, and, comparing the rates with the quotations of even dates, it is evident our conversions are effected at ½ to 1 per cent. below the exchange quotations as reported in the Economist. Then, if we turn to the latest London papers of the 4th and 6th August, by them our 3½-per-cent. debentures are under par, varying from 99½ to 99¾; and it is absurd to base this gigantic scheme on unreliable quotations, inflated or otherwise by the tricks of the Exchange: we must take the test of our own experience, which clearly proves that money could not be raised at rates at all approaching the Treasurer's estimate. Of course, our debentures rise and fall with the market and the accrued interest. Inscribed stock with three or four months' interest upon it will be worth 1 to 1½ per cent. more, but when July comes round and interest is paid it goes down to face-value, and we should have to sell any new loan at face-value. Then, we have the fact that this colony has spent £360,000 as the incidental costs of effecting past conversions. It costs 1½ per cent. to place a loan on the London market; therefore that amount has to be deducted from the net proceeds of the loan. Then, in going to the London market as borrowers, we must look for a sharp decline in the value of our stock, and it will be a very favourable thing indeed if we should net for such a loan £96 10s.; therefore we are probably starting with a loss of £35,000 on every million. Then, if we examine this Bill, it is proposed to approach the London market under very odd conditions. Agents are to be appointed who may issue in any form—in bond, scrip, debentures, or inscribed stock—and privately without public tender, and provision is made for conversion of any of these into inscribed stock. If we were to go to the London market and invite tenders for the loan, we should surely place it on more advantageous terms than can be obtained while so smuggling a loan on the market. I think it shows a want of confidence on the part of the Colonial Treasurer in not approaching the London market boldly and in not so securing the market-value of his stock. Evidently he is without confidence, and therefore he goes to work in this roundabout way. Another feature of the Bill is the land-bonds. It is a pity to complicate our finance by this new departure. The Treasurer made a confession recommending this new bond, since it would not appear in the return of our public debt. It is very humiliating to confess to such an object. Our public debt ought to be fully set forth, and we ought not to be afraid to place it before the world. Then, there is the question of land-tax. Evidently it is intended that we are to lose that: it is to be given as a contribution from the public purse to promote this fancy scheme. It is worthy of consideration what is the extent of the benefit from this new departure. At the outside, on the rates prevailing for good mortgages—namely, from 6 to 7, or, say, an average of 6½—the utmost saving on a million is £15,000 per annum. That is the full amount to be saved, and I do not think the advantage is so great as to warrant us in this plunging departure. The present total is not large, and neither are we to expect that the rates of interest will be maintained. In spite of the insecurity that obtains in this country now, in time things will settle down, when rates of interest will gradually drop, for there is no good reason why sound investments should run 2½ per cent. higher in the colony than in England. The decline has been very rapid in recent years, and within a short time lower rates will prevail if Government would only let matters alone. Then, we have provision for a sinking fund. Seeing the manner in which the Treasurer has exploited the accumulated sinking funds, it seems extraordinary to find him providing the like. Surely this is scarce worth while, seeing we now provide no sinking fund for our public debt. If, however, this is to be the investment, the sinking fund is scarcely satisfactory. It is to be passed over to the Superintendent, who, I suppose, is to be the Public Trustee; but there are no sufficiently stringent provisions as to its investment and custody. Perhaps this was not thought necessary, as it will the more easily enable the Colonial Treasurer to repeat recent experience, and, when colonial necessities arise, to appropriate the fund. The Treasurer says, if he succeeds in this scheme, private money-lenders will have to reduce their rates of interest. Well, that may be; but, as I have sought to show, the rates would fall in any case, and it only goes to show that there is not a need for this scheme. I take objection to this period of thirty-six and a half years. It is not at all adapted to the needs of the country. It is simply a fancy of the Colonial Treasurer's, arising out of the accumulation of 1 per cent. invested at 5 per cent., but otherwise an entirely unsuitable term. No man who wants to borrow money wants to borrow it for such a length of time. He does not want to borrow for a longer term of years than he sees need for. No man wants to pledge his property for a term of thirty-six years and a half, and I do not think this feature would be at all acceptable to the country settlers. If this scheme is to be extended to town properties, I would remind the Treasurer that the life of a wooden house is not thirty-six years and a half—twenty or twenty-five years is about the life of a wooden house; and I think the proposal to advance money upon this kind of property is out of place. Next, the proposal is to advance up to two-thirds of the value. That, to my mind, is a very unsafe proposal indeed, especially in the case of a Government department. It proves nothing to point to the fact that the Insurance Department has made a very small loss, or that the Trust Office has made still less loss, by only lending up to 50-per-cent. value. It is all the difference between 50 per cent. and two-thirds. Then, while the Treasurer tells us how small the loss is that these departments have incurred, he forgets to say that the securities have not been realised; and until these are realised it is impossible to say what the losses will be. I gather also that this is to be a joint Board, the same as that connected with the other Government lending departments. It is to be the same Board, but, if the other departments lend only up to a 50-per-cent. value, then the result will be that the more risky securities will be passed over to this new department, and this department will get a smaller share of what are really good securities. I think that in this matter the greatest care and personal experience will have to be brought into play by the Board. Valuers are often misled with regard to the real worth of properties in their own special locality, and often lose sight of the productive capacity of land, and so make excessive valuations. It requires a great deal of knowledge on the part of the Board to act as a check against excessive valuation, and I do not think it is at all safe that a Board whose members have no special experience should advance up to a proportion of two-thirds: to do so must create a probability of incurring a very serious loss. Then, there is this matter to be considered if this scheme becomes law: There will be a great amount of clerical work required to be done, for which there is no provision made in the Bill. We are told that the officers of the various departments have to give their services to the work of this department; but I would point out that, even with regard to the Solicitors themselves, a certain amount of clerical assistance will be required, and there is no provision at all made for that. The Treasurer made a slip of something over £8,000 in his estimate of the revenue in the conveyancing department. This loss has to be made good, and I suppose it will be taken out of the general expenses. However, to me there next comes one of the most important features of this Bill. It is strongly and eloquently recommended by the Treasurer that the main reason for the scheme is that settlers who are desirous of developing their farms but who have not the wherewithal to do it should receive assistance from this Board; and, alluding to the more impecunious class of settlers, he says, "It is the business of the colony to devise means to enable them to carry out these improvements." It is that appeal to do a generous action that largely commends this Bill to this House; it is that desire to assist these people that brings a large amount of sympathy towards this Bill; but I cannot see how this Bill could be strained to assist such people. I presume the Board must act strictly within the lines of the Act, and I cannot see how they are, under the Act, to give help to that class of people. They are strictly tied down to the fact that the Valuer must certify there is that value in the property; he cannot value improvements that are still to be effected. He must certify to the Board that the value is existent on the property before the loans are advanced. The Board have no souls of compassion; they have to comply with the Act. They cannot lend to the class of settlers contemplated; and how are they to assist leaseholders? How can you strain the Act in any way to enable the Board to advance money to those who have no wherewithal to effect improvements on their property? The value must be existent before the money is advanced, and therefore no assistance can be rendered to this class of farmers under this Bill. Then, what is the good of passing this Bill? It is utterly impracticable for the professed purpose. That being the case, they can only lend to the well-to-do class. Why are we called upon to give assistance to well-to-do people? They do not call for any exceptional assistance. You might as well advance to manufacturers. There are several small manufacturers who are in great want of money to enable them to increase their plant and to enable them to give more employment. But you propose to give this assistance to people who are well-to-do already, and who have no need of assistance. We find, for instance, that the farmer-class are nowadays not content to confine themselves to farming and managing their land. Starting at Gisborne, throughout Napier and Taranaki, and along the whole Wellington Provincial District we have farmers' co-operative associations in full swing. They embark largely in trade, and do export and import business for themselves. This is the same in Canterbury; and all the way down to Invercargill these co-operative associations are well established. Under this Bill these well-to-do farmers will get money at 5 per cent., and, instead of employing it in the improvement of their land, they will be enabled to put it in their co-operative societies, relieving that section of traders from high overdraft rates. We are simply finding under this Bill capital for a well-to-do class, who can very well afford to do without it, and to enable them to embark in occupations and pursuits outside of farming altogether; and the class of men we have in our minds will not get assistance under this Bill. If one had time to go through the Bill, it is very loosely drawn, and bristles with absurdities that can be better dealt with in Committee—if it gets there. I think the Bill is uncalled-for. It may be a suitable Bill for electioneering purposes, but it is a most dangerous departure—perhaps the most dangerous Bill that has been before the House. If we bring it into operation I am sure that heavy financial loss will accrue to the colony before many years are over. The Bill is impracticable and quite uncalled-for. I hope the Treasurer will withdraw it, and put it into the pigeonhole with that cheap-postage scheme of his, and let them lie together as monuments of the honourable gentleman. I do not think the Bill should be passed by this House.

Mr. HOGG.—The last speaker has referred to this Bill as a measure that is quite uncalled-for. My reply to that is that I believe no measure was put before the country during the last general election that met with a heartier response, especially from the country settlers, than the Bill now presented for consideration. Then, he says that it is not likely to give the anticipated amount of relief to settlers, because the amount of interest chargeable under this Bill is only 1 or 2 per cent. under the amount of interest that settlers can obtain money for now. My reply to that is that this margin of 1 or 2 per cent. very frequently means the difference between the profit or the loss in farm property, and that it is of the utmost importance to farmers to be on the right side of the ledger, instead of being on the wrong side, as they now frequently are through borrowing money from the banks or from private money-lenders. The question, I admit, is a very large one, and one of such importance as to need a great deal of consideration. So far, I think, the Bill has been treated with great consideration by the members of this House who have spoken in regard to it. On the whole, I think the Colonial Treasurer has no reason to be otherwise than thoroughly satisfied with the description of criticism which this Bill has received. The honourable member for Chalmers, it is true, damned the Bill with faint praise. But it must be remembered that that honourable gentleman is not representing a community of farmers, but, rather, a seaside port, where there are few land-settlers. If this Bill is carried out in the manner intended it is not likely to give a vast amount of relief to the people of Port Chalmers, any more than it is intended to give much relief to the large towns. The principal objection which he raised to the Bill is this: that the amount of money that will be advanced to settlers under the Bill is altogether too limited. He thinks that, instead of a limit of £5,000, people who desire to borrow should be able under this Bill to get £30,000 or £40,000. Well, my reply to that is this: that I think an honourable gentleman holding those views would be much better in the position of a director of a bank than in that of a representative of the people. He is evidently the friend of the monopolist; and I would remind him that people who want such a sum as £30,000 or £40,000 to invest in land are not the class of settlers that ought to be assisted by the Government of the country. They belong, in my opinion, to the class called land-jobbers; and these big land-jobbers are perfectly well able to protect themselves in regard to interest. He says this Bill would drive capital out of the country by depleting the financial institutions of the colony, and he argues that if that is the case there will be very little money left for manufacturers to borrow, and that the result will be that we shall be having wages reduced.

430. Well, Sir, I apprehend that if this Bill relieves our financial institutions of the necessity for advancing money to a large number of country settlers it will on that account leave so much more for the advantage and benefit of the manufacturers and the residents in our big towns. So far from driving money away, it will drive money into the pockets of those manufacturers in our towns who so badly require it; and, so far from the effect being to lower wages, it is likely to have a contrary effect entirely, by producing more employment, not only in the country, but in the towns as well. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) accuses those on the Treasury benches and on this side of the House of not criticizing the Bill in the way that he expected. Well, I do not know what sort of criticism the honourable gentleman expects from the mouths of those he terms dumb dogs, because dumb dogs are not in the habit of barking nor yet of howling. So far as that is concerned, I think we can leave the barking and howling to the honourable member who brings this accusation against the Liberal party. We know that during the present session every policy measure brought in by the Government has had much the same effect upon the honourable gentleman as a new moon has upon a dog: he has been wont to bay at it most dismally. He says, also, that this measure is not likely to give any aid to the manufacturers. Well, Sir, it was never intended that this Bill should aid the manufacturers; but I would point out that the class this Bill is required to aid at the present time is the new settlers, who are building up New Zealand—settlers of the bush particularly. If it assists in settling our lands, in developing our agricultural and pastoral resources, then the manufacturers in our towns are destined to receive very material aid; because it is absolutely impossible for the country to be placed in a satisfactory position, and for the settlers to improve their condition, without the manufacturers and the artisans in the towns also benefiting commensurately. The honourable member for Patea the other evening remarked that, owing to the Government policy, capital had been hardening, and that those who were supporting this Bill admitted that the doleful prophets of the other side had really been right. But, Sir, I would ask the question, whether of late capital has not been softening rather than hardening—whether the glacier has not been melting, and whether the snow has not been distilling. I am assured—and I have my information from very good sources—that since this cheap-money scheme has been initiated—since the last general election, when this cheap-money scheme was indicated, and, more recently, since the Government intimated through the medium of the Financial Statement that they intended to bring a Bill of this character before the House—money has been softening very materially, and instead of the rates of interest going up they have been coming down.

Mr. BELL.—No; you are quite wrong.

Mr. HOGG.—Well, a gentleman in this town—I can give his name if necessary—an architect in Wellington, whom the honourable member who is challenging my statement knows well, has given me the information I am now offering to the House. He states that a few months ago it was absolutely impossible to get money advanced on land and property that you can now get money freely advanced upon. If necessary, I will furnish the honourable gentleman with the name of my autho-riety. I am not making the statement at hazard.

Mr. BELL.—I did not accuse the honourable gentleman of doing so.

Mr. HOGG.—The honourable member for Wellington Suburbs found fault with the Bill because he says it is a Victorian scheme. All I can say to that is that I do not care from what country it has been borrowed, providing the photograph is a good one, and that the measure is calculated to benefit the people of the colony. Then, he finds fault with it again because everything it is going to create will be brand-new: Brand-new Solicitors, brand-new Valuers, and so forth. I would remind the honourable gentleman that there is nothing really new under the sun, and that the honourable gentleman himself, despite his name, Dr. Newman, is not altogether new, because I do not think he was born yesterday. That is a poor kind of fault to find in the Bill. Then, he referred felicitously to what happened when the Government of the Argentine Republic brought forward a scheme of this character. Now, Sir, I think the Argentine bogey is somewhat far-fetched. This is not an Argentine Republic, and our circumstances are entirely different from the circumstances that prevailed in South America when the Argentine bubble was burst a few years ago. He says this is a Bill that is intended to smash the lawyers and break the banks. Well, all I can say is this: that, through the medium of this Bill and measures of this character, we are endeavouring to make both institutions as honest as possible, by confining them to their legitimate occupations. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay, like the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), accuses members on this side of the House of extreme reticence, of being very silent, of not defending the Bill in the way we should. All I can say is, we are keeping our powder dry; there is a splendid reserve behind us in the shape of the country. I believe no measure has been watched with greater interest throughout New Zealand than the Bill now before the House, and it is one which I sincerely hope will, before the session expires, be passed into law. If it is not, it will be a very severe disappointment indeed to the settlers of New Zealand. Well, let us look at the Bill for a moment, and let us inquire how it originated, and what are its merits. The great object of the Bill is to give relief to the settlers of New Zealand. It originated, I believe, in a deputation of members of this House, and one of a very large character, which met Ministers about twelve months ago, and demanded this: that the Government should extend the same facilities to leaseholders of the Crown for borrowing money from the trust funds of the State as are extended to the freeholders. I may say that I took an active part, urged by my constituents, or a portion of them at least, in getting this deputation to wait on Ministers. Now, the reason for the application being made to the Government was this: that from the time when the Land Act of 1892 was passed, an Act which created a large number of new leaseholders,—that is, leaseholders under the lease in perpetuity,—it was found that capitalists and bankers and money-lenders buttoned up their pockets and absolutely refused, on any terms whatever, to advance money to these leaseholders. My argument was that, inasmuch as freeholders could obtain advances from private money-lenders, the Government should confine themselves as much as possible to giving a similar advantage to leaseholders. The reply received on that occasion was that the Government were not in a position to make these advances, but possibly next session steps would be taken in that direction, and it would be necessary to pass a Bill for that express purpose. From that time I have looked to the Government to redeem their promise, and I am glad to see they are endeavouring to redeem it in an exceedingly handsome manner. And, Sir, if this is the outcome, all I can say is that, if the private money-lender is likely to suffer through the Government entering into competition in his particular line of business, he is to blame for it. It was because he hardened capital to such an extent that the Government leaseholders could not get a shilling of advance made on their improvements, and were driven by sheer necessity to urge their representatives in this House to bring the position in which they were placed before the Government of the country, that the Government of the country have nobly responded to the demand that, with their trust funds and otherwise, they should come to their relief. Well, Sir, I am free to add that this measure, in my opinion, appears to be somewhat ambitious. I should have been much pleased indeed had it been of a less ambitious character. I will go further and admit that if the scheme were less ambitious it would please me much better, because there is an old saying that it is dangerous to play with sharp-edged tools, and in the present financial position of New Zealand it is somewhat dangerous to play with millions; they are very sharp-edged weapons. All that I anticipated at the hands of the Government when this deputation waited upon them was this: that they would assist, or take means for assisting, the class of settlers whose necessities are undoubted. I refer to those men who have been going into the bush, many of them without capital—men with wives and families to support, whose only capital consists in the ability to labour, and who, while knocking down the bush and bringing their land gradually into a condition of reproductiveness, have family responsibilities to face. Those men must either go into debt or they must receive assistance. "While the grass is growing," it is said, "the steed starves"; and, in the same way, while the grass is growing the settler, or his family at all events, may be starving. These are the men who, unless assistance is afforded, must inevitably, many of them at any rate, go to the wall; and my anticipation was that a Bill would be brought forward to enable the Government, through their trust funds or otherwise, to assist this class of deserving settlers. Now, the limit of £5,000, instead of being too small, in my opinion is far too large. I should like the limit to be fixed at something like £500, or, at the most, about £1,000, and I do not think we should go beyond that. I believe the class of settlers who require advances of £2,000, £3,000, or £5,000 are perfectly well able to get the money they want. Most of them need not consult the money-lender in New Zealand at all, because they can afford to go abroad for it. The class of settlers I should like to see assisted by means of the Bill are the small men who are entering upon the land, and who are making improvements not merely for themselves but for the colony, and improvements which will last for all time. That is the class of men that commends itself to our sympathy, and needs our assistance, and that is the class which I should like to see assisted through the scheme contained in a Bill of this character. Now, if advances were restricted in that way, I do not think it would be necessary to borrow anything like the amount of money contemplated by this measure. In all probability, instead of a million and a half, half a million would be quite sufficient with which to try the experiment. I have no doubt as to what an experiment of this kind would produce. It would result in this: It would secure a measure of prosperity for New Zealand such as has not been witnessed for years. Small as half a million is, I say if we scatter it among the class of settlers I refer to, and if we abstain from assisting those who speculate either in land or anything else—instead of assisting men who require from £2,000 to £5,000, if we leave them to get the assistance they require either from banks or other private sources—I say by advancing half a million of money to our small settlers we shall materially assist the process of settlement—by placing money at the disposal of men who have their families on the land, and who will in time add very materially to the productiveness of the country—that is, if the Bill is used in the manner I have suggested. I am not disagreeing with the Bill; on the contrary, I say a better measure, or one more calculated to develop materially the resources of the colony, has never been brought forward in this or any other country; but I believe if we amend it in the way I suggest we shall be opening up a vista to our bush-settlers, especially the small settlers, who must be regarded as the great hope of New Zealand in the future. We shall not be advancing this money in the interest of speculators in land or anything else, but we shall be assisting men who are trying to make homes for themselves and their families. We have at the present time in our large centres men with families in a pitiable condition, who have to go begging for work from time to time, and if we place these men upon the land under the liberal conditions contained in our Land Act, as we are now endeavouring to do, we must also place them in the position of making homes for themselves by granting them the needed assistance of capital. When a man goes on the land, especially bush-land, without his axe or bill-hook, what can he do? Nothing whatever. And, in the same way, a working-man who goes there without capital is in the same position as a man who goes to work without the tools of his trade. He has no means of making capital or earning money, and he is reduced in a short time to a thoroughly helpless condition. It is necessary that the Government, or some one else, should come to his rescue. I do not wish to see our bush-settlers treated in the way some of our farmers have been treated in former times. I refer to the men who have been wasting the best part of their lives making profits out of the land not for themselves but for others. They have been working the land well, making it thoroughly reproductive; but, all this time, what position have they been in? They have been slaves to the capitalists and usurers. They have been obliged to pay heavy legal fees for mortgages, and so on. Their names have been published in the mercantile gazettes, as though they were bankrupt, or men dishonest and not to be trusted.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. HOGG.—That is a fact, though gentlemen of the legal profession may not like these facts. If a farmer, as he often does, obtains a loan on his wool or stock, his name is published in these papers, and he is proclaimed amongst his creditors and the commercial community as if he were a dishonest man, or a man who was contemplating bankruptcy because he cannot pay his way. These men are in a most invidious position. They are subjected to heavy fees and rates of interest, which can hardly be kept up, and levied by those whom I cannot call by any other name than usurers or the agents of usurers. I do not wish to see these new bush-settlers placed in that position, therefore I hope this Bill will be the means of saving them from these heavy costs, and of enabling them to obtain what they require in the shape of capital at a reasonable rate, such as they can afford to pay. Sir, I may point out this: that a Royal Commission on Agriculture in England has lately been dealing with the position of the farmers there, and has been endeavouring to get at the root of the disease that has afflicted agriculture in that country; and here is some of the evidence that has recently been taken. On the 23rd April last, I find, a statement was made to that Commission by Sir Massey Lopez, the owner of nine thousand acres in South Devon, and whose land is divided into farms of from fifty to one hundred and fifty acres. Speaking on this subject, he states in his evidence that, "of the remedies suggested, he thought the granting of State loans at low rates of interest would give relief to farmers and their labourers, enabling them to erect cottages and make the necessary improvements." Then, another authority—Mr. Rolandson, land-agent at Dartington—suggested that State loans should be promoted for the benefit of the farmers there. Now, this is the opinion of high authorities in England, and I say that if that method is recommended there it should be adopted here.

What we require to do is to liberate capital. We require to have our waste lands improved; and if we are going to help settlement we must be prepared to come forward and assist the settler, and especially the bush-settler, in the time of his necessity. I have pointed out already that it is as necessary to the young settler in New Zealand as the implements of his trade—as his axe and billhook—that we should advance money on his improvements. If the State comes forward at this critical time it will give nerve to his arm, and will set in motion the whole of that machinery which is almost stagnant in the country. I am speaking, Sir, on behalf of a large constituency not very many miles from Wellington, where there are a great number of new settlers ready and willing to work the land if they only get a little assistance—where there are already creameries and butter-factories, and where settlement is making very rapid progress. I am bound to say that some such scheme as this would be the salvation of the country. But I should like to see it a little less elaborate; I should like to see the amount of money to be borrowed somewhat circumscribed. However, that is a matter of detail, and does not affect the principle of the measure, for I believe that no better measure for the benefit of young settlers has yet been promoted by any Government.

Mr. BUICK.—Sir, I only propose to occupy a very few minutes in discussing this question, because I do not profess to be a financier in the sense that many other members are who have spoken on the subject. My only object in speaking on the Bill at all is to give the Colonial Treasurer an idea of what I think on the subject. I quite agree with the preamble of this Bill when it states that the time has arrived when lower rates of interest should prevail in this colony. We have seen during the last few years that prices for agricultural produce have been very low. Seasons have been bad, and, unless something is done in the direction of easing the money-market and reducing the ruling rates of interest, I am very much afraid the wages of the working-people will suffer. I believe, therefore, that the scheme which the Government has outlined in this Bill is a scheme which shows an honest endeavour and intention of meeting that difficulty. However, while agreeing with the main principle of the thing, I may say that I disagree with a large majority of the details of the scheme. The details as they are set forth in this Bill are essentially different from those set forth in the Financial Statement, and the Bill we are now discussing is an almost entirely different scheme from that which we anticipated when we were speaking on the Budget. As I understood the scheme in the Budget, this money was only to be lent on freehold lands. Under this scheme it seems that it is to be lent on leasehold lands, and not only upon agricultural lands, but also upon town lands. The money was to be borrowed at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and it was to be lent at 5 per cent., according to the Financial Statement. Under this proposal it may be borrowed at 4 per cent., and it is to be lent at 6 per cent.

Mr. WARD.—That is not so. There is the sinking fund.

Mr. BUICK.—Well, 6 per cent. has to be paid. Under this proposal it seems to me that any one who has security to offer—and it is not confined to agricultural land—can obtain these loans. That I perfectly agree with, for I see no reason why this should be made a class benefit at all. I rather, therefore, approve of that phase of the question. It also seems to me that the whole of the fees and expenses are to be paid by the borrower; while under the proposal as embodied in the Financial Statement I understood that the difference of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. between the borrowing and lending rates would cover all expenses. On account of these differences, I cannot see that any one, having promised support to the scheme absolutely when speaking on the Financial Statement, can in any way be held to be bound to support this Bill. What we have to see is, whether these changes will beneficially affect the scheme as now proposed by the Treasurer or not. As I have already stated, Sir, the scheme proposes to lend money on leasehold property. That I do not agree with. It appears to me that it is rather risky to lend sums of money merely upon improvements, and, if it be intended to lend money to settlers occupying leasehold lands, I fail to see how this measure will accomplish any good object, because it is those settlers who are now starting without any capital at all who really require this assistance, and this Bill does not propose to give it to them until they have satisfied the terms of their lease, and then it might be too late. The rates of interest being fixed as they are will, I believe, reduce the usefulness of this scheme, because any one who has a reasonable amount of security to mortgage can at the present time obtain money at as low a rate as will be granted under this Bill. I have already approved the principle of lending money to anybody who has the required amount of security, not merely to farmers, but I entirely disagree with the proposal to lend up to £5,000. What I say is this: that any one who has five thousand pounds' worth of security can at the present time get his money at as low a rate as he can under this Bill. It was never anticipated by this House that any such proposal should be made—at all events, I do not agree to that proposal. Speaking of the question generally, this is one of those things which, to my mind, depend entirely upon administration. The principle of borrowing money at a low rate of interest and lending it out to settlers at a little higher rate of interest is one which no one can take any very great exception to, but that principle might lead this colony into an enormous amount of difficulty through faulty administration. Where

50. I think the weakness in the administration will come in is through giving the Board power to lend to as high as two-thirds of the valuation. The argument of the Colonial Treasurer on this point, that unless we lend up to two-thirds of the valuation the colony will lose securities, is to my mind not at all a good one, because from that I anticipate he is going to make this a money-making affair, and that the colony is going to run after this money-lending business. I take it that the position is this: The colony says, "We are prepared to lend settlers money on certain conditions." Those who want it should come to us, and the colony should not run after them. Therefore, when the Bill is in Committee, if an amendment is proposed to reduce the amount of lending-power to merely one-half, I shall be prepared to support that. I rather approve of the personnel of the Board which is mentioned in the Bill, as being a good Board; but, at the same time, I should have been glad had something more definite been stated as to who the President of the Board is to be. I should like to know whether he is or is not to be an official at the present time in the Civil Service. I should certainly approve of somebody in the Civil Service being appointed to this position, and do not think it should be a position which should be open to any outsider. Upon this head, I rather think the Government are inconsistent. I do not see, from their point of view, why that Board is necessary at all, because, if Parliament is capable of governing fifteen millions' worth of railways, surely it ought to be capable of governing a million and a half of loans. However, the advantages which I see are to be gained by the settlers from this Bill are simply these: The terms upon which they obtain their loans are much easier than those which they can get from private lenders: that is to say, the rates of interest are comparatively low, and they have opportunities of paying off their loans in very small sums. That, I think, is an immense advantage, because a borrower may often have £5 or £10 put away when he would not have £20 or £50; and in that way he will have an opportunity of gradually reducing his loan. The expenses which are attached to these loans are also small. Therefore large sums would not be swallowed up in lawyers' expenses, as they are at the present time. Briefly recapitulating, I object to leaseholders being included in this measure. I object, also, to power being taken to raise money at 4 per cent. If it cannot be raised at a lower percentage than that, then I think it ought not to be raised at all. I object, also, to the Board having power to lend up to an amount as high as £5,000. I also object to the two-thirds valuation, and I approve of one-half valuation as being sufficient to lend up to. I also think that the House ought to have power to vote the money required for loans every year, and that we ought not to be called upon to grant the whole amount in one sum, as we are doing now. However, most of my objections are Committee objections. Just by way of conclusion, I would merely again remind the Treasurer that I approve of a measure of this kind; and, if he will confine this measure to freeholders, with a 50-per-cent. valuation, and provide that no sum lent shall be higher than £500, and that the money shall not be borrowed at a higher rate than 3½ per cent., I shall have much pleasure in supporting the measure. Those are the directions in which I shall vote in Committee; and then I shall have to consider what position I shall take up on the third reading of the Bill if these amendments are not carried.

Mr. WILLIS.—I listened with some surprise to the remarks which fell from the honourable member for Wairau. He said he would agree to this Bill if the leaseholders were left out, and if the benefits of the measure were confined entirely to freeholders. I say the case should be reversed. It is the leaseholders that I, for one, would like to see assisted. I was one of a deputation who waited on the Minister last session and urged that a measure should be brought forward to give assistance to the struggling settlers who were taking up land from the Government, and who, when they have made their small improvements, find their funds exhausted, and are not in a position to continue their work. That is the class which I wish to see assisted, and that is the class which the honourable member for Wairau says he would be sorry to see assisted.

Mr. BUICK.—Not sorry.

Mr. WILLIS.—Well, the honourable gentleman says that is the class he is not prepared to see assisted. Provision is made in this Bill that lessees shall only obtain one-half, in contradistinction to the two-thirds which can be obtained upon freehold. I think the same concession should be made to holders of Government leases. My reason for this is that the Government themselves hold the security, and they can take proper provision to see, before the money is advanced, that the improvements have been made. In one of the clauses it is stated money is not to be advanced to these settlers before the whole of their improvements are carried out. By the time the improvements are effected I should say that those settlers would not require much assistance from the Government, as they would have overcome most of their difficulties. I listened with very great pleasure indeed to the remarks of the honourable member for Masterton. I may say that he expressed to a very large extent the views which I hold. I do not agree with the large sum of money that is proposed to be borrowed now. I do not agree with the large sums up to £5,000 which are to be lent. I think we should commence with smaller amounts, and find out how the system answers, before we borrow large sums of money which are to be advanced to settlers who, I am quite satisfied, will not require the money the same as the small settlers do. If the amount had been made smaller I think it would have given more satisfaction to the House. It seems as if we were going too far, without due reflection as to what we are doing, and therefore I hope an alteration will be made in Committee as to the amount that is to be borrowed for the purpose of making these advances. I am satisfied, myself, that the scheme in the main is a good one, but I think it will require a very large amount of consideration in Committee before the measure is finally passed.

The lessees are those in whom I am most interested; it is the struggling settler whom I want to see put on his feet; and if this system is carried out of assisting this class of people I am quite satisfied much benefit will be conferred on these men, and that the colony as a whole will also be benefited.

Mr. MEREDITH.—In common with the honourable member for Wanganui, I have to express my surprise at the attitude taken up on the question of cheap money to settlers by my honourable friend the member for Wairau. That honourable gentleman represents a large number of small struggling settlers. I thought that his sympathy would have been with those struggling settlers. I thought, in common with myself, he would have been too happy to assist the Government to enable these settlers to have the benefit of the provisions of this Bill. I look upon the Bill as a very good one, and I am prepared to support it, because I believe it will afford relief to a class of settlers who are entitled to every consideration at the hands of the Government. I believe the money lent out will bring about a state of prosperity in the country such as we have not witnessed for years. I must compliment the Colonial Treasurer on the speech he made on the second reading of the Bill. That speech was of such a nature that there cannot be any misunderstanding on the part of the country respecting the provisions of the Bill. So far, the criticism on the Bill has been harmless. Indeed the criticism, if carefully analysed, amounts to very little. During the second session of 1891 I brought under the notice of the House the question of lending cheap money to struggling settlers. The late Mr. Ballance gave me a favourable answer. The idea then in Mr. Ballance's mind was that a scheme of this kind, or something like it, should be submitted to the House for its consideration. I am pleased to notice that the idea of the late Mr. Ballance is being worked out in this Bill. In this respect the mantle of Elijah has fallen on Elisha. Honourable members are aware that a very small margin of profit has been made out of agricultural farming for the last eight or ten years, and much less during the past three years, and, instead of a margin of profit during the past year, there has been a loss to the producer. The price of grain has fallen so low that there is very little encouragement for farmers. When wheat was bringing 5s. a bushel persons paid 7 per cent. for their mortgages; and now, although the price of wheat has fallen to 2s., they pay about the same percentage for the use of money. Although the price of all kinds of produce has depreciated, the interest upon mortgages has not gone down in the same proportion. No doubt, Sir, this measure must of necessity receive opposition—opposition in the House and opposition out of the House. It will receive opposition in consequence of the provisions of the Bill, because, if this Bill is carried into effect, it will take away to a large extent the occupation of a section of the community. It will interfere with gentlemen of the legal profession in the execution of deeds, mortgages, and so forth; it will interfere with the lenders of money at 10 and 20 per cent.; it will interfere with land-dealers; and, consequently, of necessity, a number of persons will be affected by the provisions of this Bill so as to excite a considerable amount of opposition. If the provisions of this Bill will have a tendency in the direction of bringing down the interest on money it will effect a great deal of good. The Bill itself is calculated to do that, but the indirect influences of the Bill are calculated to effect a great deal of good. Now, Sir, it has been pointed out by some honourable members that this Bill is likely to interfere with private enterprise. Well, I believe it will interfere with private enterprise, and I think it is a proper thing that this Bill should interfere with private enterprise. The rates of interest that have been charged in some instances for money accommodation have been of a most usurious and exorbitant nature. I have had a number of communications from my constituents, who feel interested very largely in this measure; and I will point out one or two bad cases of fleecing the innocents. A struggling settler in the Canterbury Province, some fifteen or eighteen months ago, wanted accommodation to the extent of £100. He applied to the Christchurch Finance Company. The security he was willing to offer was an acceptance backed by a substantial settler, and therefore the security was undoubted. The Finance Company was quite willing to advance the money on these conditions: He was to pay at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. He signed a bill in the first place for £100, plus £10 interest, plus £5 commission: total £115. At the end of three months the bill was renewed for £115, plus 5 per cent. commission and 2½ per cent. discount. At the end of six months he had the bill renewed—£123 2s. 6d., plus 5 per cent. commission and 2½ per cent. discount—so that at the end of the year for £100 he had to pay to this company 42½ per cent., or a total of £142 5s. Honourable members may remark that this man was a fool.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Did he pay the bill?

Mr. MEREDITH.—He met the bill, Sir. If this man was a fool, I ask, what about the company which charged such a usurious rate of interest? I consider the conduct of the company was the most barefaced robbery; it was the commercial morality of the highwayman. On the rate of profits made by companies doing business in this colony I might refer to an extract taken from a report of a meeting held in London. This is taken from the Home News of the 22nd July, 1892. It is a report of the New Zealand Trust and Loan Company, doing business in New Zealand, and having one of its branches, if not its headquarters, in the City of Christchurch. Sir Charles Clifford was in the chair; and the report runs thus:—

"The Chairman, in returning thanks, said he only trusted that time would bring back to New Zealand its old prosperity. It would afford the directors very great satisfaction to be able to return to their old 20 per cent., and he thought that the best thing they could do would be to impress upon Mr. Bowen, when he went back, to strongly urge upon the people and the Government of New Zealand to do all that lay in their power to bring the country back to its old state of prosperity."

Now, the old state of prosperity was that this company, doing business in the colony, out of the bone and muscle and lifeblood of the people, was in a position to declare to its shareholders 20 per cent. of profits on their business. In the face of these facts, how can honourable members advocate that private enterprise should be encouraged? If that is the sort of private enterprise that is to be encouraged in this country, then I say, Heaven help New Zealand! Now I come to the provisions of the Bill. The Bill provides for loans to be advanced in amounts from £50 to £5,000. I emphatically say that £5,000 is too large a sum. I would reduce that sum to, say, £3,000, or I am even prepared to accept of £1,000 as the maximum. I do not object to the security extending over freehold, lease-in-perpetuity, and perpetual-lease land. I consider the security is good. I am in favour of advances being made to the extent of two-thirds of the assessed value of the security, on the following grounds: When the provisions of this Bill were first discussed in the local papers, nothing was said about the arrangements made in the Bill for the extinction of the principal by 1 per cent. of a sinking fund. This is one of the best features of the Bill—the 1 per cent. that is provided to extinguish the loan. My honourable friend the member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) stated that few settlers would take up money on the conditions laid down by the Bill, because to finally extinguish the debt it was necessary to continue for thirty-six and a half years; but I would remind the honourable gentleman that in other countries settlers have taken up money from Governments, and very gladly too, on repayments which have extended over a greater number of years. The British Government has advanced to farmers in Ireland money on which they paid 4 per cent., so that at the end of forty-nine years the principal was extinguished: so that no possible objection can be raised against the time extending over thirty-six and a half years. The advantage of the 1 per cent. to extinguish the principal is this: that, after settlers have had the use of the money for ten years, for every £100 loan they have paid off £12 15s. 2d. of the principal; for every £1,000, £127 14s. 2d.; and for every £3,000, £383 2s. 6d. We can easily picture to ourselves the feeling of satisfaction that characterizes the honest settler on finding that after having paid 6 per cent. interest he has the pleasure to know that he has paid so much towards extinguishing the total amount of the mortgage. At present the farmer is paying 6 per cent. and after having paid that for ten years there is no diminution whatever of the principal: so that I look upon this arrangement as one of the best features of the Bill—

a feature that I most heartily approve. If the provision of 1 per cent. to extinguish the principle had not been made, then I should consider that it would have been dangerous to advance to the extent of two-thirds of the value of the security; but since that provision has been made it has removed the serious apprehension I had respecting the advances being made to the extent mentioned in the Bill. The charges for deeds and valuations are very reasonable, and this is a feature that must commend itself to every person requiring a loan. The charge for valuation for a loan of £1,000 is only 21s.; for £3,000, 42s.; the total cost of a deed amounts to 35s.; while under ordinary circumstances a settler would have to pay to any ordinary legal firm on a loan of £3,000 from ten to fifteen guineas. There is a great difference here. There is one feature in the Bill that I rather take exception to, and that is, that when the interest becomes due fourteen days' grace only is allowed. That is a mistake. It should be extended to at least twenty-eight days' before the Government would be able to foreclose. Under this Bill, no doubt, Government would have a number of individuals applying for various positions connected with the administration of the Act, and I would say to the Government it is necessary to be very careful to keep the expenses down to a minimum; otherwise the expenses of management will create a bad feeling in the country, and render the scheme unpopular. I should be well satisfied if the Bill proposed only to raise half a million, or a million at most, instead of one and a half millions; furthermore, I do not think it would be wise that the country should be committed to a continuous yearly loan of a million and a half. I think if a million and a half are raised—that is, if the House agrees to it—we should wait and see how the scheme will work out before the country is committed to a larger loan. We should be cautious, and have no reckless borrowing.

7.30. Mr. BELL.—Mr. Speaker, judging from some of the speeches I have heard in this debate, I should imagine some honourable members think this is a new experiment—the borrowing of money in London at a low rate of interest to lend in New Zealand at higher rates. Sir, it is not a new experiment. Institution after institution in this colony has tried this method of finance; and with one or two exceptions—and these exceptions only because of very careful and skilful management which those particular companies have been enabled to engage and employ—with those exceptions the result has invariably been disastrous. We have company after company which has borrowed money on low interest in London and lent it here at a higher rate, and company after company and individual after individual has been ruined through it. You have now the "globo assets," and the history of the Bank of New Zealand. What are the "globo assets"? The remnant left of reinvestments. And, coming to individuals, the same story is told by the Christchurch firm of

Harper and Co. And the reason is this: The interest in London has to be paid regularly and on the nail, whatever may be the course of business in the colony, while the interest in this country is not paid unless the seasons are favourable, and unless the circumstances of the colony are prosperous. And when you have to pay your interest regularly, and have to wait for the payment of your interest here, then, Sir, the process, unless the condition of the country continues to be prosperous, has been in the past, and will be in the future, invariably ruinous. In the management of companies which have not been subjected to any influence, and where no pressure could be brought to bear, the individual has had to suffer if he could not pay; and, if that is the experience of companies, what is likely to be the experience of the State? Sir, many in this country who have had the opportunity of obtaining money at a low rate of interest have examined and considered whether that is likely to be a profitable method of business, and all who have exercised sound judgment have rejected it, though it suggested on the face of it the advantages suggested by the honourable gentleman. Sir, the country may well engage in many forms of business which heretofore have been left to individual enterprise. There is nobody more ready to recognise this than myself, or more willing to encourage society, wherever monopoly exists, to replace individual effort than myself. But there is no business more difficult, none more dangerous, than that of money-lending. There is no business in the world that depends so much upon special individual skill; and the possibility of the retention of this particular class of skill by the colony is an essential to the success of any such proposal as the present. In every one of the measures which have been referred to by the honourable member for Ellesmere, who has evidently studied and read the subject, in every one of the schemes which are known under the generic name of crédits fonciers, the first feature of such schemes is that the capital shall be repayable with the interest for a term of years, so that the mortgagor regularly provides annually his sinking fund. The honourable gentleman approves of a sinking fund in the case of individual loans; and why should it be specially admirable in the case of individuals when it is not a thing to be considered in the case of a country?

Mr. WARD.—There is finality.

Mr. BELL.—There is no finality in the land on which the loan is secured. As the honourable member for Inangahua will tell the honourable gentleman, whatever happens to the individual the land is there; it continues to exist—the thing over which the security is to remain. It is the land the honourable gentleman looks to, and not the individual, unless he is going to enter on such transactions as were suggested to him by the honourable member for Ashley—unless it is that bill-discounting is part of the scheme of the honourable gentleman. I think the principle is admirable; I am insisting that it should be applied to the country; but I am afraid the honourable gentleman is not consistent. What is going to become of the sinking fund under this Bill? Why, Sir, I read this Bill, and I find in section 65 that these aggregations of funds which are to accrue in the hands of the Public Trustee—that is, the moneys which are the redemption of the loan to the individual—are not to be applied in the reduction of the moneys which are borrowed in London, but they are to be disposed of as the Governor in Council may direct. Talk of sly borrowing! Why, the money is obtained twice over. It is borrowed in London and lent to the individual mortgagors here, and then the aggregate of the sinking fund is invested by the Public Trustee; and then the honourable gentleman coolly puts in the measure that he may dispose of such moneys, with the interest, as the Governor in Council may from time to time direct—from time to time, Sir, I suppose, on roads and bridges and public works, and on things which the honourable gentleman declared it is wrong and corrupt to borrow for. It is quite a different thing the honourable gentleman is now proposing from the borrowing of the past, we are told. That was for public works; and that was quite wrong, he says, and gave no security to the country. But the borrowing of the present is a borrowing where money is lent to the settler, and is to be repaid, principal and interest, by the settler; and the interest, as it comes in, will, no doubt, be remitted to London and paid, but as the principal comes back it goes into the pockets of the Treasurer. Where is the finality to this scheme? Million and a half after million and a half comes pouring into the country from London; it is repaid by the borrowers, and is not returned to London to repay the amount that was borrowed, but is to be disposed of as the Governor in Council may from time to time direct. That, Sir, is finance. Does the honourable gentleman, in calculating his expenses, know that the expense of lending and collecting £100 is the same as the expense of lending and collecting £5,000? If his money is distributed in small sums to small settlers the expense will therefore be greater than he submitted, or than he anticipates. Take the case of insurance companies. The honourable gentleman knows perfectly well that the reason why they place a high limit for policies, below which they will not insure, is that every policy, whatever may be its amount, carries with it exactly the same cost for collection and for the ordinary expenses of the staff. And if the honourable gentleman has his millions distributed among a few, if he has them, as the companies have, distributed among a small class, the expenses will be but small; but if he has them distributed—as, if they are to be of any use at all, they must be distributed—widely in small sums, the expenses will be far greater than anything he has led the House to imagine. I know something about this matter, and so does the honourable gentleman. I ask him in reply to say whether I am not saying what is the experience of every one having any knowledge of mortgage business. Is it not the case that the expenses of collecting and dealing with these small loans is something enormously larger than anything which any company has ever engaged upon up to the present time?

Mr. MACKINTOSH.—The collection of the land-tax does not cost much.

Mr. BELL.—Does the honourable gentleman think that the collection of this interest will be the same as that of the land-tax? The honourable gentleman is a very confiding individual if he believes that. He has had very little experience of such matters if he thinks that. The honourable gentleman told us that the provision in clause 31 of 4 per cent. as the rate of interest at which the money is to be borrowed was only inserted because he might have to borrow at short dates in anticipation of an issue, and to hypothecate the debentures. This is a very lame explanation. If he looks at the same section, at the end, he will see a provision that he may hypothecate at a higher rate to get money. If 4 per cent. is the sum fixed at which the Colonial Treasurer finances, 4 per cent. and not 3½ per cent. is the sum between which and 5 per cent. we must calculate our margin; and when he talks of 1½ per cent. margin—whatever may be said about the figures suggested by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie), and I believe them to be sound and correct—I say here we have on the face of the Bill the statement of the Colonial Treasurer that he does not expect he can fix a limit for the satisfaction of the House lower than 4 per cent. It is said this is going to interfere with money-lenders and lawyers. Does the honourable gentleman believe it will? Does he think this is the kind of business that is done as a general rule among money-lenders and lawyers? It is that done by those of whom the honourable member for Ashley spoke to the House. These small loans are not undertaken by money-lenders or by lawyers. It is the large class of business, with which the honourable gentleman does not seek to interfere, which constitutes the monopoly. Hundreds of people are lending these small sums. Does the honourable gentleman suppose the people called capitalists lend in sums of £200, £300, and £400? The thing is ridiculous.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE.—What about the Harpers' firm?

Mr. BELL.—The honourable gentleman does not know what he is talking about. An examination of the business of the Harpers' firm would bear out exactly what I say. They did not deal with people in £200 and £300. They were lending large sums of money. Does the honourable gentleman suppose that the Colonial Treasurer would interfere with the Harpers' firm? If the honourable gentleman had been here he would have heard what I said in relation to the Harpers' firm; and I tell the honourable gentleman this because, when I referred to the Harpers' firm, I said that this system of finance was exactly the same—we are borrowing at a high rate in London in order to lend the money out in New Zealand at a low rate, and that is what broke the firm of Harper and Co.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It was personal extravagance.

Mr. BELL.—The honourable member for Palmerston does not know what he is talking about; honourable gentlemen are entitled to their opinions, but they do not know anything about it. I may here add that the Treasurer has missed one part of the necessary Act—that is, the question of staffs and offices. That is a point which has been considered before in relation to the matter of District Solicitors. The salary the honourable gentleman named, as he knows, cannot possibly cover the expense of the staff and offices which must necessarily be incurred by them; therefore he must add these items to the expense. As to the kind of solicitor who must be appointed: the honourable gentleman knows that the man fit to undertake the Government business must be a man of considerable qualifications; otherwise on every important Government matter it will mean that a more expensive man will have to be employed. I do know something about this, having acted as legal adviser to the Government for many years, and having been in the confidence both of the honourable gentleman and of his predecessors. With regard to the question of lending money on the freehold value, I think what the Colonial Treasurer said upon that subject is to a large extent sound, and I do not think that he will be able to compete with the ordinary money-lender unless the House allows him to lend up to two-thirds of the value. I think he will find very little business in this direction excepting the lending on leaseholds. Of course, if he likes that business, he is not likely to have any competition. As regards this proposal, the two-thirds freehold value is safe enough—that is, if you can depend upon your valuation. The whole difficulty is this: It is very easy to say you can depend upon the valuations of experienced Valuers in regard to money-lending in the country; but, as against that statement, there are only a very few men in the country whose estimate is ever accepted without any question. I may mention to the House that there is one gentleman in the South Island who is employed by various companies, such as the Australian Mutual Provident, and who is sent from one end of the Island to another, and even to the North Island,—and he is employed by individuals as well as by companies,—because they can trust him. But there is the greatest possible difficulty in finding a gentleman with the two qualifications I name—I am speaking of their capacity as valuers and their integrity and honour—I repeat that it is difficult to obtain a man with these two qualifications combined. It is a most difficult combination, for you have to get a man who is able to judge land, and who is capable of estimating the possibility of a depreciation in the value of it, and who is well known to be honest, and can be trusted not to be influenced by the borrower. The danger is so great that there are many who refuse to enter upon it, and who prefer to accept the lower rate of interest which is obtainable from bank deposits rather than to depend upon a business which involves this factor, which they cannot determine. The Colonial Treasurer knows just as well as I do this difficulty—a man having had the business experience of the honourable gentleman, who is carrying on such a business as he does outside this House—I say that he cannot but know what is the common experience in this direction. And he must know also that the value of land is constantly fluctuating in this country. Taking one instance: land which has had up to this time a grain-value—that is, because it will grow so many bushels of wheat—has no longer that value now. It has a grass-value now, and no more. Take another instance, the value of certain parts of the North Island which have an exceptional value for dairying purposes. That value may break down if the development of the new dairy industry should suffer a check, and land now valued at £10 and £15 an acre will be reduced to its grazing-value of £3 and £4. All those things the country will have to pay for; all this fluctuation the country will have to pay for; and it will have to face this regularly every six months, when it must remit its interest to London. When the seasons are bad, when the honourable gentleman's colleague's rents are not paid,—and at times the Minister of Lands does find his rents are not paid,—then the honourable gentleman will find that his interest is not paid. The common experience of this country is not a happy one in this respect; and let me tell the honourable gentleman this: that in those seasons, in those bad times, he will be unable to realise his securities, for in those seasons when interest is not paid land is unsaleable; but all this time he will have to remit his interest to London, and he will find that he will have to make up the deficiency from revenue. The honourable gentleman will probably tell me that he will have, or ought to have, a considerable sum in hand—namely, the one-tenth Assurance Fund—and will be able to use it for this purpose; but I think my honourable friend will find that that amount will be tied up in Treasury bills. Of course, he says that a Treasury bill is as good as gold; the honourable gentleman has only got to put his name to it, and the seal of the colony, and anybody will take it for gold. I hope that is so, and I hope it may long remain so; but the time must come when there will be lean years, and in the lean years there will be a wide deficiency; but the interest must be provided whatever the season is. The experience of mortgagees is just the same as the experience of the Minister of Lands. You have to give up something, and carry on a “hanging gale,” for you cannot get out of these people any more money than the year's income will enable them to pay, and I am afraid the House would not allow the Minister to try to do so. My honourable friend will have to take the part of the usurers—the bloodthirsty usurers whom he so graphically describes as sucking the lifeblood out of the community. Is the honourable gentleman going to take the place of those men? If the poor man cannot pay his rent, is he going to take him by the throat and say to him, “Pay me what thou owest or go out of my land”? I think, if he wanted to do that, the House would interfere. I say that there is no sound finance in this scheme, and I am very sorry that the time-limit prevents me from saying one-half of what I intended to say upon this matter. It is quite impossible for me, in speaking upon a measure of this kind under the existing time-limit, to say one-half of what I wish to bring before the House, and I hope the time will come when we shall be able to get rid of this absurd time-limit. I say that a man who wishes to adduce arguments that ought to be addressed to the country should not find himself in the difficulty I am now placed in. However, I desire to read as much as this time-limit will permit me from an extract from the Scotsman of the 27th July, 1894. The reason I read this extract is that the whole finance of this scheme depends upon borrowing at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. In that paper we find this stated—

Mr. WARD.—What date?

Mr. BELL.—27th July—after the delivery of the Financial Statement, and before any of these wicked Tories could have written Home.

Mr. WARD.—I will give you one of a later date.

Mr. BELL.—This is what it says:—

“Financial Affairs in New Zealand.”

“The course of financial affairs in New Zealand will require to be closely watched by British investors. For some years past the Government have made it their constant boast that, in consequence of the flourishing condition of the colony, it had become independent of the London money-market. Thus, in his Financial Statement, made on the 16th June, 1891, the Premier said, ‘Borrowing in the English market is to cease; but it is proposed to raise a local loan to open up land, repayable from the proceeds of the land.’ In May, 1892, the Premier told the representative of a local journal that ‘the Government would endeavour to make the colony independent of the London money-market,’ adding, that ‘with the established local credit this was now becoming possible.’ On the 4th July, 1893, the Hon. J. G. Ward, Colonial Treasurer, in presenting his Financial Statement, said that ‘no attempt would be made to place a loan on the London money-market,’ and that a ‘self-reliant policy is to be continued, no borrowing being necessary’; while, as recently as the 27th of February of this year, the Hon. R. J. Seddon, the Premier, wound up a speech, delivered at Foxton (New Zealand), with the announcement that ‘there was plenty of money to meet the requirements of the colony, and further borrowing was unnecessary.’ Within six months of this last reassuring official utterance comes the news that the Government propose to raise £2,500,000—£1,500,000 in $3\frac{1}{2}$ -per-cent. inscribed stock, and the balance in ‘Colonial

Consols' bearing a maximum rate of 4 per cent., and inscribable at 'any post-office.' The former portion is needed to make advances to settlers on the security of their land at 5 per cent. The object of the other portion is not mentioned. Moreover, £750,000 is wanted to purchase more land from the Natives. But this is not all. Foreign insurance companies are to make 'large deposits with public trustees'—otherwise, the Government. That will supply further funds. The private savings-banks are to be merged, lock, stock, and barrel, into the Post-Office Savings-bank, which means still more cash to play with in the socialistic game of financing the squatters, dealings with whom have already landed the banks in so much trouble. This is all of a piece with the guaranteeing of the £2,000,000 of fresh capital of the Bank of New Zealand. The last-mentioned operation involved a mystery which has not yet been fathomed. When the news first reached London we pointed to the total inadequacy of the official explanation of the affair, and laid stress upon the statement, made by Mr. Ward in presenting the Bank Stock Guarantee Bill to Parliament, that the guarantee was needed to avert a grave 'disaster.' We have, so far, refrained from throwing light upon this matter, because it was not desirable to do anything in the least degree calculated to jeopardize the success of an issue which had confessedly saved the colony, and, for that matter, the whole of the Australian Colonies, from a fresh and terrible crisis. The usually-accepted explanation had been that the Bank of New Zealand was crippled by a lock-up of a large portion of its capital in the shares of the New Zealand Estates Company, and that the revenue previously derived from the latter would fail this year, and prevent the bank from paying a dividend in August, an event that would gravely weaken its credit.

"The actual facts were very different, and much more serious. The truth is that the bank has for a long while past been financing the Estates Company, and has in this manner locked up £600,000 of its capital in that concern. It has been making advances to it of 5 per cent., and, when the fact became known to the debenture-holders in the Estates Company, these insisted upon the bank's position in relation to their own as first-charge creditors being clearly defined. This resulted, as we understand the case, in the bank's advances being made a sort of second charge on the assets of the Estates Company. How much of the £600,000 may have been used for the improvement or up-keep of the latter's property, and to what extent it may have enabled the company to provide for its debenture interest, are questions not worth while inquiring into. The main and all-important point is that the bank, having got out of bad business in 1890 by converting its unrealisable assets into the ordinary and preference shares of the Estates Company and the cash proceeds of the issue of the latter's debentures, has reverted to its old vicious system, and put back a large portion of what it has with difficulty and at great sacrifice succeeded in releasing into the same unrealisable assets, with this further disadvantage: that, whereas the assets were formerly its sole property, it has now only a second charge on them. The recklessness of such financing is almost incredible. Not a single lesson in ordinary banking prudence has been learned from the calamities of the recent past. If this persistence in the old evil course concerned the Colony alone we could well let the thing go with a mere passing reference. But it happens that there are upwards of £1,200,000 of British deposits at stake in this bank. The New Zealand Government have by their interposition, and by pledging the credit of the colony, saved the bank, and we are asked to believe that by means of a strict Government supervision of its business in the future all will be well. Let us hope that it will prove so. On the other hand, the Government are themselves committed on a huge scale to the very class of business which, for the second time, landed the bank on the edge of a precipice. The whole affair must present itself to the most ordinary intelligence as a financial muddle of the worst kind. In the event of anything happening to the Estates Company, will the Government take that concern in hand also? There is talk of setting up a State bank. Does this mean that the Government are going to have two big institutions on their hands?"—Is this a prophet, who asks so pertinent a question?—"or do they purpose using the Bank of New Zealand as the basis for such a State institution? The Government are about to raise £2,500,000 to carry on a land-jobbing business, and have made themselves responsible for £2,000,000. The credit of the colony is therefore to be pledged to the tune of £4,500,000 in support of this land-jobbing enterprise. Where and when is the process to stop? British capitalists and investors, both small and large, have an enormous stake in the colony, and it is quite time that the Government should be warned, before it is too late, that if they go on in the course they have now marked out for themselves they will wreck their credit, and the colony itself into the bargain. The latter cannot bear the burdens which are being imposed upon it, and if these continue to be piled up in the way proposed a breakdown will sooner or later be inevitable."

8.0. Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—Sir, members of the profession of which the honourable gentleman is so distinguished a member usually fortify their arguments and their position by authorities. It is greatly to be regretted that upon this occasion he has had to go so far for his authority, and that the authority, when quoted, should be so weak. I have no doubt that the quotation the honourable gentleman has given us was merely a réchauffé of what has appeared in the Conservative journals of New Zealand, and in what the honourable gentleman read honourable members will probably recognise an echo of a good many speeches made in this House in days past. Sir, the honourable gentleman, in the course of the speech which he has just delivered, drew a pathetic picture of the interest on the advances to settlers being pocketed by the Treasurer; but does he suppose that the Parliament of New Zealand is going to be so mad in future years as to allow the Treasurer to pocket the interest derived from the State mortgages, or that, as he supposed, the people of New Zealand will allow themselves to be taxed for that purpose? Does he suppose that the future policy of the country will be placed on such a footing as that? The whole criticism of the honourable gentleman in connection with the cheap-money scheme, if it applies at all, applies to all money-lending institutions; and does he mean to say that the whole of the money-lending companies are going to retire from business altogether? Yet, if his argument is worth anything at all, it applies to all money-lending institutions in the colony. According to the honourable gentleman, no securities will be good, and no competent valuers are to be obtained; and surely, therefore, not only the State but everybody else should retire from the money-lending business. Then, he drew another picture, of the impossibility of the interest being remitted in lean years; but I would ask him, how is the land-tax and the general taxation of the colony obtained from year to year? Does it not flow in the ordinary course? And so, in the ordinary course, the interest on the moneys obtained under this scheme will flow into the coffers of the State. The honourable gentleman stated also, in pathetic terms, the experience of certain persons in regard to mortgages and mortgagees; and if we accepted his picture one would suppose a mortgagee is a tender-hearted kind of man who never thinks of placing the slightest pressure on the mortgagor, but takes the good with the bad—who accepts the position and hands over to the mortgagor the whole of the interest and, I was going to say, the free use of the capital. But that is not the experience of the people of New Zealand. The experience of the people of New Zealand has been that the mortgagee is a man who will take every farthing of interest that is owing to him, and who, when he cannot get his interest, will keep the mortgagor in possession until somebody else comes along with money. Then No. 1 goes out, and No. 2 comes in, only to wait his turn. That is the position. Then, the honourable gentleman went on to refer to the Government being unable to obtain their rent from leaseholders, or the persons holding State land, and he asked if the Colonial Treasurer would be so bloodthirsty as to drive these people from their homes. The answer is, that the object of this Bill is to place those people on such a footing as will enable them to meet their interest when it comes due, and to become their own masters; and I venture to say that while the Bill proceeds in that direction the cheap-money policy of the Government should command the support of the people, and certainly of every member of the Liberal party. In saying this, let me be clear. I do not bind myself to the whole of the details of this Bill. Before I sit down I shall make a few suggestions,—not in a hostile sense, because I regard this, next to the land-legislation of the Government, as the greatest effort they have made. We have discussed the Land for Settlements and other Bills, but I venture to think the session of 1894, and the whole of this Parliament, will be known in the history of New Zealand not so much for the land-legislation as for the policy of cheap money inaugurated by the present Government. I am glad, Sir, that in this matter the Government have shown they have the courage of their convictions. I am glad, in the policy they are bringing before the country, they have taken a firm stand in regard to land-legislation. I am equally glad they are tackling the value and the price of money, which must be the complement of land-legislation. One, I say, is the complement of the other. What is the condition with regard to this matter of the price of money? Honourable gentlemen who have spoken on the other side have recognised the fact that foreign money-lending companies occupy the premier place in connection with the private finance of the country. And what does that mean? It means that the capital which our settlers are using reaches them through the hands of foreign companies; it means that these companies remit the interest which our settlers pay to their shareholders at Home. They have built palatial buildings throughout New Zealand: the whole of the interest on these is paid from profit on mortgages. Therefore, while we have heard something throughout this debate of the iron heel of the bondholder, I feel that the iron heel is worn by these companies; and it is the business of the people of New Zealand to try to shield themselves from the oppression, I may say, which is going on, and which has been going on for many years in this country. The honourable the leader of the Opposition twitted the Government party with not speaking on this question, but his criticism on the measure must certainly be discounted by the fact that on a previous occasion he not only accepted the principle of this measure but proposed a loan for the same purpose of something like twenty millions. Then, the honourable member for Patea alleged that capital was reluctant; yet the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) admitted that only under the present Government have the New Zealand $3\frac{1}{2}$ -per-cent. stocks ever reached par. He said the first time that happened was during last year. That is a triumphant vindication of the policy of the Liberal party and of the administration of the present Government. Now, Sir, it has been alleged throughout this debate that there is no chance of our $3\frac{1}{2}$ -per-cent. stock bringing par value, and the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) repeated this remark to-day. I should like to draw his attention to the report in the London Times of the 9th August, in which it was stated that our stocks stood at 100 $\frac{1}{2}$. In connection with the price of our stocks on the London market, we must consider the important fact that for a long time our debentures stood higher than the debentures of any of the other colonies. But only a certain amount was open for investment in Australian stocks, and as soon as New South Wales debentures made an upward move it was natural there should be a weakening of New Zealand stock. At the date stated our debentures stood $\frac{1}{2}$ above those of New South Wales, 4 per cent. above Queensland, and so on in connection with the other colonies. Now, I could quite understand the criticism of the honourable gentlemen as to the improbability of the Government obtaining money at par were the Colonial Treasurer about to place the whole million and a half on the market at once. But we have the assurance of the Government that only so much money will be raised as is required, and we may feel sure that the Stock Agents at Home will place the money on the market at those times at which the market is favourable. And, supposing we allow $\frac{1}{2}$ or 1 per cent. for raising the loan, if our stocks bring 101 or 102—at present they are at 108—that will not only pay brokerage, commission, and other charges, but will leave a handsome profit to go towards working the cheap-money scheme. The senior member for Wellington City attacked the cheap-money scheme on its general principles. He did so, apparently, from the point of view of one connected with money-lending institutions. The remark he made was this: that those who had had experience of loan companies raising money in London—I have no doubt he has had experience in that direction, and therefore it is not to be wondered at that he should regard this from a critical, I was going to say from an interested, point of view. The honourable gentleman, in the course of his speech, quoted a couplet of Pope's—the honourable gentleman was going far back, namely, one hundred and sixty years—for his authority on paper money. He quoted these lines:—

Best paper credit! last and best supply,
That lends corruption faster wings to fly.

It was certainly extraordinary to go so far back as a hundred and sixty or a hundred and seventy years for a quotation on the principle of this Bill. I am in the habit of looking over Pope, and I would refer the honourable gentleman to a couple of lines which appear earlier in the same poem. They are,—

What Nature wants, commodious gold bestows;
Tis thus we eat the bread another sows.

So that if the honourable gentleman can find one quotation from Pope against the cheap-money scheme it is quite possible to find one representing the position of the usurious money-lender whom the Government is attempting to efface from this colony. The honourable gentleman who has just sat down pointed to the fact that in the Bill there was a clause which provided that for temporary advances the Government could hypothecate the moneys that would come in, and he pointed out that there was no limit in connection with the interest payable on that hypothecation. But does he think that any Colonial Treasurer would hypothecate his bonds or debentures at an excessive price?

Mr. BELL.—Will the honourable gentlemen allow me to explain? The honourable gentleman is labouring under a mistake. The Colonial Treasurer said the reason the 4 per cent. was inserted was that he might require to borrow for short dates. I pointed out that it was not so. Power to borrow at short dates is given in the later part of the same clause.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—And later on it is provided that, in case of temporary advances being required, no limit should be fixed. I quite agree that that provision should be there, because, if the Colonial Treasurer is not fit to be intrusted with the arranging of interest on temporary advances, and if his judgment is not such as to be relied upon for that purpose, then he certainly is not fit to preside over the finances of this colony.

Mr. BELL.—I do not object to that clause at all.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—During this debate it has been declared by the Opposition that this is a dangerous scheme to carry into effect. The honourable member for Wellington City pictured the losses that were likely to arise on the mortgages, and the cost of working this scheme; but the same criticism could be applied to any scheme at its inception, and for honourable members to insist, as honourable members on the other side of the House have insisted time after time, that, because this scheme may be open to criticism, therefore there should be no scheme at all is, in my humble opinion, entirely absurd. We must give the Government credit, in connection with matters of this kind—whatever Government is in power—I do not suppose this Government will always be in power: there will be a change some time—but whatever Government is in power, we must give them credit for the exercise of business capacity in connection with these matters, and any attempt to lay down a rule of thumb would be of no avail, as no Government could be expected to work under it. Then, it has been declared, in connection with this matter, that the proposed scheme will result in injuring the industries of the colony. The senior member for Wellington City said that the Government would drive out most of the loan companies, and get a great part of the capital of the country into the hands of the State—that this money would necessarily be withdrawn from industrial enterprises, and therefore that the effect would be to cripple colonial manufactures. Now, that is an exceedingly short-sighted view of the matter. At the present time the banks and loan companies in the colony borrow their money from the people in the colony, and lend it out, not to the various industries in the colony, but to farmers, at 7 and 8 per cent. In other cases they shift money out of New Zealand altogether. The effect of this proposal, I take it, will be very good, so far as the people of New Zealand are concerned, for, by inducing them to place their money in the hands of the Government for investment, they will have the control of their own money and as much of other people's as the latter choose to lend. The system of borrowing money in the colony on land-bonds and on debentures held at Home will form a magnificent channel through which capital that is now lying unused will flow into the industries of the colony, and to our farms. In other words, capital that is now being held at high rates of interest will be released, and will again seek investment, not only in settling people on the land, but also in the starting of manufactures and industries in our towns. Now, there is another matter in connection with the cheap-money scheme that has not been pointed out in the course of this debate, and which brings out still more the effect it is likely to have in years to come. Under Mr. Goschen's conversion scheme of 1888, from 1889 to 1908 the interest on Imperial Consols stands at 2½ per cent., but after 1908 the interest will fall to 2¼ per cent. The effect of that reduction will undoubtedly be that investors at Home will be constantly looking to Australia and New Zealand Government securities as a means of investing their moneys, and the effect will be not only that our 3½-per-cents will rise above par, to at least 108 or 104, but the effect will also be to cause people at Home to send their money out here for investment through the ordinary channels. It has been said that this is a huge borrowing scheme; but how different it is from the borrowing schemes that have been previously laid before this House! In this case a million loan is not to be thrown down on the floor of the House to be scrambled for, leading to "log-rolling" and, I was going to say, all sorts of swindles being perpetrated such as one almost, at this stage of the history of the colony, stands amazed at. What is the position under this Bill? There is a million and a half of money to be brought into New Zealand, and for every sovereign of it there will be an asset in the different securities held by the State. I say, therefore, it is an entirely different system from anything that has been attempted before. It is childish to dream of evil, and it is easy to talk of repudiation, and an increase of taxation. Ories like these are very easily raised; but there is no real danger of these things being realised if only the administration is honest; for these reasons: There will be two great checks in connection with this cheap-money scheme. The first check will be supplied by the power and influence of a fast-growing democracy; and, in the second place, the working of this scheme will be narrowly scrutinised by people who are not going to get money, and it will be also scrutinised by the representatives of the money-lending institutions, who regard the scheme with suspicion and distrust. There are, therefore, these two measures of protection in connection with the cheap-money scheme, and I have no doubt the effect will be for the good of the colony. The senior member for Wellington City said that the sting of the Bill lay in its last clause, "in its tail"—those were his words. Why, he said under this Bill the Bankruptcy Act did not apply! But there are two ways of looking at that Act.

Mr. G. W. Russell

The first way is as it affects the debtor, and the second way is as it affects the creditor. In this case the honourable member looked at it only as to its effect upon the debtor, and said nothing whatever as to how it would affect the mortgagee. There is another way of looking at it. Under this Bill the State is the creditor, and as such the State has a right to protection. Then, as to its effect upon the debtor, his land and his improvements cannot be taken from him under the Bankruptcy Act, and, although he may be made a bankrupt, he can come back and reoccupy his land, because it is protected from the operation of the Bankruptcy Act. These are sufficient answers to the remarks of the honourable gentleman. And now, if I take the opportunity of adding a few criticisms regarding the general scope of the measure, I am sure they will not be regarded as of a hostile nature after what I have already said. In the first place, I think, in connection with these leasehold clauses, we should be very particular that we do not allow the unearned increment to enter as an element into the security. That is one point on which we require to be very careful. Now, reference has been made to the business of the Public Trust Office and Government Insurance Fund; but I should like to point out to the Treasurer that in connection with the loans under the Government Insurance Fund there are several safeguards. The first is that the money is lent on first mortgage, the second is that only 50 per cent. is lent on the valuation, the third is that loans of £500 have the priority, the fourth is that the Board must be unanimous in lending, and the fifth is that three members of the Board must attend the meeting and vote with regard to the application. I now come to the matter of repayments. So far as they are concerned, I cannot help thinking that, as regards the proposal to lend the money for thirty-six years and a half, the term is too long. The object of every mortgagee is to strengthen his security, and to do that he usually makes provision to call in a portion of his loan as soon as possible, so that the position may be reviewed, and for very good reasons, too. The conditions, for instance, change. Now, the position of the borrowers under the Bill is this: that after the loan has existed for twenty-five years the mortgagor will only have paid off half the loan. I do not think that that gives sufficient consideration to the State as mortgagee. When we consider the perishable nature of securities in towns, or in connection with woolsheds and fences,—when we reflect how these things decay and pass away,—we must see that it will be necessary for the protection of the State that these mortgages should from time to time be reviewed at an earlier period than thirty-six and a half years; for we must remember the scheme is not to apply to country lands only, but also to lands in cities, and to improvements, which constitute a security regarding which caution is necessary. I offer these suggestions for the amendment of the Bill, and I hope the Colonial Treasurer will give them his attention, and apply the Bill to first mortgages on freeholds, and only to such improvements as belong to the holder of the lease, or which are to be made with the capital which the State supplies. Let the applicant go and lay before the Lending Board his application, and declare what he proposes to spend the money on, and then, as he proceeds with his improvements, the State may make progress payments—for these improvements should increase the security of the State—so that the money lent may go to the employment of labour, and be improving the property. Then, I think it would be also proper that there should be a provision in the Bill that the Board should be unanimous in connection with the granting of loans. That is the principle followed in connection with the loans by the Government Insurance Department, and I am aware of at least one instance in which one of the officers of the Government, sitting as a member of the Board, vetoed a large loan which Sir Julius Vogel proposed to the Board to bring about: the vote of that one officer was sufficient to veto that proposal. I say that, if the application for a loan does not commend itself to the whole of the Lending Board, that should be sufficient reason why it should not be granted. Then, the duration of the mortgages should be for ten years, and at the end of that period they should be reviewed; for this reason: If the mortgagor cannot go upon the open market and borrow money on the same terms as he has got his loan from the Government, then it stands to reason that the Government has got a weak security. I say that this measure will either make or break the Liberal party. If it proves to be successful, the Liberal party are entering upon a lease of life which will extend for many years; but if the effect of the scheme should be to bring about failure, or in any sense depression, then the effect will be disastrous to the Liberal party; and it is therefore our business, as members of the party, to do all we can to see that the mortgages are fixed upon sound lines. The last suggestion which I venture to offer is that, in the first place, the machinery of the existing State lending departments should, as far as possible, be employed for the valuations. I make this suggestion to the Colonial Treasurer, for this reason: that he has at the present time a system of valuation in the Public Trust Office and in the Government Insurance Department, and I believe there is also a valuation system in the Public Works Department. From these three departments it ought to be possible for him to get correct and sound valuations in connection with properties. I come now to the point of having general Valuers throughout the colony, who will have to travel over very large areas of country. Take, for example, a Canterbury Valuer living, say, in Christchurch. He will have to travel as far south as the Waitaki, and north as far as Kai-koura; and I say that the cost of the valuations and the travelling-expenses of the Valuers, and their fees, must be added to the valuations, and be repaid by the borrowers, if the scheme is to be on sound lines. The suggestion I have to make in connection with this matter is that the existing valuation system of the Government should be employed, for the purpose of reducing the cost of the valuation. I say this is an important matter: and I also think the Government will do well to consider the desirability of assessing every valuation at a minimum of at least a guinea, the effect of which would be that a number of persons who had their properties valued, and who thereby obtained information as to their value, but who might not get a loan, would contribute to the cost of the valuation, and thus lessen the general cost of working. I should like to say, in conclusion, that, in adopting this policy of cheap money being provided by the State, the Government are carrying out one of the principles of a true Liberal policy, which is that the functions of the State should be exercised for the general benefit of the great mass of the people. That is the foundation on which our railway system is built; it is the foundation on which our land system is built, and on which State savings-banks and the State insurance scheme are built; and the Government have only gone a step further in undertaking the regulation of the price of money as a State function. The general effect of their policy must be to lower the rates of interest, and the lowering of the rates of interest must undoubtedly release money that is now held at the high rates, and induce the spread of settlement, and promote the progress of the country. I shall strongly support the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. CROWTHER.—I rise with a certain amount of diffidence, simply because, Sir, we have had more time than enough wasted.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh!

Mr. CROWTHER.—The honourable member says "No." I thought this afternoon, when the debate was weakening somewhat, that it was coming to an end. However, it seems to have got a fresh start so soon as the galleries got filled, so that I think the tendency now is quite in the other direction. I should have been pleased if the same course had been followed in connection with this measure as was adopted in connection with the Licensing Bill. I very much doubt whether those honourable gentlemen who watch the clock in order that they may speak the full time allowed them do not crowd into the discussion suggestions for amendments which they put upon the Supplementary Order Paper; so that so soon as we get into Committee we have the same discussion again. The honourable gentleman who last spoke is very ready for that sort of work. He has given us a number of suggestions which we shall have to go over again in Committee.

8.30. Let us get into Committee, where we can do real work: in fact, if we could reverse our mode of doing business we should have a better chance of getting through the work, and that work would be done more in the real interests of the country. It is of no use to spend any more time arguing one against the other, simply because one man belongs to one side of the House and one to another. So far as concerns the measure my opinion of it is that the whole result of this Bill depends upon the administration: that is the sequel we have to rely on. The Bill is here before us, but there is not one of us who can say it is absolutely going to be a success if badly administered, and there is not one of us who is prepared to say that it is bound to fail if well administered. Then, I say, let us get to Committee, and to real work. Some honourable members say £500 is enough to lend to any man, and others are against lending anything at all on leasehold property. These are all matters to be threshed out in Committee, and the shorter we make debates on the floor of the House on such subjects the better; consequently I am not going to say any more.

Mr. MASLIN.—Sir, I regard this Bill as one of the greatest importance, and I consider the time spent in debating it will be time well spent. The honourable member for Riccarton said that this Bill would either make or mar the Liberal party, and I fully indorse that opinion. Seeing that it is a question of such momentous interest, I think it behoves us to be careful how we proceed in connection with it. The question of cheap money for the people I think we are all in sympathy with. We all know its desirableness. If it is possible to obtain money and lend it out on a sound and satisfactory basis it is desirable that the people should have money at the lowest possible rates. I question, myself, however, very seriously whether it is not going beyond the functions of the State to convert this country into a large loan-and-mercantile institution for the purpose of absorbing all the mortgage-business in this colony. The history of our mortgage institutions has not been of such a glowing and prosperous character as to warrant us in taking this new departure on the lines proposed by this Bill. The honourable member for Riccarton pictured in glowing terms the palatial buildings erected by our monetary institutions, but he omitted to point out the great losses many of those money-lending institutions have suffered, and the condition in which they are to-day—practically insolvent. They have lent money out on freehold property, and, if those institutions have experienced losses in connection with their business, when they have been managed by men with expert knowledge of this particular class of business, what is to be expected of the State, which will have to trust the management of the business entirely to the skill of others, without expert supervision? We know that this placing the management in the hands of others has led many financial institutions to disaster, and I am very much afraid that the scheme propounded by the Colonial Treasurer will end in disaster to the State. When I referred to this question in the financial debate I pointed out one thing that would most likely arise, and against which I have seen no provision made yet, and that is the possibility of there being a large amount of interest outstanding in connection with the money that we lend. Any one who has had anything to do with mortgages knows very well that, if you have a large amount of money lent out, there will be always an amount of interest outstanding that cannot be collected on the due date, however stringent the conditions may be. There will be many a one who will be unable to meet interest on the due date, when an extension of time will have to be given. In connection with the debate that took place on the Land-tax Bill of this session it was pointed out that it was a matter of urgency that the Bill should be passed on that occasion under which the collection of the land-tax was brought forward some four months. If the finances of the colony are in that condition that we had to collect that tax four months earlier than usual to meet engagements, what will happen when we get a bad season, and we have in addition a large amount of interest unpaid in connection with our loans to settlers? I am afraid we shall find ourselves short of money to pay interest in London; and we have made no provision to meet such an emergency. I consider the scheme as brought down by the Colonial Treasurer is too large altogether. In the speech in which he introduced the Bill he pointed out that there would be a necessity for employing seven gentlemen of the legal fraternity, at salaries of a thousand a year. Well, seeing that the Bill provides for money to be lent on freehold lands under the Land Transfer Act, and on leaseholds granted by the Crown only, why should we require any legal skill in order to examine titles of this character? Any one who has had anything to do with lands under the Land Transfer Act, such as the District Land Registrar, would be able to conduct the business, without employing a whole array of solicitors, spending thousands of pounds in this way. Then, there are to be ten Valuers appointed, at £600 a year each. The honourable member for Riccarton referred to these as being most likely city men, and I think it is most likely they will be city men. We know very well that these city men have peculiar ideas of properties they have to value. They look at everything from a city point of view, and the result of that must be disastrous to any lending institution. If the valuations are made by this class of men, without local knowledge of the district in which it is proposed to lend, the values will most certainly be made on too high a scale. Sir, if this measure is to achieve what those who are most sanguine as to its results hope it will achieve, it must lead to an inflation of the values of land. If we get cheap money, the values of land must go up. I feel certain that, if this scheme is launched upon the colony as brought down by the Colonial Treasurer, there will be a land-boom in connection with values, and the result will be that we shall be lending money on boom values; and by-and-by there will be a reaction, and we shall find ourselves in the position of the Globo Assets and other companies, and we shall find it very difficult to get out of it. The scheme is altogether too large for the country to undertake. There is no necessity to go out of the way to assist men who are in the position of being able to borrow, say,

Mr. Crowther

$5,000; they would get very little advantage under this Bill, because if they had got the security to give to borrow such sums they would have no difficulty in obtaining money at 5½ per cent., or perhaps 6 per cent. I do not see that the State should go out of its way to help men who can obtain money at these low rates of interest. We should first help the Crown tenants, who require assistance, because they cannot borrow on their leaseholds. Men will not lend money on those securities, for the simple reason that they are so hampered by the conditions under the Land Act that they cannot dispose of those securities. If the Government could bring down a scheme to assist these small holders—men who have at present to pay a high rate of interest—men owning, say, a hundred acres of freehold property, who require from £200 to £300; or men who hold leases from the Crown—I should be in favour of it. I think the Government should have come down with some well-defined proposal to lend money to these classes of settlers. If they had, I am sure it would have been more acceptable to the House and the country than the launching-out into this wholesale scheme of money-lending, which, sooner or later, may prove disastrous to the country. There are, of course, advantages to be gained in connection with it; but still, there are disadvantages, and what we gain on the one hand we lose on the other. It is not all glitter, as some honourable members who advocate it would like us to believe. Then, I should like to see the money to be used for this purpose limited to the funds that can be obtained in the country. We have a Bill on the Order Paper now, called the Colonial Consols Bill. I would suggest that the money raised thereunder should be used for the purpose of lending it to settlers on the security of their freeholds, and that we should not go to the Home market to borrow money for these purposes at all, until we have had larger experience of this particular class of business. By this means we shall avoid disaster, which must certainly follow if the proposals embodied in the Colonial Treasurer's speech are given effect to. There is another remark I would refer to of the Colonial Treasurer's—that is, a proposal to lend on a tenant's interest in the land. I do not know what that refers to, but I understand it to mean that the tenant may mortgage the goodwill of a lease. Now, we know that, when our lands are put up for ballot, there are a number of applicants for them, and any one who is successful in getting one of these leases can almost at once dispose of the interest in his lease for some considerable sum in advance, according to the size or nature of the land he has obtained. I do not think we should lend on that sort of security. The security we should lend on in connection with leaseholds should be permanent improvements made by a tenant, and not merely on the interest a tenant may acquire apart from any expenditure he may have made; otherwise we shall really be only lending on our own security; we shall not be lending on the security of the borrower at all; and if we do that I am sure it will give great dissatisfaction to the country, and will help to bring about the overthrow of the whole scheme. While I should support the second reading of the Bill, on the principle that it is desirable to provide cheap money for farmers, in Committee I shall be prepared to make some amendments, or support amendments, in the direction of limiting the amount to be borrowed to very small sums indeed, so that it shall help the struggling settler, and not the prosperous landowner as proposed in this Bill. I hope the Colonial Treasurer and the House will proceed with considerable caution in this matter, because it is a departure which may result in ruin to the Government and in considerable loss to the whole country.

Mr. ALLEN.—After the speech of the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Crowther) I suppose we may presume the debate is pretty well ended. I gather from what he said that he has heard nothing to cause him to vote for the Bill. If that is so, it is satisfactory, and if a few more honourable members could be induced to vote in the same way it would be still more satisfactory. So far as I can gather, the only two speeches in favour of the Bill have been the speech of the Colonial Treasurer and that of the honourable member for Riccarton. It is curious that this large policy measure of the Government has received so little support from the Government benches. I think, after all the criticism which has been made on the measure, that at least we should have heard a further defence of the Bill from the Government benches, and I hope we shall yet. Honourable members have adduced some very serious arguments against this Bill, against the principle of the Bill, and against the details, and it is more or less a matter of detail. I think these arguments ought to be answered from the Government benches, or by some one who has been prompted by the Government, or who knows the Government feeling on the matter. There are two arguments against this Bill which have not yet been brought forward. They are not Conservative arguments, for they have been used by the so-called Liberal side of the House. The honourable gentleman who had the honour to lead that party some three or four years ago, in speaking on the Land- and Income-tax Bill, said that one of his objects in life was to do away with competition in everything except competition in money. He wanted competition in money, he wanted as many money-lenders as possible to come here and lend their money; and his reason for saying so was this: He said if we could induce a number of people to come here and lend money it would mean competition in the money-market, and the rates of interest would decrease. That is what has happened in the past. From 10 to 12 per cent. money has gone down on reasonable securities to something like 6 per cent.; and no doubt money would have continued to go down had it not been for the sudden check which this tendency received from the policy brought forward by those who are upon the Government benches. It not only received a check, but it retrograded. Money went up, and the interest charges increased by $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 per cent. That is a fact which is well known to those who have had anything to do with mortgages at all. What is the reason for that I leave honourable members to ascertain for themselves. My explanation is that it was in consequence of the policy brought forward by the present Ministry. I may point out, however, notwithstanding the so-called Liberal argument, that to a very large extent this Bill is going to do away with money competition, and in that respect it will do a serious harm to the very people whom the Bill is intended to benefit. There can be no doubt, it seems to me, as to that. The Colonial Treasurer, in introducing this measure, said the other evening that the main opposition to this Bill would come from the money-lending institutions. Assuredly it is also true that there are many money-lending institutions which possess securities now of so doubtful a character that they will look upon this measure as a means of relieving themselves of those doubtful securities. That, I think, is a very forcible argument against this Bill. Very many money-lending institutions have bad securities, and by means of this Bill they may—I do not say they will, but I think there is a possibility of their being able to—get out of their bad investments. Then, there is another argument which has also come from the Liberal side of the House, and that is, that all mortgages are bad, and that anything that will induce mortgages to be taken up will be a bad thing for the country. If ever there was anything brought before this House which will induce men to take up mortgages it is assuredly this measure. One of the objects of this Bill is to offer exceptionally easy terms to men to take up mortgages. If that be so, it is surely an inducement to men to take up mortgages. Very well: if the argument which has been adduced from that side of the House is correct, that it is a bad thing that land should be mortgaged, then it must be a bad thing that any policy should be brought forward which induces men to take up mortgages, and therefore this is a bad measure. But, although it is quite true this Bill really offers an inducement to men to take up mortgages, unfortunately it does not, on the other hand, induce men to pay them off. It is quite true that under the provisions of this Bill a man pays off 1 per cent. in yearly instalments, and it is quite true that he may pay off £5 or any multiple of £5; but the thing is this: If a man pays off £5, instead of receiving 5 per cent., which he is paying for his loan, the Treasurer only offers him 4 per cent. for his money. There is no inducement to a man to pay off his mortgage in instalments of £5, or any multiple of £5, if he is only going to receive from the colony interest at the rate of 4 per cent. when he himself has to pay the Colonial Treasurer interest at the rate of 5 per cent., and the additional 1 per cent. to pay off his loan.

Mr. Allen

I should really like to know for whom this Bill is intended. The speech of the Colonial Treasurer on the second reading was, to my mind, entirely misleading. Is this Bill, for instance, intended for the purpose of inducing settlement upon land? That was his argument the other evening. Well, if that be so, then it is intended to advance to the settler money before he has made his improvements. Is that the intention of the Bill, or is it not? I think that ought to be made absolutely plain before we go very much further with the Bill, because a great deal depends upon it. It is a much more safe thing to advance money to a man who has made his improvements than to advance money to a man who has taken up land in its natural or virgin state, and who has made no improvements upon it. That point ought to be made quite clear to us. If this measure is to induce settlement, if it is to induce the taking-up of Crown lands, if it is to provide for advancing money to a man who has not made improvements—that, I think, would be an exceedingly dangerous proposition to bring forward. It would require to be hedged round with many more safeguards than are introduced in this Bill. If it is not so intended—and I do not think it is intended in reality for the advancement of such men as I have been speaking of—is it intended to relieve those who are now paying high rates of interest? That has also been brought forward and adduced by the Treasurer as an argument in favour of this Bill. There are, says he, many settlers in this country who are paying large rates of interest for the money which has been advanced to them. Is this Bill intended to relieve those men? That point ought also to be made clear, because, if so, it is going to do this: It is going to relieve men who now are in the hands of certain money-lenders—money-lenders who would be extremely glad to get rid of them if they could. What really is the meaning of a high rate of interest? It really means this: that the security itself is a questionable one. If the Government are going to relieve those who are paying high rates of interest, all I can say is, they will have to take questionable securities; and if they are not going to do that, then, I ask, what really is the reason for this Bill? If a man now has good security he can at the present time get money at reasonable rates of interest. A man who has first-class security can borrow at 6 per cent. I know many instances where men who have undoubted security have got money from loan companies or private individuals at 6 per cent.

Mr. DUNCAN.—How long ago was that?

Mr. ALLEN.—I know it was so till four years ago, but, unfortunately, since then they have had to pay 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The reason for that I leave the honourable gentleman to judge for himself. This Bill is going to be of no service whatever to the intending settler so far I can read it, and it is going to be of no service to the man who is now paying high rates of interest, because his security is a questionable one. The Colonial Treasurer has told us that he has hedged this Bill round with all sorts of safeguards. Safeguards mean nothing if they do not mean this: that the securities upon which you are going to lend the money shall be undoubted ones, and that the margin of the securities shall be ample to protect the colony from any loss. There is another argument, it seems to me, against this Bill. No provision whatever is made for the allocation of the money. It has been the customary practice for us, lately at any rate, to ear-mark loans. I think every honourable member, if he really is in earnest about the wants of his own constituents, ought to see that this loan is ear-marked. We all want our share of this plunder. I want some for my constituency; and does not every member of the House want the same for his too?

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. ALLEN.—“No,” says an honourable member. Let him go back to his constituents and say so. I want my share of it, at any rate.

Mr. WARD.—Will you support the Bill?

Mr. ALLEN.—I will not say that; but, if there is to be plunder, let me get my share of it.

Mr. WARD.—You cannot get your share.

Mr. ALLEN.—If you refuse me my share if I vote against this Bill it will be unfortunate for me, and perhaps for my constituents; but if this Bill passes, surely he will permit me also to have my little share of the plunder. I think these moneys ought to be ear-marked. Let us all have our little share of it. Let the North Island have half, and let the South Island have half. Let the North Island be divided into provincial districts, or constituencies, and so with the South Island. If this Bill comes into operation, what is to be the effect of it in future years? Does any one for a moment imagine that this Bill is to be restricted even to the very wide limits which it now covers? What do we read? Only a day or two ago, in one of the newspapers, in a report of a Labour Council meeting, some one said this was a Conservative measure, and would have to be widened and made a more Liberal measure. This Conservative measure, coming from those benches opposite, the so-called Conservative side will have to make more Liberal. If the settler is entitled to this money at cheap rates of interest, surely to Goodness there are hundreds of others who are as justly entitled to ask the colony to treat them upon equal grounds.

9.0. Very well, then, I ask, with the Bill as it is now, taking the limit for country settlers, what will the limit of it be in the course of ten or twelve years' time? There is no knowing to what length this may in future reach; it may lead to such ends that it may ultimately lead to our wreck altogether. If we are to borrow at the rate of a million and a half on the London market, if we are to borrow £15,000,000 in ten years for the sake of the settlers only, how much will the total be if it is to include all those persons who are as justly entitled to advances as the settlers? How much is it going to reach in ten or twenty years' time? The railways will be nothing to it; the present public debt of the colony will be nothing to it. There is, however, one saving feature, at any rate. Even though we may, perhaps, wish to borrow at the rate of a million and a half for settlers, and another million and a half a year for other individuals in some industries in the country, we have another party whose consent will be required to that arrangement, and that is the London money-market. Sir, I question very much whether this scheme will find acceptance—especially if it is to be made so large as I have hinted it may be, to include not only the settler, but others—I question very much if this scheme will find acceptance with those who have been in the habit hitherto of lending us money. Then, supposing what I have hinted at does not take place—supposing the lending is limited in future to settlers only—what would be the result of that course in about a dozen years? In the ordinary course of events, interest, as I say, has been coming down more or less rapidly every five or ten years. Well, it is fair argument to conclude that in the course of another ten or twelve years the ordinary interest charged by lending companies here would also come down to 6 or, probably, 5½ per cent., or even 5 per cent. What really is a settler taking up money under this scheme going to pay? It is true he is only paying 5 per cent. interest on the loan, but he has to pay another 1 per cent.; as a matter of fact, he will be paying 6 per cent. per annum; and, although 1 per cent. is really in liquidation of the capital debt, the charge is upon him at the present time, and the charge upon him at the present time is that which has been said to be the hardship, and the settler, have no doubt, would prefer in many instances to pay the 5 per cent. interest and to leave the debt to be looked after at some future day. Very well, then, he is paying 6 per cent. interest on capital, and, as I say, possibly in the course of a few years the ordinary interest may decrease to such an amount that it can safely and satisfactorily compete with the Government under this scheme. What would be the condition of things then? It is true that under this Bill provision is made for a man paying off his loans; but I think what will take place is this: that the borrower will not be so anxious to pay off his loan as to start an agitation to reduce the rate of interest to 4½ per cent., or even 4 per cent., with 1 per cent. for paying off the capital. Now, who is going to resist that agitation if it is taken up by the people? Will anybody upon the Government benches, or anybody in this House? If the scheme succeeds and becomes widespread, will anybody resist that agitation for a reduction in the rate of interest? I do not think so.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why not?

Mr. ALLEN.—“Why not?” Because our experience has told us that the Government benches never can resist agitation of that kind. The honourable gentleman knows it as well as I do. Well, if that takes place, where is your margin of profit? It is true that under the Bill provision is made for the conversion of loans: that may be easy at the time or it may not be, but, assuming that no further conversions take place, then, I say, the margin of profit is so small that it will probably result in a serious loss to the colony. Even under the present conditions, without a reduction in the rate of interest, I say the margin is so small that during the first years, at all events, it will probably result in a serious loss to the colony. Then, Sir, I did incidentally refer to the possible effect of huge borrowing schemes on the Home market, and, as that has been referred to by others, I shall say no more about it now. Nor need I stay for any length of time to say anything about the cost of getting the money. The Colonial Treasurer assumes that because the Consols at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. stand at 103 the Agents can raise this at par. Sir, our Consols stood at 103 not so long ago at the time we were actually making conversions; but did we convert our $3\frac{1}{2}$ -per-cents then at par? No; the honourable gentleman knows perfectly well that we got only 95 or 96; and it is quite patent, in looking through the clauses of his Bill, that the Colonial Treasurer does not expect to raise the loans at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. at par, for he has provided in the Bill that he may pay 4 per cent. Very well; it has been pointed out that if he pays 4 per cent., the margin left, out of which he must pay expenses and to Assurance Fund, is only 1 per cent., or something like £15,000. He has calculated his expenses, and I say his calculation is altogether below the mark. I do not say it is below the mark as regards the salaries he will pay the Valuers or the legal officers, but it is below the mark because he has omitted the various other charges which have been pointed out by the honourable the senior member for Wellington City, and which will have to be included in the management Act. If we are to lend money on leasehold securities it is quite plain and patent to the House that there must from time to time be inspection of all these securities. How in the world otherwise shall we know respecting these leasehold securities that the improvements upon them are kept in repair unless we have from time to time inspectors going round to see that that is done? Unless this is done, assuredly many of the securities will become worth almost nothing. Buildings, fences, and all other kinds of improvements will have from time to time to be inspected, and that will cost money. Sir, there is no provision, so far as I can see from the speech of the honourable member, for expenses of that kind. Nor do I know that he has calculated for the loss of the mortgage-tax. It has been referred to before, and I will not dwell upon it, except to say this: If the scheme becomes widespread, so as to replace a lot of the money advanced by private loan companies, it will in the course of time mean a very serious loss to the colony—£6,250 for every million and a half. What will that amount to in the course of twenty years? Or, supposing that the whole of the private mortgages that there are now are replaced under the Government scheme, what it really will mean is that the colony will lose on account of the mortgage-tax £125,000 a year. That is a serious consideration. If the advances under a scheme of this kind replace private mortgages by loans from the Government we shall lose by it to the extent of the mortgage-tax. Nor need I refer at any length to the machinery of the Bill, which proposes, with regard to freeholds, that money shall be advanced up to two-thirds of the value. That has been sufficiently criticized by the honourable member for Akaroa, and various other members even on the Government side of the House, and that should be sufficient to induce the Government to recognise that it is not a safe thing to advance money up to two-thirds of the value. That that has been admitted in the past is quite evident from the fact that other Government lending institutions have never advanced beyond 50 per cent. of the value, and even then they have managed to make losses, and in one case a somewhat serious loss. And if it be true that under a 50-per-cent. valuation more or less serious losses have been made to the colony, what will take place when we lend up to a two-thirds valuation? Then, it is proposed to advance to the leaseholder upon the security of his improvements or of the value of his lease on a 50-per-cent. value. Well, I do not know how that may work out in practice, but to my mind it is an exceedingly dangerous thing to advance money upon leasehold security unless there are further safeguards placed in the measure than there are at present. What are these improvements, after all? Are they things that exist for ever without deterioration? These improvements will be gradually decreasing in value. Of course the Colonial Treasurer may say that at the same time his advances are decreasing. Well, it is a question of degree which are going to decline in value most rapidly. Are the improvements likely to come to nil quicker than the amount owing by the leasehold tenant comes to nil? I think the proposal to advance upon leasehold securities, although it may probably be a beneficial thing to do if it can be done with safety, is an exceedingly dangerous proposal, and one which requires very many safeguards to be placed in the Bill. Now, I wish to say a word, before I sit down, with regard to the effect upon the Consolidated Fund under this Bill. It is full of Consolidated Fund and of Public Works Fund from beginning to end. Clause 34 starts with Consolidated Fund, the bonds under this clause being charged to Consolidated Fund. The Treasurer will say, no doubt, that there is no other way in which to charge them. Any deficiency in management is to be met from the Consolidated Fund. In clause 62, the 2nd subsection of the clause, the capital of the Debenture Fund repayment is placed—where? In the hands of the Public Trustee, it is true, but at the call of the Colonial Treasurer. Well, Sir, we have had experience of what that means with other Government lending institutions. This is only another means of supplementing the Public Works Fund, and of possibly supplementing the Consolidated Fund, in a more indirect manner than has been hitherto done.

Mr. WARD.—That is not so.

Mr. ALLEN.—Well, the honourable gentleman may say he does not supplement the Fund now from the Public Trust and Life Insurance Departments.

Mr. WARD.—How could you get it back from the Public Trustees unless the Colonial Treasurer had the right to take it?

Mr. ALLEN.—Make provision for the Public Trustee paying it direct. Why get it back? Why not make provision for paying it direct, and have nothing to do with the Consolidated Fund? There is no provision here that the Colonial Treasurer shall pay off his bonds or debentures as soon as he gets it back. He is to pay it some time, but he does not say when, and he may use the money for thirty-six years and a half before he pays off some of the land-bonds. That seems to me one of the reasons why this Bill has been introduced. Then, with regard to the land-bonds, clause 63 provides that the half-yearly payments are to be made to the Colonial Treasurer, to be applied in redeeming the bonds: that is true, but when is he to redeem them? The bonds are in existence for thirty-six years and a half, and as long as such are in existence he may call them in. But who thinks that he is going to call them in? If he wants the money he will stick to them as long as he can, and at the end of the time he will probably say, "These have gone into the Public Works Fund; we must raise another loan to meet the bonds." My time has drawn to a close, and, although there are one or two other things in the Bill I should like to speak about, I feel that other members have so criticized the measure that perhaps it is best for me to offer no further remarks. I should like, however, to hear some further explanation from the Treasurer in answer to the arguments that have been adduced against the operations of the Bill, at any rate from the honourable gentleman's own side of the House, as well as from this side.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—Sir, I rise again on the wrong side of the House, and, judging from the enthusiastic manner in which the remarks of the honourable member for Riccarton in favour of the Bill were received, and the very cool manner in which the opposition of the honourable member for Bruce has been received, I expect I shall not get a very warm reception myself. But I have no intention, in rising to speak on the second reading of this Bill, to make anything like a Committee speech. I do not intend to criticize the Bill in detail. It is not so much the details of the Bill I object to—it is the principle of the Bill. I entirely object to the reversal of the policy so clearly and distinctly laid down by the late Mr. Ballance two years ago, and which this Government, with equal clearness and decision, agreed to adopt. In fact, they came into office distinctly with the fullest understanding on their part that they were to carry out the policy announced by the late Mr. Ballance. That being the case, and it being also true that I most distinctly and positively assured my constituents that I would support no measure in this House that would increase our already crushing national debt—that being the case, if I approved of the most of the details of this Bill I should not dare to vote for it without first going back to my constituents and seeing by their votes if they would approve of my moving in that direction. When I spoke in the financial debate I quoted some words by Mr. Ballance in his last Financial Statement to show how very distinctly his policy was opposed to that enunciated in the Financial Statement of the Colonial Treasurer this year. I will now quote another sentence from Mr. Ballance, and I do so because it really seems to me, from the action the Government have taken in this matter, they must have forgotten either Mr. Ballance's policy or their own assertion that it was their intention to carry out his policy. I have here a sentence which I will read from Mr. Ballance's Financial Statement of the 30th June, 1892—his last Financial Statement. He says,—

"I have shown the necessity for weaning the colony from a servile dependence on foreign dealers in money. I do not think it would be wise to attempt to raise another loan in the English market at present. . . . We have boldly announced the policy of not offering our friends any more paper for a period. We propose, therefore, to keep faith with this announcement, and to refrain from placing any loan on the English market."

Then he says what we know is so true,—

" . . . Of course this limit means a reduced rate of expenditure, and it will impose great care, moderation, and self-denial on honourable members; but it also means that, for the first time, we have determined on a policy of true self-reliance—the only policy, I firmly believe, to make this a great country."

Now, Sir, can there be any misunderstanding those words, and can you make those words fit in with a proposal to borrow in all directions, not only this year, but to borrow yearly a million and a half for this particular purpose now before the House, and for this House to give authority to the Government to do that? This is a most complete reversal of policy, and, as I said before, the question is so important, for the sums involved are so large, and the pledges of myself and I believe a large number of other members so distinct in the direction to vote for no more borrowing and no more increase of the public debt, that we have no right to consider a Bill of this kind without first going back to the country to take the opinion of the constituencies on a subject of such vast importance. There is no doubt, as Mr. Ballance said, that the declaration which he made of the intention to adopt a self-reliant policy, and to appeal no more to the British money-lender to give us money to meet the interest on loans we borrowed before—there is no doubt that that policy meant an amount of uphill work, and self-denial, and determined economy, such as very few men are disposed to adopt. In fact, we may speak of it in the lines of Dr. Watts,—

True, 'tis a strait and thorny road,
And mortal spirits tire and faint.

The Treasurer tired very soon of this policy of self-reliance. In fact, I might quote with regard to him the words which old Jacob applied to his son Issachar: with the alteration of one single word it applies exactly: "Issachar is a strong ass crouching down between the sheep-folds: and he saw a resting place that it was good, and borrowing that it was pleasant; and he bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant under taskwork." Now, Sir, the Colonial Treasurer had one of the finest opportunities a man ever had in this world to become the saviour of his country. He had nothing to do but to take up Mr. Ballance's policy and carry it out unflinchingly. He would not have pleased everybody, he would not have been very enthusiastically supported, he would have been called all sorts of bad names, he would have had to refuse a great many favours asked of him; but, at the same time, he would have done a work that would have immortalised him. The history of New Zealand would have pointed him out as the man whose firmness put a stop to the villainous system of borrowing and extravagance. While I am quoting Scripture I must allude to another sentence of a theological character, and there, again, I must alter one word, and I am afraid the alteration does not make much difference to the meaning so far as New Zealand has been affected. It is that this policy is a return to Vogel and all his works. We know what that policy has done for us. We know what the burdens of the country are at present as a consequence of that policy; and we know that we have long ago reached the highest point in borrowing that any community of the same size has ever reached; and will not every million we now add point out to our creditors, and to money-lenders in England, that New Zealand is not a place to lend more money? Is it not as sure as that the sun will rise to-morrow that, as soon as your Financial Statement gets to England loaded with borrowing proposals of every description, the interest on money, if it does not rise absolutely, will rise relatively in this country? In regard to this question I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech of the junior member for Wellington City. The manner in which he pointed out the undesirable character of many of the details of this Bill I entirely agreed with, especially when he showed how dangerous it would be to lend up to two-thirds of the value of property. But there is one point in which I differ somewhat from him—when he says the low interest on money is probably the result of temporary circumstances. I do not think that. I think, and I think specially in connection with this Bill,—and to me it points out the danger of the Bill more plainly than ever,—that the interest on money is certain to fall. It must fall, and this makes it such an appropriate time to have continued this policy of self-reliance, which would certainly have given us money at a lower interest, and we should have been in a position to profit by the most favourable markets. If you consider the position of the money-lenders and of the money-borrowers in the world at the present time, I think we must come to the conclusion that money will be borrowed at lower rates of interest—at least, at nominally lower rates. England is herself almost deluged with money, absorbing as she does a hundred and fifty millions a year of interest paid in appreciated gold—gold worth twice as much as it was worth twenty years ago. That is one reason. But, besides that, we have the fact that America is paying off her debt, and transferring her debt from Great Britain to her own people. In addition to this, we know that Turkey and Egypt have long had the bailiffs in their houses; they can borrow no more. South America cannot borrow, however much she would like to do so. She has reached the goal of borrowers sooner than we have. Then, we have the great European countries—Russia, Austria, and Italy—and I mention them only, because France borrows from her own people; the industrious, hard-working people of France are the creditors of the Government—they actually lend money to their Government, so that her debts will not cripple her as ours do. Austria, Russia, and Italy have long been making demands on English money-lenders, but the appreciation of gold has rendered their interest so oppressive that they can carry this borrowing no further. They are obliged to pull up; and where is England to find customers for all the money she has to lend? Under these circumstances there is nothing more certain than that the money-market of England will be stagnant. There will be very little demand, especially under the great disturbing cause that the appreciation of gold has made matters so much more favourable to the lender than to the borrower. A trade so remunerative as money-lending has proved is sure to be overdone; a trade so disastrous as borrowing has lately proved will be avoided. That being the case, it is 9.30. quite natural, and it would be unnatural if otherwise, that the money-lenders of England will find great difficulty in obtaining a mortgage for the quantity of wealth they have to invest at the present time. That is another reason which, it appears to me, should have been a very strong one to induce us to continue in the course marked out by Mr. Ballance. It was really magical the effect that his announcement of no further borrowing had upon the credit of this colony. Notwithstanding the enormous or very unusual cessation of credit and confidence in the Australian Colonies, New Zealand after that official declaration was treated with confidence; she was lauded and trusted and honoured in every way, and we were offered money at low rates, and at very much lower rates than we had been accustomed to, or even deserved under the circumstances. Since Mr. Ballance announced that policy we have borrowed or converted something more than eight millions of money, and we have saved hundreds of thousands of pounds by the improved credit which immediately followed on Mr. Ballance's announcement that we were not going to have any new borrowing operations in the English market. Yet, on the very first opportunity, we are now going back more voraciously than we ever went before, and we are going to borrow money by this Bill alone at the rate of a million and a half a year, and we are going to continue it year by year. Shall we not deserve to be accused of having taken an unfair advantage of the confidence of the English creditors, having reversed the policy under which we obtained such a great advantage? The fact of having proclaimed our intention to borrow no more money under any circumstances will lead strongly to the supposition that that declaration was merely made in order to enable us to borrow on better terms than we could have done without such a statement. That is the position in which we are placed in connection with this and the other borrowing Bills before us. Now, I know how very hard it will be for the present Colonial Treasurer to do without borrowed money, and how very hard it will be to collect the enormous amount of interest we have to collect, not for our own people, but to send out of this colony over the sea. No one could appreciate the difficulty Mr. Ballance took upon himself more highly than I did at the time he announced that policy, and I believe, if he had still lived, that that policy would have been adhered to, and the result would have been that our interest would have gone down very much lower than it is now. The interest generally has gone down so much that, notwithstanding the disturbances that have taken place in the Australian financial world, I see that Sydney is now able to borrow money at par and at 3½ per cent. That being the case, I do think that the Colonial Treasurer would have been something more, perhaps, than human if he had been willing to do without yielding to the same weakness as all his predecessors have succumbed to, and saying, "Let us have peace in our time, and let some future Hampden fight out this up-hill battle, this great difficulty which sooner or later must be fought out in this country." The sooner the better; and the later the more hopeless, if not disastrous, the inevitable struggle must be. That is all I have to say with regard to finance; but I want to say something about the land policy, because this Bill reverses the land policy of the country as distinctly as it reverses the financial policy. What was the great reason given to us why we should not give a freehold title to our settlers upon the land? The great and very good reason assigned by the Minister of Lands was that they should not be placed in a position in which they could mortgage their estates, because if they did they would certainly lose them. I am mistaken if I have not heard the Minister of Lands himself quote Carleton's lines,—

Worm or beetle, drought or tempest,
On a farmer's crops may fall,
But for first-class ruination
Trust a mortgage 'gainst 'em all.

We are now not only going to allow freeholders to get rid of their estates by mortgaging them, but we are going to encourage the leaseholders to do the same, and then we are going to make things as easy as we possibly can for them to get into debt, and as difficult as possible to get out of it. Now, my experience with regard to the effect of money-lending goes back for fifty-two years in this colony. Fifty years ago the New Zealand Company suddenly failed, and drove, by that means, a number of settlers on to the land under circumstances for which they were entirely unprepared, and as destitute as men could possibly go on to their sections. They were so poor, and circumstances were so unfavourable to them at that time, that it is actually true that in many cases these settlers had to dig up their seed-potatoes and eat a portion of them to prevent actual starvation. None of us had too much to eat, and there were many instances where men who had not enough to eat were obliged to help those who had still less. That was the condition in which these settlers went on to the land, and the struggles that those men made were something heroic. There were different classes of settlers, but I should say that they were all pretty much alike in hard, honest struggling for the first year or so; but after about two years the fiend of borrowing took possession of some of them who were honestly living in their mud cottages and brush-wood whares, wearing sack trousers, and going to church in a pair of moleskin trousers and a blue shirt kept for the purpose. But now all those men who kept the sack trousers on longest are rich men, and own the land that was occupied at that time. Those who went into the market to borrow money, and mortgaged their lands, lost their land, and the land became the property of the man who had kept his sack trousers until he could earn, and not borrow, something better: hence these men are now the owners of properties that were once divided between the two. I could speak of two men; I have mentioned their names to the honourable member for Nelson City, who knows them both well. They both came out early in 1842; they both went on the land, and they both went on good land. Although struggling together, and keeping pace with each other for some time, at last one of them borrowed £800, and gave a mortgage on his land. He was very soon after elected to the Nelson Provincial Council, and became a greater man than the other, and for some time you could see that his house was much better—he had a bigger and much more luxurious house for himself; but in ten years' time he had no house at all, and he was looking for a Government billet, and got one for a time.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What interest did he pay?

Mr. SAUNDERS.—I do not know what interest he paid, but interest was very high at that time. At any rate, that was the result. They were both industrious men; but the man who borrowed nothing, and kept on his sack trousers,—who used short logs for stools, and a slab for a table,—who did his work with four old cows, and ploughed his land with them—that man made use of every pound, and he was very soon a money-lender, and died worth £20,000; whilst the poor man, who had begun with him, and had borrowed this £300, died a pauper about the same time. That is a very common occurrence, and there really was nothing very extraordinary in it, as it is only the common occurrence that followed borrowing by our early settlers in this colony. The men who have been successful in this colony are the men who have strenuously avoided borrowing, and have relied upon their own resources, however severe the first pinch may be, and who have not been afraid to face difficulty and to endure toil in order that they might ultimately obtain that reward which follows upon industry and thrift—but not upon borrowing, which this Bill proposes to facilitate.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—Sir, I should not have risen to speak on this subject were it not that I did not wish to give a silent vote. I am going to vote against the Government on this measure. During the course of this debate the Colonial Treasurer, in the first instance, did not do himself justice. Through making a mistake over £1,500, as against £15,000, it appeared to be harassing to him, and he did not do that justice to the measure which I think he meant to do when he commenced. All through this debate I have felt very much that the honourable gentleman could well say, "Save me from my friends," for, with the exception of the support of the honourable member for Riccarton—which was a wholesale support of the measure—with the exception of one or two saving clauses every supporter of the Government has damned the Bill with faint praise.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No, no.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—Yes; there has not been a single supporter of the Government, who has got up in this debate, who has not said that he would amend the Bill in Committee.

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—No.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—The honourable gentleman has made his speech, and I wish he would give me the courtesy of allowing me to make my speech. I do not think, however, he showed courtesy when he spoke in following the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). Honourable members who have spoken have either said that the Government ought to limit the advance to settlers from £50 to £500 or £1,000, or that it should be raised at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent., or that the Colonial Treasurer should not be able to put his hands on these moneys. There has been no honourable member who has given him that clear, full support which, from a party point of view, he might have reasonably expected his supporters to give him on this measure. I have some sympathy with the honourable gentleman in this respect, and therefore he will not show any feeling when I explain to him my position, and tell him quite frankly that I shall vote against the Bill in the division. Speaking for myself, I was a strong supporter of the late Premier, Mr. Balance. I was returned in the last Parliament in favour of a non-borrowing policy, and his policy was a non-borrowing one. I was returned to this House on a non-borrowing policy; therefore, on that primary ground, I shall oppose this Bill. But this measure is only one of a series of borrowing proposals. We have before us proposals now that cover, if we take into consideration the same term that it is proposed to borrow money under the Land for Settlements Bill, five years. If you take that measure, and if you take the sum that will be raised for roads and bridges and for the purchase of Native lands, that makes three millions and three-quarters. Then, if the Government carry this measure through, for the five years it will mean seven millions and a half; and, whether this Government occupies those benches in the next Parliament or they are occupied by others, if this measure is carried no Government can stop immediately that lending—you will have to continue it for two years more; and, without taking the conversions this year, that makes eleven and a quarter millions, irrespective of Consols and contingent liabilities. These are borrowing proposals which I shall oppose as far as my vote will enable me to do it in this House; and I honestly believe that if the Government were true to their constituencies they would not pass these measures until we had gone to our constituencies and realised what they think of these measures. No constituency had this proposal before it when it returned a member to this House. No member of this House, nor the Ministry itself, nor the Premier ever gave out a manifesto conveying what is initiated in this Budget and the various policy measures that have come down; and it is only fair, as the honourable member for Selwyn has said, that these proposals should go to the country before we give our decision upon them and place them on the statute-book. Now, I am opposed to them, in the first place, because it is practically borrowing. Although the Government have been astute enough not to bring in the word "borrowing," it is just as much a loan proposal as the proposals of Sir Julius Vogel under the public-works policy, and on that ground I oppose it. I also oppose it because I do not believe that the Government should enter into competition in the money-market with the private money-lender. What, to my mind, they should do would be to try to lay down a fair standard rate of interest, and they can do that through the Public Trust Office and the Insurance Department without going into this scheme. If they will not come upon the Public Trust Office and the Insurance Department to absorb the money for their own purposes, but will let these two departments have the use of their money to lend out under reasonable proposals, there will not be any more demand, I believe, for these safe investments. If there were, it would be a fair thing for the Government to implement the moneys of these two institutions to meet the mortgages required. Now, we have also gone away from the proposals in the Budget. In those it was clearly laid down that the money should be obtained at 3½ and lent at 5 per cent., and that within that 1½ per cent. should be the whole cost of the transactions as between the Government and the borrowers. They have departed from that. For reasons best known to the Colonial Treasurer, he has seen fit to put in this Bill a 4-per-cent. purchase cover. Whether he has had advice from Home that it would be difficult to borrow at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., of course we do not know. We may have our opinions, and my opinion is that at the last moment he believes he cannot raise money at Home at par at $3\frac{1}{2}$, and he has therefore to raise it to 4, and therefore it is to be lent at more than 5 per cent. to the borrower. That shows, at any rate, that the views of the Colonial Treasurer have been somewhat modified since he gave his Budget Statement. But I should like to know—I asked him the question when I spoke on the Financial Statement, and in the course of this debate the honourable member for Ellesmere asked him the same thing—I asked the honourable gentleman, especially when speaking on the Financial Statement, if he would answer this question, but in his reply he did not do so. I will now ask it again: “(1.) Will the Colonial Treasurer state who will pay the mortgage-tax now paid by the mortgagees—1d. in the pound over £500? Is the State going to surrender this tax, or how will he retain the revenue derived from this source? For upon £1,500,000 advances to convert present mortgages paying taxation, the Colonial Treasurer may lose about \$6,000. (2.) What will be the effect of the cheapening of money and the cheapening of land on the Bank of New Zealand?” I now, a second time, ask him if, when replying, he will answer me that question. I think it is fair, and one he should answer on this money question. And I should like to know if he is going to exempt those persons who borrow money from the Government. Is he then going to exempt persons who have mortgaged to private money-lenders? If he is going to exempt Crown mortgagees, then he must exempt all mortgages. I say he has no right to make fish of one and flesh of another. Under this Bill it is also quite possible for any person who has several distinct fee-simples to get several loans from the Government upon them; and there is nothing to stop these men obtaining several loans, and, after obtaining them, again lending the money out in smaller sums to other persons who cannot avail themselves of the conditions of this Bill. Sir, sometimes I do not think myself that even the Government want the Bill to pass. They are simply kite-flying, to catch the country settlers' vote. This Bill puts me very much in mind of one of the great novelists, who wrote, perhaps, the most perfect novel we have. When he had written it, capable as he was of writing it he did not know what name to give it, and it was only when another great writer—Dickens—suggested “The Woman in White” that he realised that that would be a fitting title for it. It is just the other way with this Bill, for, while I think the title is perfect for catching the country settlers, the body of the Bill is very imperfect, and it is prepared to meet especially country members, for, although they are almost to a man opposed to it, they are afraid, with this catching phrase, “cheap money to settlers,” how they can face their constituents and vote squarely against this measure. I am very glad I stand for a city constituency, and therefore am not troubled in that respect. I could not follow the logic of the honourable member for Wairau in proposing that money should not be lent to those who have improvements on leasehold. If there are any people in the country who should have advances made to them it is those persons who are not so well able to get advances against their improvements as those who possess the fee-simple; and, as the Government have made the departure of going largely into lease in perpetuity and perpetual lease, it is only right that they should provide struggling settlers with money at a price they cannot possibly get it at in the money-lending market. That would have been a movement that I believe would have had the support of the whole colony. It would have allowed the Government to meet this class without competing with the private money-market; it would not have disturbed the money-market or our finance in the colony or at Home. If they had done that, and had seen for two or three years how that had worked out, then they could have advanced; but at the present time they have come down with a huge policy, which is very taking so far as the country votes are concerned. They cannot hope, however, that they will carry this Bill through the House, for it is not to be forgotten that, while member after member has got up and said that he will propose in Committee to reduce the scope of the Bill, we have the continual interjections of the Colonial Treasurer that if that is to be done he might as well shelve the Bill. That is significant; and, in voting for the second reading in the hope of carrying their amendments in Committee, honourable members should be very careful what they do. I am aware that in voting for the second reading of a Bill members only vote for cardinal principles, and then amend it in Committee as they think fit; but where the Government mean to carry the crucial parts of their Bill through Committee, and will call on the majority to vote with them on this measure, honourable members should be careful what they do. It is not Go-as-you-please in respect to this Bill; it is Go as the Government dictate to you; therefore I should advise honourable members to be careful how they vote. Personally I shall have very great pleasure in voting against the Bill. I also am of opinion that if the Government do carry this measure through—and I think they will carry the second reading—when it comes out of Committee they will simply shelve it. If they do carry it, then we should safeguard these advances in such a manner that the present Colonial Treasurer, or the gentleman who may succeed him, will not be able to put his hands on one shilling of the money. We shall have to guard against the bad securities that are going to be taken in hand; because, while it may be true that in Taranaki, owing to the great advance in the dairy industry, lands have very largely increased in value, it does not follow that they have increased in value all over New Zealand. It does not at all follow that the wheat lands are going to increase in value. A good many people think they are not able to compete in the growing of wheat, and it will be worse as years go by. Illustrations like that will show that it is not sound policy to advance to two-thirds value generally. Those who have got advances at a two-thirds value got their advances at times when land-values were higher than they now are. I fail to see how the Colonial Treasurer can give assistance to these persons unless he is prepared himself to take over the large risks the present mortgagees are holding, who would only be too willing to hand them over to the Government. I think one-half cover is ample. For the next three years we should determine to see how many cases there are that require mortgages at one-half, and how many can be relieved with the first million and a half. If we find that of no use, then next year or the year afterwards this House might consider how much further they should go in this respect; but if you go to two-thirds, and give advances of £5,000 the first year, you will have more than one million and a half applied for; and, believing you will have more than that number, it is fair we should start with a perfectly safe cover, and take over only those mortgages we know we shall lose nothing upon. We can test the feeling of the country, and test what demand there will be for these advances. I support the measure in so far as it relates to advances to our Crown tenants. That, I think, is a proper mode of coming to them; and, if it is fair to advance two-thirds on freehold, then I say it would be fair to advance two-thirds on improvements of Crown tenants if you make the demand that, as you make that advance, during the ensuing year the tenant should make at least one-third more improvements on that land. If you

10.0. safeguard it in that respect, I think you can make a greater cover than one-half of the amount of the loan to the Crown tenants, and it would only be prospectively for the improvements they would make. It is these people who should be assisted; but, with the two-thirds limit in the Bill, and the increase of the advances up to a maximum of £5,000, I am strongly of opinion that the Government had no great desire so much to come to the assistance of the really bonâ fide struggling working-men who have gone on their own lands as to come to the assistance of the rich class of farmers, who, as I said before, should be allowed to deal with the private money-lenders. At any rate, it is in the interests of the Crown that it should come to the assistance of those who most need it, and I am sure that the whole of the million and a half available for the first year would be fully absorbed by the smaller holders. I have always been opposed to the Board that the honourable gentleman proposes to set up. I think that, if we safeguard this measure to the extent of advancing up to one-half, the Public Trust Office could do all the work that is necessary, with additional assistance. At any rate, it does appear to me we are going to set up a huge office that will become very expensive; and, with regard to the employment of solicitors in different centres, having solicitors in New Zealand to do the Land Transfer work, I do not think that will work out so well as the honourable gentleman thinks. It will, I think, fall into the hands of very large firms. And, with regard to the Valuers, I think we should not have a separate Board for valuation, but that it should be partly done by the Land- and Income-tax Department. Altogether, I am distinctly opposed to the Bill. I support the title—I think it is a very catchy title. We have had a good many catchy things put before the House this session, but, singularly enough, I have not been able to catch on to them. I do not know whether my views have undergone any change, or whether the views of the Liberal party have undergone any change, but, at any rate, it appears to me that measures of this kind are simply a kind of plunging expedition. If one will not catch on with the country, then they say, "We will try another"; and by throwing out baits throughout the country to the Liberal party, they may be able to keep place and power in the country. I do not think that should be the true line for the Liberal party to go on. I think, if they went on the lines which were laid down by the late Mr. Ballance in 1890 they would retain office longer, they would be stronger, and the whole country would benefit far more than it is likely to do under this "wild-cat" proposal. I shall have very great pleasure indeed in voting against the measure.

Mr. PERE.—I wish to make some remarks in regard to this Bill. I am in favour of the clause which proposes to lend money to the farmers for the improvement of their lands. I shall be very glad indeed if this Bill is made to apply to the Natives as well, because I think hitherto it is only the Europeans that have enjoyed these privileges. Well, the Natives now desire that they also should share these privileges. They have found that the banks and private companies are not desirable parties to deal with, because they often have to pay up to 9 or 10 per cent. for loans from these institutions; besides, they (the Natives) are not allowed sufficient time within which to pay off these loans. As the law now stands, also, the banks are not able to advance moneys to Natives. I think, whether you pass this Bill or not, the Government will always lend money to the Natives. I think it is quite right that loans should be given to poor people only, and some one appointed who will be responsible for the administration of such moneys, and who will see that the moneys are repaid. I have not yet seen a person in New Zealand who has made improvements to his land and has not borrowed money, either from private companies or from some bank; even persons who have money go and borrow money from these monetary institutions. Therefore I wish very much that this clause in particular should be made to apply to the Natives, because Parliament now proposes to rate Native lands. Well, if they are going to do that, they ought also to give these Natives facilities for obtaining money to place them in such a position as will enable them to pay off these liabilities. I understand this House has approved of the imposition of rates on Native lands. I think those who have money ought to be allowed to borrow money from banks or from companies, and so reserve these privileges for those who have not the means to pay all their debts—that is, the settlers and those who have no money. Let those who have money in the banks or companies go to such institutions for money. I do not think it is fair to let these people enjoy the privileges under this Bill, to the exclusion of the Natives. It would be far better to exclude these people from the enjoyment of these privileges. No doubt some of those persons who object to this Bill have vested interests in these companies or banks. I must call the attention of honourable members again to the case of the Bank of New Zealand. I myself suffered a good deal in connection with that bank. These banking institutions have losses of their own, and if any calamity falls upon any of them their usual practice is to hunt up all their customers and get them to pay up. Besides, they do not fix any special time for the loans. When they found circumstances were not favourable they would only give their customers twelve months, and at the end of that time they would give them notice to pay up. Well, those persons who desire to deal with these institutions ought to be allowed to do as they like, and let others who cannot afford to do that go to the Government and borrow money, and let the Maoris also borrow money from the Government. I shall consider it a great injustice indeed to the Natives if they are not allowed to share in the privileges which are proposed to be given under this Bill, because, as I remarked just now, they are to have rates imposed upon their lands. These lands are generally not improved to any great extent. I think, therefore, that the proposal made by the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Crowther) is a very fair one—namely, to allow this Bill to go into Committee in order to have amendments introduced. In days gone by members of this House used to get up and talk about the poor people, and express sympathy with them. In those days the poor people outside this House had great influence on the members, simply because those members were afraid that these poor people might vote against them at the next election. But now that the Government has introduced a Bill proposing to borrow money from the London market in order to lend to these poor people I find honourable members objecting to this Bill. This is my word to those people who are not very well off: Never you vote for members who oppose this Bill; because they have forgotten their old sympathy for you. I shall not have much more to say in regard to this Bill now, Sir, but, in conclusion, I wish to say that I do hope that the Natives will be allowed to share in the privileges proposed to be conferred under this measure. Let the rich people vote for the banks. No doubt some honourable members are directly interested in these banks. I do not wish the Maori people to help these people to acquire wealth. I really think, if this plan of the Government succeeds, the Maoris will have no difficulty in effecting improvements on their lands, and this House will no longer say that the Native people are too lazy to work, and will no longer say, "Let us take the Maori lands." Honourable members who make such remarks ought to be ashamed of themselves, because it is this very Chamber that has made these laws, placing restrictions on the Native people, and which has also introduced legislation to tie up the Maori lands. And, Sir, having tied up these lands so that the Natives could do nothing with them, these persons quietly remark, "These are very lazy people"; and they further say, "Let us make a Rating Bill, so as to force these people to work." Now, this is my word to you: The Maori people will not pay rates. You will see the Government by-and-by going with a force of soldiers to arrest the Maoris. I am telling you the truth. If the Maoris are allowed a voice in the administration of their lands I think something will be done. Look at my Bill now before the House. What has been the fate of that Bill? The Government have kicked it out. The reason of that is that you European people do not wish the laws to be made in the interests of the Maori people, or as the Maoris wish. Your great desire is to make the law as complicated as possible to the Maori people, so as to force them to part with their lands. The result of this will be that they will be reduced to the condition of the Natives of the South Island, who are year after year asking for paltry favours from the Government. I am inclined to think that it is the wish of this House to reduce the Natives to a state of poverty.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. PERE.—But I say, Yes. Look at the heavy rates that have been imposed upon the Native lands. There are three distinct Native rates. I am inclined to vote for that part of the Bill which proposes to borrow money to lend to settlers, but I shall endeavour in Committee to introduce such amendments as to make it as easy as possible. I should advise honourable members not to continue saying that the passing of this measure will bring injury to the banks and companies, for I think that those persons interested in banks and companies ought to be able to look after their institutions. I have therefore decided to fall into the hands of the Government; but with regard to these rates on Native lands I do wish the Government would remove them. Let the Government first make advances to the Natives, and, when the Natives have improved their lands, then by all means impose taxation on them. Sir, I think the discussion on this Bill ought to be brought to an end now.

Mr. O'REGAN.—Sir, I rise in accordance with the invitation extended to me in common with my brother members by my friend the Colonial Treasurer. He has very distinctly and courteously invited members of this House to do their best to help him to make this Bill a workable measure, and to improve it wherever practicable. It seems to me, Sir, that this measure is totally different from the scheme which was promulgated some years ago by the late Premier, Mr. Ballance. When first I heard of the proposed initiation of this scheme of cheap money I understood the Government were to take the place of agents for capitalists at Home. I think that was the scheme propounded some years ago by the present Public Trustee, Mr. Warburton, in a memorandum to the late Premier. However, I find that the Treasurer, in delivering his Financial Statement, intimates that he proposes to borrow £1,500,000 per annum. It seems to me that the title of the Bill is somewhat misleading, because it is, after all, only those who have good security to offer who will be able to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill. I think, therefore, the Bill could have been more appropriately called "The Advances to Well-to-do Settlers Bill." It would certainly be a very risky thing for the Government to advance money on bad security: hence I take it for granted that under the provisions of this Bill, if it becomes law in its present form, the money will be only advanced to those persons who have good security to offer. And, after all, are those the people who are most deserving of assistance? Certainly not. The 11.0. people who most deserve assistance are not those who will be assisted by this Bill. I do not agree with the contentions of some honourable members, notably the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, that the effect of the Bill will be to cause a land-boom. If such were the case, that alone would be sufficient to condemn the Bill. But with the operation of the graduated land-tax, and the uncertainty which obtains as to the future, I think there is very little fear of a boom in land-values. I think, however, the Bill will have what I might term a stimulating effect—that it will have the same effect upon farming as protective duties have upon manufactures and industries. If protective duties are imposed on manufactured goods, the effect is to induce a large number of people to engage in manufactures, and so to encourage industry by a hothouse process, and bring about a subsequent period of exhaustion. I think this Bill will have the effect, owing to its catchy description as offering "cheap money to settlers," of inducing a larger number of people to go on the land than would be the case under normal circumstances. Many people will then embark in what is at best a risky enterprise, they will take up more land than they can profitably utilise, they will produce more than they can find a market for, and the end will probably be disastrous. I fail to understand the reasoning of the honourable member for Patea. In speaking on this Bill the other evening, he took it as a proof that the contention which he, in common with others on the opposite side of the House, has upheld during the last three years—namely, that the effect of the Government policy is to raise interest—is verified by this measure. I would like honourable members who take up that position to explain it. We have been told on the best authority—because it comes from honourable gentlemen on the Opposition benches—that capital is being scared out of the country. Yet those honourable gentlemen tell us that the rate of interest is rising. I take it as an economic truth that interest is to capital what wages are to labour. If we want to encourage capital to come into the country, the very thing we have to do is to raise the interest. But I do not think that the operation of this Bill will be to reduce interest. The Government can only enter into competition with private people to a very limited extent. I by no means agree in the abuse which is sometimes levelled by honourable members in the House and out of it at the money-lenders. The rate of interest is governed not by the money-lenders, but by what the people are willing to give—by public competition; and, if the Government were to advance money under the provisions of this Bill upon the bad security which private money-lenders do advance upon, they would certainly have to fix a higher rate of interest than that stated in this Bill. High interest must always obtain with bad security; the worse the security the higher the interest. It is utterly ridiculous for people to say that those who are under the thumb of money-lending companies will be able to get assistance under the Bill, because I do not think the Government can safely release mortgages; neither do they propose to enter into competition with those who do pay a higher rate of interest—namely, those who have bad security. It is only those who are able to give good security whom they will be able to advance money to, and consequently it is erroneous to say that they will ever enter into competition with private individuals. I do not see how it can be sustained that, under the provisions of this Bill, interest is going to be lowered, or that the State is going to enter into competition more than to a limited extent with private money-lenders. It seems to me that what the farmers do want is not cheap money so much as a market for their produce. I have always understood, and no doubt it is a fact, that high interest obtains in times of prosperity. High interest and high wages go together, and they are both convertible terms for prosperity. What the farmers really do want is a market for their produce. Give them that, and they will need no help from the Government. Will this Bill give them that? Certainly not. Will the provisions of this Bill find employment for the people? Certainly not.

Mr. REEVES.—Will any Bill?

Mr. O'REGAN.—"Will any Bill?" asks the honourable gentleman. What we want is employment for the people and a market for the produce of our farmers. This Bill will not give that; therefore it must fall short of what is expected from it. Then, it must be remembered that this Government is pre-eminently a farmers' Government.

AN HON. MEMBER.—No.

MR. O'REGAN.—I am not at all surprised to hear the honourable gentleman opposite saying that; but the fact remains that the legislation which has been passed by the Liberal party since the election of 1890 has been largely in the interests of the farmers. Honourable members may talk as they like about labour legislation, but I say that to a great extent that is a delusion and a sham. It can do no good for those who want work, no matter how beneficial it may be to those who have work. The crucial feature in the Government policy has been to effect a change in the incidence of taxation. Who have been the gainers but the owners of land? It cannot be denied that the farmers have been large gainers. This is a matter for commendation; but there are others in the colony besides farmers or landowners in general. We have had no reduction in taxation for the masses, but we have had a change which is undeniably a distinct gain to the farmers.

Captain RUSSELL.—No.

MR. O'REGAN.—“No,” says the honourable member for Hawke's Bay; but he must know that that is correct, and that the farmers are the great gainers under the system of exempting improvements; and, more than that, the farmers have been conciliated to an undue extent by giving them an exemption of £500 on the unearned increment.

Captain RUSSELL.—The people in the towns gain far more than the people in the country by the exemption of improvements.

MR. O'REGAN.—I am speaking with reference to the £500 exemption of unearned increment, and not of improvements. I do not wish to say this in any way disparaging to the farmers, because the principle of exemption of improvements is one I thoroughly believe in. Neither do I say, by any means, that this cheap-money scheme is going to benefit the farmers. It is not going to help the farmers who deserve help most. It is only going to benefit the wealthy—those who have security to offer. Even if I agreed with the principle to the same extent that some honourable members do who are going to move amendments in Committee, I certainly would say that £5,000 is too high a limit of security. A man who has £5,000 security to offer is always able to get money at a reasonable rate. It is the small owner who is not able to get money at his own terms—he has to take the terms offered by the money-lender. Therefore it is entirely wrong to suppose that the small farmer, with £200 or £300, or even £500 security, will be on the same footing as the man with £5,000 security to offer. Speaking on the cheap-money scheme, the Colonial Treasurer, in the Budget, says,—

“If, for example, approved loans amounted to £500,000, then inscribed stock for this sum only would be issued. After careful consideration, it seems to me to be infinitely the best plan to obtain the money directly on behalf of the colony, and for the colony to hold the securities against the advances that may be made. The greatest good will in this way be conferred upon those requiring money at low rates of interest. It is intended that a Lending Board should be set up, with certain defined powers. To stipulate that these advances should only be made upon a 50-per-cent. valuation would, in my opinion, entirely neutralise any general good that the scheme is intended to confer. I am of opinion that land-values have generally in this colony reached their minimum. There are, of course, exceptional cases where owners adhere to higher values than the land is really worth; but I think I am right in saying that land may not in the future be expected to further depreciate in value, and as population increases, and the country becomes settled, the acreage value of land, now at bed-rock, must show a tendency to rise in proportion.”

That may be perfectly correct, but the other day we passed the Rating on Unimproved Value Bill, giving to local bodies power to exempt improvements from taxation, and to raise all their revenue from the unimproved value only. I do not know yet whether that Bill is going to become law; but let us suppose that it does become law; let us suppose a local body taking advantage of its provisions; let us suppose that all the rates in a county are levied on the unimproved value only. Let us suppose, before that is done—and this is quite possible—that certain landholders in that district have borrowed money from the Government under this Bill: what would be the effect of such a change in the incidence of taxation? It simply would be to tax away the security of the State. The two measures are contradictory. The honourable gentleman says he does not expect land-values to further depreciate, and yet we have already passed a Bill which, if it becomes law and is adopted by the ratepayers, must inevitably depreciate land-values, and so undermine the very security the State has for its advances. I was somewhat surprised to hear the Colonial Treasurer say in his speech that he considered the man whose land was raised in value by the exertions of his neighbour would be very foolish indeed if he did not raise money under the provisions of this Bill on the unearned increment so created. It seems to me the honourable gentleman does not understand the position, because, under the circumstances that I have referred to, you would simply tax away the security of the State. I am quite willing to give my honourable friend credit for the very best intentions, but it seems to me that it is, after all, a step in the dark; but, if he is going to pass the Bill, I would ask him to reduce considerably the limit of value on which money can be advanced; otherwise this Bill will be most unequal in its application, and I am very much afraid it will land us in disaster. We are taking too many steps in the dark. The utmost care should be exercised in dealing with this question. Sir, I am emphatically opposed to the Bill in its entirety. It is idle for honourable members to say they will vote for the second reading and move amendments in Committee; because they will make no radical alteration in Committee. I would gladly support any scheme for encouraging land-settlement, but cannot support a delusive measure such as this is. The Bill seems to me to offer no relief to the most deserving settlers. It is manifestly inconsistent with the Rating on Unimproved Value Bill recently passed by this House, and it is calculated to buoy up intending settlers with false hopes—hopes which can never be realised; and it will place this colony in a very awkward position at Home, in so far that it will damage our credit if we go to raise more money. It must be remembered that already we have given authority to the Government to borrow a quarter of a million of money to buy Native land, a quarter of a million to buy private land for settlement, and a quarter of a million for roads and bridges. We may juggle about terms as much as we like, but it is best to tell the truth at all costs. This certainly means extensive borrowing. If we go in for such extravagant borrowing, after our recent boast of a self-reliant and non-borrowing policy, I think the result will be fatal to our credit at Home.

Mr. SEDDON.—It only requires the single-tax to finish it.

Mr. O'REGAN.—The honourable gentleman says it only requires the single-tax to finish it. He evidently is endeavouring to be satirical. The honourable gentleman understands very little about the single-tax. If he understood more about it, it would be to the interests of himself and his colleagues and of the country, because it would save us from risky legislation of this character.

Captain RUSSELL.—Just a word in personal explanation. The honourable member for Inangahua is under the impression that I said the cheap-money scheme would boom the colony. I have just by chance got my Harvard proof, and here is what I said: "The object, of course, of the Government in the cheap-money scheme is to boom the colony." That was not what I said, but what the Government thought, would result from this scheme.

Mr. O'REGAN.—I accept the honourable gentleman's explanation.

Mr. MASSEY.—When the honourable member for Bruce spoke some little time ago I thought so much had been said that there was really very little left for me to say. While I agree with the principle laid down by previous speakers on both sides of the House—namely, that it is desirable that those settlers requiring borrowed money should be enabled to get it as cheaply as possible—I feel a certain amount of hesitation about going in for such a wholesale borrowing proposal as is contained in the present Bill. Nine or ten years ago perhaps such a Bill as this would have been useful, and welcome, because at that time the rates of interest were very much higher than they are at present. We all know that they have been gradually getting lower, until, as the Colonial Treasurer admitted only a few evenings ago, money can now be got on first-class freehold security for 5 or 6 per cent., or even less than that. I have heard honourable members, in speaking on the Bill, complaining about banks charging 9 or 10 per cent. But this Bill will not prevent that, because banks do not lend money on mortgage. They lend money to business-men by way of overdraft; and, as a matter of fact, there is nothing to prevent men from mortgaging their land, borrowing money at the rate of 5 per cent., and relending at 20 per cent.—that is, supposing they can get an opportunity. We have been told by different speakers that the settlers generally are very much in favour of this Bill; but by to-night's mail I received a letter from a very prominent settler in the Auckland Province, which throws a little light on the subject. I am quite willing to give the settler's name. This is what he says: "The farmers themselves do not approve of the scheme of lending to farmers. Any amount of money can be obtained on first-class security in Auckland at the present time at 5 per cent."

An Hon. MEMBER.—What is the name?

Mr. MASSEY.—The name is Matthew Kirkbride: he is President of the Auckland Agricultural Association, and a very well known settler in the Auckland Province. When honourable members talk about settlers paying 8 or 9 per cent. by way of interest on mortgage, they are either exaggerating or talking about some exceptional case, where the security is not good, and where the borrower has to pay for the badness of the security. As the honourable member for Inangahua told us a few minutes ago, the worse the security the higher will be the rate of interest. Now, it seems to me that the only people who will be benefited by this Bill will be the leaseholders from the Crown—the tenants of the Crown—the people who wish to borrow money on their improvements. Well, improvements are not generally considered first-class security, because, if a man falls behind with his rent and is not able to pay it, the Government may enter upon the land and take possession of the land, improvements and all. Consequently, if a capitalist lends money on the security of improvements, he will require a rather high rate of interest for it. In any case, if a man has to pay rent for land, and interest on improvements, and to keep his buildings insured in the way provided for in the present Bill, it will take him all his time to keep his head above water; and I am inclined to think that we shall make a great many losses where leaseholders and Crown tenants are concerned. But, Sir, what the settlers specially object to even more than paying a high rate of interest on mortgage is the high cost of expenses connected with the raising of the loans; and I am glad to see that in this Bill it is proposed to make the expenses as light as possible. I consider that to be the best feature in connection with the Bill. Then, about the land-tax which is at present paid on mortgages. The State will lose that, because we cannot compel the British bondholder to pay it, and there is no provision to make the mortgagor responsible. Land mortgaged to individuals resident in the colony will still continue to be taxed, but land that is mortgaged to the State on which British money is invested will escape taxation. That is the position. If we borrow money under this scheme to relend on mortgage, that money will escape taxation unless we tax the mortgagor. If we tax the mortgage we raise the rate of interest by $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., or nearly so. If we do not do that, then $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. should be added to the rate of interest, because by the State becoming the mortgagor we lose the tax at present paid. For every million and a half which we borrow we lose £6,250 per annum in land-tax. Now, I do not know whether that is satisfactory. At all events, judging—

Mr. WARD.—Is that after deducting exemptions?

Mr. MASSEY.—No.

Mr. WARD.—Well, why not deduct them first?

Mr. MASSEY.—How are you going to deduct them? Judging by the fact that we had to collect the land-tax four months in advance, I do not think the Treasurer can afford to part with the revenue in this way. Then about the proportion to lend. According to the Bill it is proposed to lend money to the extent of two-thirds of the value. Well, Sir, it seems to me that two-thirds is too much; 50 per cent. would be quite sufficient for all purposes. We have no guarantee, as has been pointed out, that land is at present at bed-rock prices. In fact, if the prices for produce continue as low as they are at the present time, and this unsettling policy continues, we may have land even lower in value than it is now. People who have money and would naturally invest it in land are afraid to do so. They see that the landowners are treated as if they were the natural enemies of other members of the community. They see that land is taxed, and realised wealth in other forms is allowed to escape. They see that the landowners are taxed, and that other people better able to pay are exempted; and they come to the conclusion that land is not a good form of investment, and wisely decide to leave it severely alone. I think the honourable member for Inangahua, when speaking just now, stated that landowners were petted, or something of that sort, because they were exempted to the extent of £500. The honourable member forgets that, while the landowner is exempted to the extent of £500, other members of the community are exempted to the extent of £300 upon income. Capitalise that at 5 per cent.—a very moderate rate of interest—and you get £6,000. That is, the landowner is exempted to the extent of £500, and other members of the community to the extent of £6,000.

An Hon. MEMBER.—And all improvements.

Mr. MASSEY.—And all improvements; I admit that. Now, if a capitalist five years ago had lent his money to the extent of two-thirds of the value of land, I ask, how would he stand to-day? Why, he would be left with a large amount of unsaleable property, and with a great deal of his capital gone. We have no guarantee that the same thing is not going to happen during the next five years that has happened during the past. We have lately seen financial institutions of the colony shaken to their foundations, especially those financial institutions that have had anything to do with land, and at the same time these institutions had the advantage of being managed by men of lifelong experience, and of very great ability. I do not mean to say that we are rushing in where angels fear to tread, but I do think that we are rushing in where better men have failed. We have been reminded that we are able to manage State railways, State steamships, State printing-offices, State farms, and we know we have gone a long way towards a State bank. But I think we ought to draw the line at a State pawnshop. Now, we have heard a great deal about the evils of absenteeism, and I think there is one point on which all are agreed—that it is not well to encourage the holding of land by absentees. Well, if we borrow five millions, and invest it in lands—and five millions will not go very far in connection with this scheme—then we are selling five millions' worth of our land to the British capitalists, and giving them a title to it for all time. They become our landlords to that extent, and we shall become their tenants; and I need hardly remind the House that they will require their rents, and they will want them regularly. For every million and a half which we borrow at 4 per cent.—and I think it has been made quite clear that the money will cost that—we shall have to send £40,000 per annum out of the colony. Now, at the present time we have a great deal of difficulty in making ends meet—in keeping our expenditure within our income. We know for a fact that interest is partly paid with borrowed money, and the more we send away the worse it will be for us. Another objection I have to the Bill is that it increases the functions of the State by another department, and another batch of Civil servants. According to the Bill we are to have a Superintendent and a Deputy Superintendent, who are naturally to have a number of clerks and assistants. Then, in introducing the Bill the Treasurer told us that we were to have ten Solicitors at £700 a year, I think, and ten Valuers at £600; and each of these persons will require clerks and assistants, and they will have travelling-expenses.

Mr. WARD.—I did not say anything of the sort.

Mr. MASSEY.—You stated that we were going to have ten Valuers at £600, and ten Solicitors at £700. I am quite clear on that point.

Mr. WARD.—I did not say what you have stated.

Mr. MASSEY.—I am repeating the impression I received, at all events. That means more patronage for the Government, of course, and a great deal more expense for the unfortunate taxpayer. Why, Sir, it would take 1 per cent. of the whole of the money we intend to put through to pay the salaries of the officials alone. I fancy that a very much simpler arrangement would have been for the State to guarantee loans to settlers up to 50 per cent. of the taxing-value, such loans not to exceed £1,000, and the interest not to exceed 5 per cent. By so doing the lender would have got the best possible security for his money, and the borrower would have been able to get money at the lowest possible rate, and there would have been no expense to the colony. I have noticed that some of the covenants and conditions in connection with the Bill are particularly stringent and unnecessarily severe. For instance, it is provided in one of the covenants that, if a man is behind in interest to the extent of fourteen days after due date, the Government or their representative may enter upon the land, take possession of it, and sell the man out. Now, I have referred to the clause relating to that question in the Land Transfer Act, and I find it is provided there that the mortgagee cannot enter upon any land until the mortgagor has been two months in default: that is, after thirty-one days he may give the mortgagor notice, and after another thirty days he may enter upon the land and take possession. Thus, while the private lender is compelled to allow the mortgagor two months, the paternal Government only allows fourteen days, and gives no notice at that. Another clause which I have an objection to is clause 43, I think, where it is provided that if a man is able to reduce the amount he owes he is only to be allowed 4 per cent. for the amount of the reduction, but is charged 5 per cent. on the principal. For instance, if a man owes £1,000, and pays off £100, he is allowed 4 per cent. on the £100, but is charged 5 per cent. on the £1,000. I submit there is not much encouragement in that to cause a man to pay up, or to endeavour to reduce his debt.

11.30. When I first read of this scheme in the Budget I was inclined to regard it favourably; but after discovering how many objectionable features the Bill contains, and how much can be said against it, I have come to the conclusion that to bring it into operation would be detrimental to the best interests of the country. I am as anxious as any one to see that the settlers should get the benefit of cheap money, but I cannot approve of this scheme, because I feel certain, if we save a little in the way of interest, we shall lose a great deal more in other directions. If we do a little less in the way of law-making, and a little more in the way of developing the resources of the colony on legitimate lines, and so restore confidence in the minds of those who have money at the present time, we shall be able to get money for even less than the Government are able to offer it for, and Bills of this character will be unnecessary.

Mr. DUNCAN.—I have just a word or two to say before the division is come to, and after the speeches we have had I think I shall not take up the time of the House very long. It has been asked, What reason is there for this Bill? Well, Sir, for the last fourteen years—at any rate, since I have had a seat in the House—it has been the cry with the farmers that they were badly treated in the way of negotiating mortgage loans; that they have been charged interest from 10 per cent. It is now actually down to 7 and 8 per cent. The bulk of the mortgages for small sums to-day are at 8 per cent. and more.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No, no.

Mr. DUNCAN.—Yes, they are, and especially those this Bill applies to. The small mortgages of £400 and £500 are standing at 8 per cent. to-day. And I can tell you more than that: for a short time, when the banks were calling up their capital to assist the Australian Colonies, you could not get a loan at all. There were many good investments, but no money was to be got on them at that time at any price.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The colony has been in that position before now.

Mr. DUNCAN.—We want to stop it from getting into that position. But we are not going to sit down and listen to those on the Opposition benches telling us what to do. When we have a majority in this House, we are to look to the people that put us here, and place them in such a position that they shall be never put in those difficulties again. This being the case, we must support the Government now when they are grappling with our difficulties and introducing such a scheme as this before us; we must assist ourselves by assisting the Government with their policy. This measure has been wanted from one end of the colony to the other, and there is not a man on the Opposition benches to-night who has not spoken in favour of cheap money, or in favour of the reduction of interest, which they know very well has been too high. Hardly a speaker but has made the statement that the interest on money is so much reduced that you can get it now at 5 and 6 per cent. If anybody is ready now to lend money at 5 per cent., I can find a few good investments in the district I come from which cannot be cavilled at. But there is not a single man on that side of the House or here who is ready to back up the statement and go into such a transaction to-morrow. That being so, we see the reason for this Bill; and had not this proposal come down in the Financial Statement the honourable member for Auckland City would be wanting 9½ per cent. instead of 5½ per cent. What did the honourable gentleman lend for months ago?

Mr. CROWTHER.—Five and a half per cent.

Mr. DUNCAN.—Where?

Mr. CROWTHER.—In the Waikato; not in Oamaru.

Mr. DUNCAN.—No. The honourable member for Auckland City thinks perhaps that Oamaru is a bad field for investment; but he would find the lands in that district much better than the sour swamps of the Waikato to invest his capital in. I know no honourable gentleman who has sketched out a better scheme than the Colonial Treasurer under this Bill. It may possibly be amended in Committee; but the Bill is a proper one at this juncture, and if ably carried out it will be a blessing to the whole colony. But we shall, of course, have to take the usual care with regard to the values in the several parts of the colony, so that we may not have any more Auckland swindles like the Globo Assets Company's. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) specially pointed to me and said, with regard to values, that the grain-growing districts had just come down to the level of the grazing districts. That I disagree with altogether. Although grain is at a low price, at the present time wool is at a low price. Wool and mutton may come down next month or next year.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—It is down now.

Mr. DUNCAN.—It may be, but the grain-growing districts will always hold values over and above the grazing districts. That, at least, is my opinion; and I think it is a sound one, because we shall always require food, at any rate, and therefore the best grain-growing districts will command a higher value than the grazing districts, because grain-growing districts are equally good for grazing, when you are not growing crops. When you have to renew your grass, of course a grain crop is a great consideration to save the expense, and sometimes make a profit. But I do not see how you are to work the advances on improvements under this Bill. With regard to loans to lessees on improvements, the provisions will have to be altered so as to be somewhat different from the clauses set out in the Bill, as they are perishable property. We should have it worked somehow in this way: that when, say, half the improvements have been put on—

Captain RUSSELL.—What would be the value of a white-pine house in thirty-six years?

Mr. DUNCAN.—It will not apply to improvements of that kind, because many improvements even on a farm will be worth very little at the end of that time, and the clause applying to that will have to be altered so that a term of ten years will be sufficient for advances upon improvements, and will need to be renewed at that time to make it fully safe. But, with regard to the value of land, there is no doubt in my mind that our best wheat-growing land will always keep about the average value, and that the money will be got more cheaply in London for this purpose than for any other; and to support this I have only to quote the senior member for Wellington City when he stated that the Cheviot loan was floated at a very low rate because it was a land investment. It is quite likely that the money for these investments will be got at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; and the proposal made for paying off is a very great inducement to any mortgagor, because he pays his 1 per cent. extra which goes to redeem the original mortgage sum, and in a few years' time, no doubt, a provision will be made that he may be able to pay off a part of his mortgage. The best part of the Bill, as the honourable member for Waitemata stated, is the arrangement under which the mortgage can be secured at first. At present, supposing a man wished to raise a mortgage of from £1,500 to £2,000, and supposing he had an overdraft at the bank, and the bank held his land as security—it matters not how good his security might be—by the time he released it from the bank and got his mortgage it would cost him up to the amount of £30. This money is thrown away. He has to pay the procuration fee, the valuation fee; he has to pay two lawyers, and by the time the accounts are made up it will amount to the sum I have named. Under this Bill I suppose £5 or £6 would cover the whole expense, so that will help to pay interest for half a year. I give the Treasurer my hearty support, and when the Bill is in Committee I will assist him to get it made a workable measure; and it will be hailed with satisfaction from one end of the colony to another, and I have no doubt it will be carried by a large majority.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON.—I hardly think I have anything new to say on this Bill, and consequently I shall say very little; but I attach so much importance to the principle in the Bill, and consider it as so excellent in its purpose, that I am unwilling to give a silent vote. Yet I do not think I should have spoken after all but for the fallacies—the unconscious fallacies, of course—of my friend the honourable member for Selwyn. And he stated these fallacies with his usual emphasis and ability. He quoted to the House more than once the statements made by Mr. Ballance in 1892 of his non-borrowing policy. I wish to speak with the utmost respect of those who are gone, but, while Mr. Ballance's views may have been suitable for 1892, it does not follow that these views would be suitable now. Statesmanship, where no principle is involved, is a system of adaptation to circumstances; and the only question for the House to determine is, Will this Bill help the settlers of the colony? If it will, then it should be supported; if it will not, then let it disappear. Then, my honourable friend chose to tell us that this Bill was a reintroduction of Vogel and all his works. Why, it is the very opposite. When Sir Julius Vogel was seeking election in 1884, immediately before the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) and he took office, he made a distinct promise that he would provide cheap money for farmers. In office he said the thing was not advisable, and they heard no more of it; but the necessity remains and has increased. Then, my honourable friend referred with his wonted enthusiasm to the old Nelson pioneers, who wanted no money from Government—who went on their sections in little more than rags and bags, moleskins and blue blouses. All honour to them! their self-denial was exemplary. But the State tenants on perpetual or eternal lease must just do the same thing. If I understand the Bill, it will only make advances to lessees upon their improvements: that is to say, when they have expended their little capital in making certain improvements they will get an advance thereupon to help them to make still more. I have been on the sick-list, and have not heard all or many of the speeches on the Bill; but perhaps the speech of my honourable friend the member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), which I did hear, might be accepted as a fair and able exposition of those opposed to the present proposals. For fervid opposition and extreme pessimism I am not likely to meet with its equal, unless indeed the speech of my honourable colleague (Mr. Earnshaw) may be classed in the same category. The honourable member for Wellington City was sure that Government loans must prove an absolute failure. Look, he said, at the Globo Assets, the Loan and Mercantile Agency Company, and Harper Brothers. Why, the first two institutions are both offshoots of that unscrupulous and discreditable ring which ran the Bank of New Zealand to bankruptcy. Of Harper Brothers the less said the better. Certainly, if the Government cannot manage with more honesty and care than the examples cited, it would be only wise to let the business alone: but I have no fears on this point. And, to my thinking, nothing is more desirable than to help the country settlers, who, year after year, are toiling hard and eating the bread of sorrow to find heavy interest for mortgagees, who do not press their victims out of existence only because to do so would be to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. I refer in this connection specially to financial institutions. This measure will not only give the mortgagors relief in a reduced payment of interest, but will also deliver them from the serfdom of an absolute control of some financial institution to which they must sell their produce, and from which they must buy their supplies. And in this special portion of the contract lie commission, storage, brokerage, discount, exchange, and all the other charges by which clients are mulcted in large sums for very small services. To all this I think it only due to my honourable friend the Colonial Treasurer to add that this Bill appears to me to be closely thought out, and able and comprehensive in its details—much more so than any Bill dealing with quite a new order of business generally is. Of course there will be mistakes, omissions, and commissions. It is quite impossible to strike off a complete measure at one heat; only practical operation can show that there may be too much in one place and too little in another. I am not going to refer to the objections taken to details; they have been already iterated and reiterated, and there is, no doubt, a good deal in some of them. I may just say that I agree with those who object to lending such large amounts as £5,000 in one sum. I am not prepared to say that there might not be cases in which it would be proper to advance such a sum; but it is the struggling settler whose interests I am concerned for. Again, going to London for money I most heartily dislike, but I fear remonstrance with the Colonial Treasurer on this point is hopeless. Yet I see no difficulty in finding the money in the colony. The phrase, "a bale of paper and a printing-press," which was long sneered at by our so-called financiers, is now forgotten, but it might be turned to good account. I fail to see why State debentures could not be used for financial purposes. A State debenture seems to me as good as a Bank of New Zealand note, and, indeed, a good deal better. But, without going any further, I record my conviction that if this Bill is passed into law it will confer a great boon upon the colony, and many a struggling settler will have cause to congratulate himself upon having a load of care and anxiety lifted off his mind.

Mr. PIRANI.—Although, Sir, I intend to vote for the second reading of the Bill, I am not like my honourable friend the member for Waitemata, who has been converted from being a supporter of the Bill to being an opponent of the measure by the arguments he heard during the debate.

Mr. MASSEY.—I never said so.

Mr. PIRANI.—That is a fact.

Mr. MASSEY.—No.

Mr. PIRANI.—At any rate, the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Crowther) will admit there is some merit in the discussion on a Bill if it will have the effect of changing a man's opinions thereon. At the same time, I believe in the principle of cheap money to farmers, and in following that out I am only following out the principle initiated by the late Mr. Ballance, when he carried out his scheme of lending money to village settlers. Not only did he advocate it, but he carried it out to the extent of a liability of £60,000 on the colony. Although I believe in cheap money to farmers, I do not for a moment believe in the system laid down by this Bill. It has been said in the course of this debate that one objection to the scheme is the large losses incurred by private companies. I hold that is one of the strongest arguments in favour of this Bill. Private companies, which have been lending money at the same time as the Government Insurance Department and the Public Trust Office, have lost large sums of money, and, in many instances, have forfeited almost their entire capital, while these Government institutions, which provide necessary safeguards, have been able to lend their money at actual profit, and not at a loss at all. Another argument against this Bill has been that the margin allowed between the interest we are to pay for the money and the interest at which we are to lend it to borrowers is not sufficient to cover the expenses. Now, considering that the Public Trust Office lends its money out at a margin of 10s. per £100 to cover all expenses, and makes a profit on the investment, I think that is a proof that Government institutions can manage to lend money profitably at a margin of 1½ per cent. Another argument used against the Bill was the fact of Messrs. Harper, as was stated, losing the money they received for investment. If the Superintendent of this cheap-money scheme is going to follow the system adopted by Messrs. Harper, undoubtedly he will lose the money he borrows; but I do not think anybody is foolish enough to suppose that he is going to transfer the money to his private account and "do out of it" those who have lent it to the colony for investment. That is as ridiculous an argument as could have been urged against the Bill. One thing in the Bill I object to is the proposal to appoint Valuers. We have in connection with the Government departments now many men who are quite able to value these properties. For instance, I might mention the Crown Lands Rangers, who every day of their lives have to make valuations pretty nearly the same as are proposed under this Bill. Another dangerous proposal contained in this Bill is to create a number of Crown lawyers. The time, I hope, will yet come when we shall be able to do without lawyers altogether; but the principle in this Bill is to appoint a number of permanent lawyers, who will be a drag upon the progress of this measure. We should reduce to a minimum the number of lawyers it will be necessary to employ. And I do not like the proposal to appoint so many officials at £1,000 a year each, with prospective billets to others at high rates of salary. If simple forms of lending the money are devised, and the titles are brought under the Land Transfer Act, there cannot be any danger, and the work can be performed by the officers at present in the employment of the Government, with the assistance of solicitors brought in now and again when required. The proposal in this Bill to lend on leasehold is a perfectly fallacious one, and I cannot understand whoever framed the Bill supposing that any such proposal would be effective to allow of money being lent on leasehold. If you turn to section 42 you will see that one of the conditions of lending money on these leaseholds is that "All covenants and conditions on the lessee's part contained or implied in the lease are complied with." Now, what are the covenants? One is that the lessee must live on the land for ten years; and do you mean to say he is to wait for ten years before he can take advantage of this Bill? Another covenant is that for six successive years he must make certain improvements. Are none of those settlers who have effected their improvements prior to that period to take advantage of the Bill? It seems to me that provision is simply a catch, and it would be much better for the Bill and for the perpetual-lease holders if this class were left entirely out of the Bill, and they were enabled to raise money by means of the Trustee Act Amendment Bill introduced at an earlier part of the session. There is also no provision in that part of the Bill in reference to the leases or licenses on the system known as occupation with a right to purchase. We know very well that in the last Land Bill this system was substituted for the old perpetual lease; and I do not see why selectors who take up land, and cannot get their title for twelve years, should not be able to get money just as well as people who hold land under perpetual lease with a right to purchase, or a lease in perpetuity. Besides, it seems to me that throughout the Bill there are many evidences of careless and loose drafting. In clause 31 there is a provision intended to prevent the Treasurer from selling the bonds under an amount which would realise

4 per cent.; but by the careless drafting of that provision it prevents anybody who holds bonds or debentures under this Act from selling them under par, providing they are raised at 4 per cent. Does anybody suppose for a minute that such a ridiculous provision should be imposed?

Mr. WARD.—It is absolutely necessary.

Mr. PIRANI.—The Treasurer says it is absolutely necessary. I should like to ask him how, before the sale and transfer of these bonds,—which can be transferred in the ordinary way,—is he going to find out the price the seller quits the bonds for? Is he going to ask every transferee what he takes for his bonds? Or is it simply intended to apply to the Government themselves selling these bonds? If it is simply intended to apply to the Government alone, then the Government should say so and make it clear, and not leave it in the loose way it is provided for in this clause. It seems to me, Sir, that this Bill has undergone a sort of process of evolution. When the Colonial Treasurer spoke at Oamaru he gave us to understand that the lines under which this scheme was to be promoted were clearly laid down, and that it was not to interfere with any financial institution, and the Government had fully determined on the course they were going to take. In the Governor's Speech this paragraph occurs:—

"Some effort should now be made by which the Government, without incurring dangerous obligations, may aid private enterprise to avail themselves, on reasonable terms, of the vast supplies of English capital, the holders of which are only awaiting openings for secure investments."

This Bill does not seem much like private enterprise availing itself on reasonable terms of the vast supplies of English capital. It is more like the Government, instead of private enterprise, availing itself of the opportunity of getting cheap money. The Colonial Treasurer, in his speech at Oamaru, told us that the money was only to be lent on freehold. Under the Bill we have several other securities: and in his Financial Statement, also, he tells us the money is to be raised by means of inscribed stock. But the Bill gives us not only land-bonds but the raising of money by debentures, and after it has been raised by loan we are to go through the expensive process of converting it into inscribed stock. I think the first suggestions of the Colonial Treasurer very much better than those brought down in this Bill, and I am very sorry indeed to see that he has so far departed from his original proposals as to put forth the objectionable details we have before us in the present Bill. I think, if the Government had confined the borrowing entirely to acting as agents for those who wanted to get money, by establishing an office in this colony and another office in London, by means of which settlers could get advances on their mortgages with the Government guarantee, that would not create the alarm that is bound to be created in the minds of capitalists in the Home-country when we go before them with a proposal for a million-and-a-half loan every year for Goodness knows how many years. That is not only likely to do harm to the colony in connection with these loans themselves, but will damage our credit at Home, and will undoubtedly scare a good many investors from sending their money to the colony independently of the Government. There is another feature in the Bill which I think a mistake, and that is making the term of these loans thirty-six years and a half. Considering the manner in which interest is coming down at Home, it is beyond question that within twenty years the rates of interest will be very much lower than they are at the present day; and I think if we limited the time to twenty years it would be much better than to commit ourselves to pay 4 or 3½ per cent. to those who lend the money, for the next thirty-six years and a half. There is also a difficulty that will occur through persons who are able to pay back their loans being compelled to make a loss on their repayments of 1 per cent. That is a difficulty that should not be allowed to interpose between the success and non-success of a scheme like this, and it is a crude method of allowing borrowers to pay off their encumbrances. It will have the effect of putting a burden on these people, because we are borrowing for an extended period, and if their loans were shortened to twenty years it would enable the Government to make a difference in this respect, and would not impose such a heavy burden on settlers as compelling them to pay 1 per cent. for thirty-six years and a half. The question of cheap money has undoubtedly been a part of the Government policy. It was advocated before the election by the Premier at New Plymouth, and during the recess by the Colonial Treasurer at Oamaru, and there is no doubt that in accordance with those pledges the Government were bound to bring down some scheme for carrying out the principle of cheap money to farmers. I dare say we shall be able, in Committee, to do a great deal in the direction of modifying the objectionable features of the scheme; and if we can do that, and make the Bill a more reasonable and more workable measure than it appears to be at present, I have no doubt it will be conducive to the best interests of the settlers of the colony.

Mr. MASSEY.—I wish, Sir, to make a personal explanation. The honourable member for Palmerston has stated that I told the House I was first of all in favour of the Bill, but that my opinions had been changed by the arguments I heard used against it. What I told the House was this: When I first heard of the proposal I was inclined to regard it with favour, but, after studying the Bill and perceiving how many objectionable features it contained, I came to the conclusion that it would be detrimental to the best interests of the colony if it became law.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The honourable gentleman who has just sat down has told us that the cheap-money scheme was part of the policy put before the colony during the last election, and he instanced as a proof of this that the Premier mentioned the proposal at New Plymouth. He could have gone a little further and stated that the Government tried to sound the opinion of the colony in more ways than this one; but in what manner?—By flying pilot-balloons, first one method, and then another. One of these was put before the colony by the organ in this city which represents the great Liberal party, the principle being that the Government should simply take up the position of agent for the English money-lender, and that it should itself undertake none of the responsibility involved in this Bill at all;—a very different position altogether. For my own part, knowing the difficulties of country settlers, my sympathy must necessarily be with them in their need for cheap money; but I have never been able to see that it would be safe for a colony like this, so heavily indebted as it already is to the foreign money-lender, to go into the money-market for the purpose of borrowing to lend to settlers afterwards. Reference has been made to the great losses sustained by companies and individuals who have in the past lent money to country settlers, and to others; but it has been stated, I think, by the honourable member for Oamaru that the Government would be in a safer position than would a company or private individual, and as a proof of that he instanced the small losses sustained by the Government Life Insurance Department and the Public Trustee. Sir, these institutions have not been lending money to settlers for a sufficiently long period to admit of our judging what their losses may yet be. It is absolutely impossible yet to say how the current investments of these two institutions in the shape of mortgages will eventually wash out: in fact, no one can say that their losses may not eventually be very much heavier, when the current engagements terminate. And it must be recollected that these two institutions have lent money in altogether different circumstances from those that are proposed in the present Bill. The Public Trustee, for instance, has had only limited sums available, and has practically been able to choose his securities. Under this Bill, on the other hand, great expectations have been raised in the minds of settlers who have very indifferent securities to offer, and the clamour for money will be proportionately great, and so the Government risk will eventually increase beyond what those two institutions have been called upon to face. Reference has been made to-night by the honourable member for Riccarton to the squandering, the “swindling,” and log-rolling era of the Stout-Vogel Government.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—Oh, no! The honourable gentleman has entirely mistaken my position, and he knows it.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—No, Sir; if the honourable gentleman has any denial to make I will accept his denial, of course, at once. He made use of words to that effect, as far as I understood him. I recollect that in the session of 1885 a Bill was introduced by the Stout-Vogel Government with a tremendous flourish of trumpets, the title of it being the Local Bodies' Finance and Powers Bill. Its provisions purported to secure an assured finance to the local bodies of the colony by the payment of annual subsidies amounting to £300,000 a year for a period of twenty-five years, and members representing country districts were challenged to vote against this bribe offered to the farmers and settlers: in fact, before the session commenced at all I was challenged by a prominent Government officer to give any opposition to such a proposal. I told him at once I would oppose it to the utmost extent of my power: and, to the astonishment of the Stout-Vogel Government, the condemnation of the country members was so general that when the Bill came out of Committee scarcely a shadow of its former self was left. Now, judging from the criticism to which this Bill has been subjected from the Government side of the House, I venture to assert that the Colonial Treasurer is rather sorry he has introduced such a Bill as is now before us.

Mr. WARD.—Not at all; quite the opposite.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—At all events, I invite members representing country districts to take courage and give effect to what I feel sure their opinions are upon this measure by following the example of 1885, and, if they do not throw it out altogether, I earnestly hope they will, at all events, so cut it down as to reduce its power for mischief. For my part, I look on the provisions of the Bill with serious alarm. As far as I have been able to listen to the discussion,—and what I have heard is confined to what was said this evening, because I was unfortunately absent in the country upon the first night of the discussion,—it would appear as if the borrowing country settlers alone were to be considered. I, Sir, take the wider view of my duty, that I represent all classes of settlers, and I therefore wish to know what compensation there is to the general taxpayers of the colony for the enormous risk that the Government propose to undertake under the provisions of this Bill. I looked through the tariff a few days ago and incidentally observed that, on such an article of common use in every household throughout the colony as currants, we are now paying a Customs duty of not less than 133 per cent. On kerosene, an article of common use in every household, we actually pay 80 per cent.; and if the Colonial Treasurer looks over the tariff he will find lots of similar cases throughout; and yet we are, by this Bill, to run the risk of having to put an additional burden upon the taxpayers of the colony! Cheap money, I admit, is an attractive thing, but yet it is accompanied by these and other serious drawbacks, one of the most important being that, just as under the Vogel policy of squandering and extravagant expenditure inaugurated in 1870, so our settlers will, in many cases, be tempted to borrow money under this Bill for expenditure upon unprofitable purposes, yielding little return to meet the interest they have to pay the Government, let alone leave a margin for profit. The private lender, again, rightly holds the character of the borrower to be an important consideration, but the Government would be unable to give any consideration whatever to this important feature, and there is therefore another risk added to the operation of this Bill. Then, if we ask what has created the necessity, if any, for such a Bill as this, the answer must be that, until the present Government came into office, the price of money advanced to settlers was coming down rapidly; but under the distrust created by the administration of the present Government the extraordinary fact arose that, although the price of money in England was falling year by year, the reverse process was unmistakably going on here, interest not only getting higher, but the margin required by the lender also steadily increasing; so that now we have many settlers—as stated by the Colonial Treasurer himself—who are unable to renew their mortgages except at higher rates. No condemnation upon the Government could possibly be greater than what has been admitted by the Colonial Treasurer himself; and he must accept for his Government the blame of any necessity whatever for the introduction of such a measure as this. Then, we have the Government once 12.30. again claiming credit because the colony's securities in the London market hold a superior position to those of the Australian Colonies. Well, Sir, that is not a fair position to take up, because we all know the abnormal condition of Australian securities is owing to the banking crisis and other special causes. But let us compare the securities of New Zealand with those of other colonies which have not gone through the special financial misfortunes the Australian Colonies have had to sustain, and we find the Canadian $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cents—I am quoting from the latest edition of the London Times—were stated in August last at 106; the Cape $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cents stood at 105 to 106; while the little, insignificant Colony of Natal, with a mere handful of European inhabitants, stood at 103 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 103 $\frac{3}{4}$. Can the Colonial Treasurer, Sir, find any great source of pride in the fact that the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cents of New Zealand at that date stood at 99 to 101?

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—At what date?

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The 8th August.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—My information is of the 9th August.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Well, Sir, I am informed that in last night's paper we have the New Zealand $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cents cabled at 103. That is not the first time that the same figure has been cabled, but I have failed to find confirmation of it in any of the official lists that have subsequently come to hand. It does appear to me as if somebody at the other end is engaged in trying to boom New Zealand securities for the benefit of the Colonial Treasurer and the Government on those benches. Now, Sir, a word as to bed-rock values—that misleading phrase coined by the Colonial Treasurer. If it meant anything at all it meant that we had arrived at bed-rock in the values of land, and that it was therefore perfectly safe to lend money at the present time. This is only another illustration of the scanty consideration which the Colonial Treasurer has given to the numerous Bills he has put before us this session. Let us accept it, for the sake of argument, to be true that we have arrived at bed-rock values, and that the statement would apply to any valuations made for the purposes of this Bill during the current year; but let us also suppose—and I hope it will be the case—that next year we had an advance of 10 per cent. on New Zealand produce. We should at once have a proportionate increase in the valuations made by the Government Valuers for the purposes of this Bill, and so on in succeeding years, the values varying according to the values of New Zealand produce, and the margin of one-third liable to disappear as much larger margins have previously disappeared. What, then, becomes of what the Colonial Treasurer intended to convey to the House and the country when he spoke of bed-rock values? It means that the phrase is worse than valueless, because it is absolutely deceiving and misleading. I do not suppose that the Treasurer meant it to be so, but as a matter of fact it is so. Then, as to the margin of one-third: I hope that the Colonial Treasurer realises that the House will not give the Government this Bill with such a small margin of security. The honourable gentleman must see that it would very speedily disappear under many circumstances that I will not detain the House by detailing. I am sure, when the Bill goes to Committee,—if it gets that length,—the House will insist upon a margin of one-half. Then we come to the question of advances on improvements to leaseholds. Sir, this is quite a new development altogether, so far as the Government is concerned. I turn to Hansard of 1891, and I wish to quote a sentence or two from a speech from the Hon. the Minister of Lands on the Land Bill of that year. He goes on to say as follows:—

“Then, Mr. Speaker, we are told that there is no system equal to freehold; and it is generally supposed that the large majority of the farmers in the Colony of New Zealand are their own landlords—are the real owners of the particular farms they cultivate and work. Now, I am sure that members in this House will be astonished when I tell them that, by very careful calculations that have been made, it has been found that about one-half of the farmers at the present moment are mortgaged to such a degree that the interest they have to pay is equal to a rack-rent. About one-half of the farmers are not the owners at all of the land that they cultivate.”

Now, here we have the sympathy of the Minister of Lands for the farmer rack-rented by the interest on his mortgage. What is the position under this Bill? Let us take the leaseholders on Cheviot and Pomahaka. They will first be rack-rented by the Government on the unimproved value of their land, and subsequently will have an additional burden in the shape of a mortgage on their improvements. But one would suppose that the wish in the session of 1891 was that the farmers should be relieved from all mortgages. But as time has gone on, and fresh demands have been made on the Government, they now inaugurate a system of lending money on improvements. Now, what will be the value of the security in many cases obtained by the Government in the shape of improvements? The Minister of Lands received a deputation not many weeks ago from the Pahiatua district. The position of these settlers was that, although they had felled hundreds of acres of bush, they had been unable to burn, though it had in some cases cost from £1 10s. to £1 15s. an acre to do so. The land was of less value than if a single shilling had never been expended upon it at all, because the bush had been felled and they were not able to burn it. Then, there are other cases where hundreds of acres of scrub are felled which, after a few years, grows up just as bad as it was before. In other cases we sow grass-seed, and the grass will only last two or three years, and very likely it will be impossible to make the land take grass by surface-sowing at any later period. The Government may lend money on improvements of this character, and the security may disappear entirely, and be perfectly valueless. In the case of fencing and buildings, and anything else constructed of a perishable material, what would be the value of them at the end of thirty-six years? Why, Sir, they would be largely valueless. Under this Bill also, although the money may be cheap at 5 per cent. to-day—though I deny it is so—what will be the case in twenty or thirty years? It will be very much cheaper than it is now, and the settlers who borrow now will then have a liability on their backs which they will be very glad to get rid of. The Government have brought in this Bill under the false pretence of being a non-borrowing Government, and we know the various catch-phrases used by the Premier during the elections; and yet this non-borrowing Government have been shown to have increased the debt of the colony by a million and three-quarters during their term of office. They have now come out in their true colours, and the country is recognising this fact. I paid a short visit to my constituency last week, and I was astonished to find some of my strongest opponents at the last election informing me that in future they would be very sorry to support the Government, as the Government had departed from their pledges of non-borrowing.

Mr. SEDDON.—You are not sorry for that, are you?

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The Hon. the Premier will be if he visits Greytown, as he did during the last elections: he will find what the settlers there have to tell him. The late Premier, Mr. Ballance, learned a lesson at the elections of 1887; but the present Government have forgotten that lesson, and they will find that at the next election they will meet the same fate as did the Stout-Vogel Government.

Mr. THOMPSON.—Sir, I did not intend to say anything on this Bill to-night, and would not do so were it not for the fact that perhaps my silence might be misunderstood both by the House and by my constituents. I am not going to say anything hard on the Colonial Treasurer, as he has had such a hot night of it already. Almost every speaker who has spoken to-night has condemned the Bill. Some of those who are going to vote for the second reading of the Bill have condemned it in the strongest manner possible.

Mr. SEDDON.—They are going to vote for it all the same, and so are you.

Mr. THOMPSON.—No; I will not vote for it. I shall take my own course in the matter. This Bill has been so fully discussed that I have no wish to travel over the same ground again. But there is one point I should like to call attention to, and which I think has been overlooked by every member who has spoken on the Bill, and that is, that the provisions of this Bill only relate to freeholders who hold land under the Land Transfer Act of 1885. I should like to call the attention of honourable members who represent country districts, and old-settled districts like that which I represent myself, to this: that according to the provisions of this Bill not 5 per cent. of the settlers in these old-settled districts can possibly come under its provisions. The condition under which the money is to be advanced is only to settlers who hold the land under "The Land Transfer Act, 1885"; and all other settlers, and the old settlers of the colony, are practically shut out of the provisions of this Bill. I do not know whether the Colonial Treasurer intended that or not.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They can bring their land under the Act.

Mr. THOMPSON.—It is all very well for the honourable gentleman to say, "They can bring their land under the Act," but he must know very little about these things, or else he would not talk so lightly about it. The expense of bringing land under the Land Transfer Act is so excessive and troublesome that very few endeavour to do so, unless they have doubtful titles or are compelled to do so. Not 5 per cent. of the freeholders, unless they have doubtful titles, have endeavoured to bring their land under the provisions of the Land Transfer Act. I am surprised to find so many members get up and support the Bill, and speak of the provisions of the Bill, without having noticed this point: in fact, I must come to the conclusion that a great many honourable members who have spoken have never read the Bill at all. Take, for instance, my honourable friend the member for Dunedin City (Mr. W. Hutchison). He praised the Bill in the most glowing language, and said it is going to assist the toiling settlers—the settlers who have been toiling for years and years and years. Why, it will not assist one of these old settlers my honourable friend referred to. Not one of them can take advantage of the operation of this Bill: unless he goes to the expense of bringing his land under the provisions of the Land Transfer Act, not one of them can borrow a shilling under it. So far as I can see, if that is the intention of the Colonial Treasurer—whether it is so or not I do not know—of course, that is a matter which can be put right in Committee—if it is the intention of the Colonial Treasurer, I think he will make more enemies throughout the colony than friends by the introduction of this Bill; because I fail to see why the whole of the old settlers of the colony should be called upon to go security for large sums of money to be lent out to newer settlers who have come to the country during the last ten or twelve years, while they themselves would reap no benefit from it. So far as I can see, I think it would be better for the Colonial Treasurer to drop this Bill altogether. The honourable gentleman shakes his head; but I venture to say that when this Bill comes out of Committee it will come out in such a state that he will not recognise it; and I think, myself, it would be far better to drop this Bill altogether, and confine his operations to the money he proposes to raise under another Bill now on the Order Paper—the Consolidated Consols Bill. If the Treasurer would do that I believe he would get a very generous support in this House and the country. If you drop this Bill you can go on with your other Bill, to raise a million of money every year in Consols and re-lend it to settlers. If you do that it will not be necessary to go to the London money-market. It will not be necessary to remit your interest year after year to London. I think you will find such a proposal as that will be much more acceptable to the taxpayers throughout the colony than the proposals under this Bill. Then, the proposals under this Bill are such a departure from the policy contained in the Budget that I think, before this House supports such a Bill, the taxpayers of the colony should be consulted. For my part, I cannot even vote for the second reading of the Bill. I have no wish to offer any opposition to the Bill if I could conscientiously support it, but I am not going to condemn the Bill, as other members have done, and then support the second reading. When the Bill goes into Committee I shall certainly use my right as a member of this House to object to everything in the Bill that I disapprove of, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall take a division on every clause which I do not approve of. I think the Government, by bringing down a Bill such as this, and a measure that has never been submitted to the ratepayers, are not doing what is right. I venture to say there is no one member sitting in this House at the present time who has ever discussed such a question as this before his constituents, and I say in the most friendly manner to the Colonial Treasurer that I think it is hardly a fair position for the Government to place their supporters in—to bring down a Bill like this as a policy measure, to make it a party question and expect their supporters to carry it through. We have all to answer to our constituents, and we have all our responsibilities, equally with those honourable gentlemen on the Government benches, and I, for one, will always endeavour, as far as I possibly can, to carry out the wishes of those who sent me here. At the same time I regret to have to do what might appear as being in opposition to the Government. However, we all know the position we occupy in this House, and we must endeavour to do our duty. Then, in reference to the proposal to lend money to two-thirds of the value, I object to that altogether. That is a matter which has been fully discussed, and therefore I need not refer to it again. Another objectionable feature is the proposal in regard to loans of £5,000. That, I feel certain, the House will not support. I quite agree with my honourable friend the member for Dunedin City that £1,000 should be the maximum limit. The object of the scheme, I understand, and have always understood since the proposals were brought down, was to assist small settlers. Am I not right in that? That is, I am sure, the impression which was left on every member of this House. Surely the proposal to lend sums of £5,000 cannot be held to be a proposal to assist the small settlers of the colony. A man who is in a position to offer securities up to £5,000 can go on without any assistance from the Government. If the Bill goes into Committee, I think that is one of the alterations which should be made—namely, that the maximum lent should be £1,000. With reference to the proposal about lending on leasehold, I should like to call the attention of the Colonial Treasurer to one point. The Bill says in lending on leaseholds the amount lent may be up to one-half “the lessee’s interest in the lease.” When the honourable gentleman is replying I should like him to explain what he means by that. Does the lessee’s interest in his lease mean anything more than his improvements? does it mean anything in the shape of the good-will of his lease? That is a point which should be made clear to the House. Then, there is another point I should like to call the honourable gentleman’s attention to. It says no advance is to be made on the security of leaseholds “until—(a) All covenants and conditions on the lessee’s part contained or implied in the lease are complied with.” Now, when are these conditions complied with? Are these conditions complied with annually, when a man pays his rent? That is a clause which wants explaining, because, to my mind, no money should be lent to leaseholders before they have proved by sufficient residence on their sections that they are likely to be permanent settlers. And, again, no money should be lent on improvements except improvements of a permanent character. For instance, a man might go on a section of bush-land—he might have felled, say, fifty, sixty, or a hundred acres of bush. The following season might be wet, and he might get a very bad burn. Then he would find that he could not sow his grass, and his money would run short; and in many cases men, under such conditions, have abandoned their sections altogether; and it has come to my knowledge that numbers of men have taken up bush sections in this provincial district without ever having looked at them, and at very high valuations, and after felling the bush, and burning it, when they have seen the land they have found it so much inferior to what it was represented to be that they are applying for a revaluation or a reduction in their rent. They state that unless they can get a revaluation or a large reduction in their rent they will be obliged to abandon the sections, the land being so much inferior to what they expected it to be. So honourable members will see the great danger in attempting to lend money on leasehold improvements. However, I do not think the Bill is likely to get through in its present shape: in fact, I look upon the present Bill as being as dead as Julius Cæsar, and I think it is a useless waste of time discussing it. I would suggest to the honourable gentleman that he should drop this Bill altogether, go on with his Consols Bill, raise a million and a half of money in the colony, and lend it to small farmers, limiting the maximum amount to £1,000. If he does that, then I believe that he can do a great deal of good to the colony; but to plunge into such a scheme as this borrowing a million and a half a year, and lending it out in large sums of £5,000—I say the whole scheme is of such a reckless character that I, for one, cannot take the responsibility of even voting for its second reading.

Mr. GRAHAM.—A large number of honourable members have spoken upon this Bill, and we have had almost an equal number of different opinions expressed upon it. Some honourable gentlemen on the opposite side have spoken distinctly against the Bill. Most of those who have spoken in its favour have done so in a qualified manner. Nearly every one who has promised to vote for the second reading has reserved to himself the right of moving important amendments when the Bill goes into Committee. As far as I have been able to judge, I think there are only two or three members who have swallowed the Bill whole. Those who have supported it in a qualified manner have done so for a variety of reasons. My venerable friend the junior member for Dunedin City (Mr. W. Hutchison) told the House that the proposal was not intended to give to new or struggling settlers the benefit of the money when they first went on the land—not until they had made sufficient improvements upon it to enable them to go to the Government and say, “We have made these improvements”—say to the value of £100—“and now, perhaps, the Government will lend us £50.” But, before this can happen, they have, according to my honourable friend, to bear the heat and burden of the day as best they can. They have got to make their own improvements. To do this, they must first get aid from private money-lenders, in addition to using their own bone and sinew before the Government will help them in any way. The honourable member for Masterton supported the Bill for quite a different reason. He supports the Bill because he says it will assist new settlers who are opening up new country. He said, “If we place people on the land they must also have the wherewithal to work it”: and I agree with him; but the Bill, as it stands, will not effect that object. The honourable member for Palmerston pointed out that leaseholders could only have advances upon their leaseholds after they have complied with all the covenants and conditions of their leases, and the honourable gentleman told us—he is a member of a Land Board, and probably is well informed—that one of those conditions was that they should be resident on their leaseholds for ten years. I believe the Treasurer confirmed that.

Mr. WARD.—No, I did not.

Mr. PIRANI.—He ought to have done so.

Mr. GRAHAM.—The honourable member says the Treasurer ought to have confirmed it.

I.O. I hope that, if the Colonial Treasurer is not able to confirm it, he will in his reply prove that it was incorrect; because if it is a fact that a leaseholder has to be there ten years or any lesser period—let it be five if you like—then the advances to leaseholders are simply a myth. At any rate, whether he has to be ten years or five years, he is to get no advances until he has got improvements on the ground that are his own property and that he can borrow upon. He cannot borrow on the land when he first acquires it, to enable him to make the improvements necessary for him to obtain a living from it. Supposing a settler takes up a leasehold unimproved, of the value of £600: say that he has got that land, can he borrow upon it? No.

An Hon. MEMBER.—On improvements.

Mr. GRAHAM.—But when a man takes up land is the time he wants assistance to make improvements. It is useless saying to him, "After you have made improvements on your land we will lend you money." He wants the money at the time he goes upon the land, if it is to be of any use to him at all. When the time comes that he has made such considerable improvements on the land that the Government is willing to lend upon them, then he has very nearly reached the time when he can snap his fingers at the Government, or anybody else in the shape of a money-lender. Now, as one of those who have supported the non-borrowing self-reliant policy of the late Premier of the colony, and as one who came to assist the Government in carrying out and continuing that policy, I may say that I was very much astonished at the magnitude of the risk contained in the financial proposals as they were brought down by the Colonial Treasurer in his Financial Statement; and the Bill which is before us now for the provision of cheap money was one that staggered me as much as any of them. It has been said by the supporters of this measure that it is not borrowing money in the old sense in which the colony has been used to borrowing, inasmuch as the money is not to be spent directly by the colony, but to be advanced to the settlers on mortgage, and they are expected to pay the interest. But as far as the lenders of the money are concerned, they will lend it to the colony, not to the individual mortgagors, and the colony is responsible to the bondholders for the interest. That, as some honourable gentleman said to-night, will be a half-yearly recurring item which must be met, and the colony has got to take the chances whether it will be able to collect the interest back again from the borrowers. In as far as this cheap-money scheme is intended to be, and can be shown to be, in the interests and for the advantage of struggling settlers, I consider it would be a praiseworthy policy, deserving of—and it will receive—my hearty support; but the settlers who require it most are the very ones who cannot get it—that is, those who hold the leases in perpetuity. Also, in borrowing money to lend to the settlers we ought to be in a position to show that the general taxpayer will not be called upon to make up any collateral liability. The Colonial Treasurer, in his Financial Statement, said that the first essential to the successful introduction of money into the colony is to give an assurance to those from whom it is obtained that their loan is safe. I think it is just as essential that we should see that the general taxpayer is also secured against any collateral liability in this matter. The first proposal of the Treasurer, as contained in the Financial Statement, was that the money should be limited to advances on freehold security only. To this he has added now the lending of money to leaseholders in perpetuity and perpetual-lease holders; and I think the honourable member for Palmerston, with all due deference to the Treasurer, has made it pretty clear that it will be of little, if any, use to the settlers who go on the land at the present time under these forms of tenure. Then, again, is the difference between what we have to pay and what we receive in interest, even if we make no loss in collection, sufficient to pay the working-expenses of managing this concern? The Treasurer proposes by the Bill to issue bonds, debentures, and other securities at a rate of interest not exceeding £4 for every £100, and this means that he may give, and possibly will give, £4 for every £100 borrowed; and it goes on to say that such bonds, debentures, or other securities may, for the purpose of temporary advances, be hypothecated or mortgaged upon such terms as to interest as the said agents may deem expedient. This means that the money may be borrowed temporarily at even more than 4 per cent.; and, supposing we borrow it partly at 4 and partly at 3½ per cent., there are expenses connected with the borrowing of this money—financial agents, and other expenses—and the chances are, if we go on the market year after year for a million and a half, we shall not be able to raise it at par. It is only fair we should put the average rate at which it would be raised at 4 per cent. If we borrowed at 3½ per cent. the difference between what we should be called upon to pay and what we received would be £22,500; but if we give 4 per cent. the difference would be only £15,000, and that would mean that the whole of the expenses should be allowed not to exceed £15,000, or else the taxpayers would be called upon to make up any deficiency. The Treasurer, in making his statement, said that, although he proposed to carry out the management of this cheap-money scheme by means of the offices already existing, he admitted there would be expenses, and went on to enumerate some of them, and he put them at a fairly high price. He thought it would require ten Valuers at £600, making £6,000; and ten Solicitors, at salaries ranging from £1,000 down to £400—say, at an average of £700, making £7,000: or a total of £13,000 for these two items alone. Then, the Treasurer—and I think he was perfectly sincere at the time, and really believed it—said that the fees we should derive from the lending of the £1,500,000, providing it was lent in sums at an average of £1,000, receiving a guinea for each £1,000, would amount to the sum of £15,750, or more than sufficient to pay the expenses of the Valuers and lawyers, and no one seemed more surprised than himself when the House laughed as he made that statement. He looked round in surprise, and it was not till he was told that he had put an “0” too many that he realised the sum he thought to get had vanished to £1,575. There is, as we have seen, £13,000 out of the £15,000 margin gone for these two items of Valuers and Lawyers alone; and, in addition to this, the Bill also provides for the appointment of a Superintendent, no doubt at a large salary, and there is also power taken to appoint a staff for carrying on the necessary work, which cannot be done without money. Then, there is a Registrar of Mortgages: this officer will also have to be paid for. In addition to the salaries of the Valuers, travelling-expenses are to be provided for them, which will be no mean sum. Then, again, out of the profits, and as a first charge after paying to the English money-lenders the interest due on the money raised, there is a sum of £750,000, supposing the whole amount of £1,500,000 is advanced on loan, to be placed to credit of an Assurance Fund. So far, then, from the difference between the amounts paid bondholders and that received as interest being sufficient for paying working-expenses—without reckoning the probable losses in the collection of interest—there would be a deficiency of £15,000 to £20,000 a year, which would have to be made up out of consolidated revenue.

Mr. WARD.—You said £750,000 for interest.

Mr. GRAHAM.—I thank the honourable gentleman. I am afraid I made a similar mistake to what the Colonial Treasurer did the other night; but fortunately it does not carry with it the same fatal consequences. The amount to be lent to settlers is £1,500,000, and the interest derived from that amount, at 5 per cent., would be £75,000. It is provided that one-tenth is to be placed to the credit of the Assurance Fund, and one-tenth that sum is £7,500. That is the sum I referred to and meant to name as being the first charge upon receipts after the payment of interest to bondholders, and which is to be paid over before anything is reckoned for any other expenses. I have said, and I think shown, that the working-expenses and provision of the Assurance Fund will be very much greater than the difference between the amount of interest the colony would have to pay to the bondholders and that which it would receive from the borrowers—that is, without counting anything for contin-gent losses in the collection of interest from the borrowers. Then, the Bill provides that advances are to be made from £5 to £5,000; and I may say that almost every honourable member who has spoken to-night has opposed the idea of lending to so large an amount. I understood, and I believe most honourable members understood, that this was a scheme to provide money for the smaller settlers; and, as has been said over and over again, the man who is in a position to offer security for a loan of £5,000 cannot possibly be considered a poor man. I agree with the honourable gentlemen who consider that the maximum amount that ought to be lent under this Bill should be £500. That should be the most that should be provided for bond fide settlers—sums of from £50 to £500; and if proper safeguards for the security of the colony were put in, so that the colony would not have to pay any deficiency, to that extent it would, as I have already said, have my support. Large borrowers are already sufficiently well provided for. The Government have already two large monetary institutions which lend out money in both small and large sums. There is the Public Trust Office, which has the administration of thousands of estates belonging to widows, orphans, and minors, and others—a business which is very large now and is continually growing, and which is carried on under the guarantee of the State. The colony guarantees not only the fidelity of its administration and its integrity, but also the rates of interest which shall be paid. It guarantees—

“... a common rate of interest, to be paid quarterly, free of all office-charges. This rate of interest, which has now been determined at 5 per cent. on capital up to £3,000, and 4 per cent. on the amount in excess of £3,000, is now allowed free of all charges of the Public Trust Office. An income would thus be derived of £50 a year from £1,000, or 5 per cent.; £150 a year from £3,000, or 5 per cent.; £190 a year from £4,000, or 4½ per cent.; £230 a year from £5,000, or 4½ per cent.; £270 a year from £6,000, or 4½ per cent.; and so on.”

Under this most important trust, the Government have very large sums of money to invest; and, if they maintain the provisions of this Bill as brought down by the Colonial Treasurer, it is bringing down another monetary institution to compete with departments we have already in existence where they have to invest large sums, and under which they have accepted large responsibilities. Now, in reference to the Life Insurance Department also, they have got the interest of thirty-one thousand clients, in the shape of policyholders, to guard in this matter, and they have no business to start another institution which shall enter into competition to the detriment of these institutions. The Life Insurance Department already lends up to £5,000, and on sums of from £3,000 to £5,000 the interest chargeable is only 5½ per cent.; and provision is also made for the gradual repayment of loans on the instalment principle, or in a lump sum before maturity, on terms favourable to the borrower. Therefore the larger borrowers are quite sufficiently protected by that office. They can get their money cheaply enough as it is. This Bill, therefore, ought only to provide money for the smaller class of settlers, who require loans in small sums, for which, if they go to the Insurance Office, they have to pay $6\frac{1}{2}$ or 7 per cent. now. So that the large borrowers are more liberally dealt with in the Insurance Department than the small ones. I should like to see the small borrowers able to borrow on as advantageous terms as the large borrowers can do so. The Colonial Treasurer said it was necessary to have a high maximum, so as to take advantage of the better class of securities. The Insurance Department can take advantage of these, and may do so to a much larger extent than now if the Colonial Treasurer will make provision to carry into effect the recommendation of a special Committee of this House set up in 1886 I think, and which Committee recommended that the maximum amount allowed to be lent on any one security by the department should be increased from £5,000 to £10,000, and if he will reduce the proportion necessary to be invested in Government securities—which I was pleased to hear him say he proposed doing—from one-half to one-quarter of the funds, which would leave more than a quarter of a million a year to be lent on good outside securities for the benefit of the policyholders. That would be the means of placing the Government department in as good a position as outside companies, which he professed was his desire; and it would be far better, because that is an institution where the object of lending money is to make as good a profit as possible for the policyholders connected with life insurance, whilst I understand this Bill is not intended as a money-lending institution set up to compete with other Government departments, but simply to enable small borrowers to get their loans on as good terms as can be obtained by the larger ones. It has been said that the rate of interest that has to be paid outside is very high. There is any quantity of money that can be got on first-class security in this colony in large sums now at 6 per cent. interest. I know that to be the case myself; and that practically means $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., because out of their 6 per cent. the private lenders have to pay the mortgage-tax, which is practically $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., reducing the amount they receive to $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I think, also, that, with reference to Solicitors and Valuers, if the Bill does pass it is advisable that both Valuers and Solicitors should be appointed by the Boards, and not by the Government. Whether or not it would really have the effect of placing them under political control, and, consequently, under political influence, it will have the appearance of doing so, and it would be much better it should be done by the Boards than by the Government. I also agree with honourable members who consider a million and a half a year far too much to borrow, and more than is necessary if we confine the advance of money to small settlers, for whom the object of this Bill is professedly to raise money. I should think that one-third of the amount is sufficient; and I also object to the million and a half being borrowed year after year. I think it is quite sufficient if this House passes a law authorising Government to borrow for one year and see how that works, and then, if we find it is an advantage, and it is taken advantage of to any considerable extent by those it is intended to benefit, we may next year authorise a further sum. I do not think it necessary that we should now pass an Act giving the power to borrow for years in advance. But, as far as this Bill professes to provide money for struggling settlers under safe conditions, I cordially approve of it. I confess, Sir, that I do not see at present how it is to be made to apply to the class of settlers who really require it most—namely, those who are now taking up unimproved land for the purpose of going on it, improving it, and making a living for themselves under the lease in perpetuity or under the perpetual lease. I should like the Colonial Treasurer to say how it is to be made of advantage to them. If only lessees who have been on their land for a considerable time, and have made improvements to such an amount as will enable them to come and ask for assistance, are to take advantage of this measure—if it is only such people who are able to get assistance under the Bill—then it is of no use to new settlers who are going on the land, and who, if they require help at all, must require it at the time they are going on the land. It is of no use to the man who is taking up land and has no money of his own, because this measure will give him no assistance to go on with the clearing of his land. I should like to know how the Colonial Treasurer is going to get over that difficulty.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE.—It was not my intention to speak on this Bill to-night, as I said I should support the Bill when speaking on the Financial Statement; and it is not my intention now to delay the House many minutes. We have had all sorts of authorities, ancient and modern, past and present, living and dead, from Europe to America, quoted against this principle of advancing money to settlers—authorities ranging from Alexander Pope, a poet and essayist, who lived a couple of hundred years ago, down to Henry George, who in the present age is going to reform all the land-laws in creation with his fanciful and foolish fad. Yet in all these great authorities I never found one single sound argument against the Bill before us. The honourable gentleman who has just sat down told us that the members who supported the second reading of the Bill did so in a qualified manner. Well, Sir, I should like to ask that honourable gentleman if there was any Bill of any importance, if there ever was any Bill containing a principle of this magnitude brought into any Parliament, or ever brought into this House, which was supported on its second reading even by its advocates except in a qualified manner. We go into Committee on all Bills, so that the majority may shape them to the form which will best suit the requirements of the colony, according to the opinions of the majority of honourable members. That, I take it, is the reason why we go into Committee on Bills at all, Sir. Now, the honourable member for Marsden raised several objections to this Bill; but they were simply Committee objections, and did not apply to the Bill as a general principle. My honourable friend the member for Wairarapa said he was going to oppose the Bill very persistently, and I have no doubt he has very good reasons for doing so. Gentlemen like him have good cause for opposing a measure of this sort. No doubt he has something to do with the money-lending fraternity, and, consequently, is justified in opposing the measure.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The honourable gentleman is entirely mistaken. I have never lent money in my life.

Mr. R. McKENZIE.—I beg the honourable gentleman's pardon. I thought he was connected by marriage with the family of Dives. My principal reason in getting up to-night was to support this measure very briefly. I do not intend to deal with its details, which I look upon as Committee work entirely. My principal reason for getting up and supporting it is that my honourable friends the Liberal members, or, rather, I should say, the Radical members of the Liberal party—the left wing, in fact—appear to be turning rather Conservative if not pessimistic in their views, and stand in need of friendly advice. In fact, I am rather surprised at many of the speeches we have listened to from them. The honourable member for Palmerston has an objection to the Bill which shows that either he has not read the Bill or else he does not understand it. There is a sinking fund of 1 per cent. provided for in this Bill, and we know very well that it will take thirty-six and a half years for that sinking fund to extinguish the loan. The honourable member for Palmerston wanted it altered to twenty years. Well, Sir, that would simply mean that the sinking fund would have to be increased to $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and that is more than the settlers could afford to pay. There is not the slightest doubt that the Colonial Treasurer is a better authority on loans and sinking funds than most of those honourable members who have spoken on the Bill. With reference to the remarks of the honourable member for Inangahua, I see the honourable gentleman is present, but sound in the arms of Morpheus: disturb him not, but let him rest—I do not intend to say anything that he can very much object to. He says that this Bill is only intended to lend money to people who can offer good securities. Well, there is no doubt that it is necessary that there should be good securities; but it is also intended to lend money to poor people who are trying to better their position. They have small securities, and they can get small amounts of money, which will be very useful to them in their efforts to make homes for themselves; so that I do not see that that objection amounts to much. The honourable member for Inangahua also stated that this scheme would place people on the land who would produce more than we are able to find a market for. Well, Sir, I do not think there is any scarcity of markets for the products of New Zealand. In fact, if we produced twenty times as much as we do now we could find quite sufficient market in England. The same honourable gentleman also stated that high rates of interest and high wages always went together, and that, consequently, high rates of interest were not at all a bad thing. Sir, I should like to know what work on political economy the honourable gentleman has drawn this high-falutin' and fallacious logic from. According to him, when there is a high rate of interest, labour is fully employed, and high wages can be maintained. Now, I consider that high interest is one of the worst things that can obtain in any country for the working-classes. Dear money cripples all manufactures, and stifles production and industries: on the other hand, cheap money always promotes industry, and when employment is plentiful wages are always higher than when work is scarce, if not unobtainable. I am at a loss, Sir, to understand where the honourable gentleman has drawn his logic from. Some honourable members have stated that members had not discussed this question with their constituencies. I do not know whether I am the exception, but I certainly discussed this principle with my constituents before I came to this House, and said that I would support such a measure. My greatest objection to this Bill is that it does not go far enough. I should like to see the Colonial Treasurer make an attempt to place the unemployed on the land. Several honourable gentlemen wanted to know what would happen in the case of advances being made upon the interest of a leaseholder in his improvements, buildings, et cetera. Well, Sir, all improvements under the purchasing clause or other leasehold tenures in our Land Act are the vested interest of the leaseholder, and a reasonably good security for the State to advance money on. Honourable gentlemen who get up to oppose and denounce this Bill, and then state that they will support the second reading, surprise me very much. We all know the Colonial Treasurer has shown himself qualified to manage the financial affairs of the colony for some years, and I am sure he is not going to mismanage them now. There is not the slightest danger of his squandering or misappropriating the funds provided under this Bill. With regard to the financial institutions mentioned, it was reckless dealing with other people's money that brought those companies to ruin. Take, for instance, the case of the Bank of New Zealand: every member in this House who has studied the question knows how it has been mismanaged, and it was that reckless, if not criminal, mismanagement that has brought it to its present position. The same may be said of the New Zealand Loan and Mer-

130. cantile Company. The remark also applies to other companies in this colony, and the same thing applies to financial institutions in the Australian Colonies. At the present time there is not the slightest doubt that the average rate of interest in the colony is 8 per cent. I believe, myself, it is a little over 8 per cent. on what may be considered first-class security; and if the Colonial Treasurer, under this Bill, can reduce that interest to 5 per cent. he will be conferring an inestimable boon upon the settlers of the colony. By dealing with the million and a half as it is proposed under this Bill he will save the settlers £45,000 a year, and if he continues to lend similar sums it will save the settlers something like half a million a year in a few years, and will also be the means of assisting to develop the industries of the colony, and to send the colony progressing ahead generally. I think that is what is most urgently required by the colony now. There is no doubt in my mind that this measure may require some slight amendments. I shall support the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. CARNCROSS.—When I look at the time—half-past one o'clock in the morning—and when I look at the graceful forms posing all round me, I think it would be absolute cruelty to attempt anything like a speech. Still, I am one of the noble army of Government supporters who do not agree with the details of the measure, although we agree with the principle of it. I think it is only fair to the Colonial Treasurer that I should say a few words concerning the Bill, and I can assure the House that I shall be very merciful, and shall not inflict my ideas on them at very great length. I may say that some nine years ago I advocated the principle of this Bill—namely, advancing money to farmers at low rates of interest; therefore I shall be found in the lobby with those who favour the second reading of the Bill. I consider that this Bill throws a greater amount of responsibility on members of this House than any Bill which we have had before us during this session. I think the future career of many of us, and of the Liberal party generally, will depend greatly upon this measure. If it is a success, well and good—we shall receive a certain amount of credit; but if it is the other way we shall receive the reverse. That statement may be discounted as a platitude, but I think it applies with greater force to this Bill than to any other which we have had before us. We are going into a new and important scheme, and I think on the effect of this Bill the future of the Liberal party will greatly depend. In regard to many of the details of the Bill I have made notes, but I shall not refer to them now, owing to the late hour at which I am speaking. I shall, however, make a few remarks in regard to some of the criticisms which have been made on the measure. The first onslaught on the Bill was made by the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). I shall not attempt to enter into the financial details which he dealt with. He certainly made some very sharp criticism, which requires the attention of the Colonial Treasurer; and when he is replying I shall listen to the way in which he meets that criticism.

The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) maintained that this Bill was a one-sided one inasmuch as it only proposed to confer this cheap money upon a certain class of the population—that it was intended to be confined to the settlers. But I am afraid that the operation of this Bill will not be confined to settlers, and that is the great fault I have to find with it. It was said by the honourable member that manufacturers and others are entitled to the same privileges as are proposed to be given to farmers. His words were that the manufacturers have as much right to be looked after as the settlers. Well, Sir, I do not believe that at all, and I will very briefly give my reasons, showing why I think it should be confined to those following agricultural and pastoral pursuits. If the country is successful there is very little doubt of the towns getting on. The towns hang upon the country, and the reason for the dullness now is the low prices farmers have had and their bad harvest. If the farmers were not in a bad condition at the present moment we should not hear quite so much about dull times in the cities. Give the farmers a start and the towns will share in the benefits. I notice in the Victorian Bill I have here that its operation is confined to advances to farmers, graziers, and persons engaged in agricultural and pastoral pursuits. Sir, I wish our own Bill had a similar scope, and if any member moves in Committee to confine the operation of the Bill in that direction he will find me supporting him, if I do not move it myself. I believe there is no occasion to make it so widespread in its operation as to apply to manufacturers and to people in all kinds of businesses. The view of the senior member for Wellington City that manufacturers are entitled to have the same concessions as country settlers was re-echoed by another honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie). Of course, I disagree with him also on the question. The first-named honourable member drew a pathetic picture about a man having to borrow for such a lengthened time, thirty-six years and a half, and he depicted him going down to his grave a mortgaged man. That is no change from the present circumstances; we have men going down to their graves mortgaged now; and such will always be the case. But under this system borrowers will have this advantage: that, as the half-yearly payments become due, the borrower has the satisfaction of knowing that, although it may be only to a small extent, yet gradually and slowly he is decreasing his indebtedness; and, if he does happen to slip his cable, he leaves a lesser burden on his family than he would under the old system. He also has the advantage here of being able to pay off the mortgage at any time when he has the money to do it. We all know that under the present system that cannot be done, except in a very few instances. If a lender has interest coming in, and the borrower should reach circumstances that would enable him to pay the debt off, he is not allowed to do it unless the lender can get better interest and as good security, but the borrower is kept to the full term of years, and to the payment of interest as before. There is, too, an excellent feature of the Bill—that is, the low charges made in connection with procuring the loan. I should like to see legislation in that direction to affect future advances on land, quite independently of this measure. At the present time it is next door to robbery the large amount that is charged a man who wishes to effect a mortgage upon a small property. A man may have a section worth £25, or even £20, and it will cost him three or four guineas to effect a mortgage on that property. I should like to see legislation, independently of this Bill, to effect a reduction of those charges. I am not making any direct attack upon the legal gentlemen, though I can hear them smile audibly; but I think the charges are excessive, and that legislation should be passed to lessen them. There is another feature of the criticism which was indulged in by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) which, I think, calls for comment. He said that under this Bill it would be possible for a man to borrow money and use it perhaps for speculative purposes—that is, to purchase insurance shares with, or something of that kind. If such a thing is possible under the Bill I am sure it will not be too severe a task for the Colonial Treasurer to put in a provision to prevent the money being made use of in such a manner. I trust he has taken notice of this particular criticism of the Bill. Now, I must emphatically object to this sum of £5,000. I think it is too high an amount altogether, and I would rather see the Bill receive its happy despatch than see it pass in a form in which the sum of £5,000 can be lent. I consider that is too high altogether, and would make it apply to a class that does not require it. We thought we were going to help small settlers, and I consider the man who wants to borrow £5,000 cannot be looked upon as a small settler. I am fortified in this opinion by the Victorian Act, which limits the amount to £1,000. I consider £500 high enough, but I am willing to go as far as £1,000; but I cannot see my way to support anything beyond that amount. I do not agree with those who object to lending money on leasehold. Loans on leaseholds are provided for in the Victorian Bill, and when we consider that the vast majority will be leaseholders it would not do to pass a Bill that will shut them out; they will form an important factor in our landholding community, and are entitled to assistance. I shall not detain the House longer, although I should have liked to go further into the Bill, because it is a matter that I have given some attention to for years; but I do not wish to weary the House. I shall support the second reading of the Bill, but join with those who reserve to themselves the right to do what they can to amend it in Committee.

Mr. HALL-JONES.—I shall not detain the House for many minutes. Judging from the course the debate has taken the Bill is likely to come out of Committee in much the same condition as the Railways Bill. I am prepared to support any well-devised scheme for giving financial aid to settlers; but the Government have gone off the track in bringing down proposals such as are contained in this Bill. It is the general feeling of the House that the Government should use colonial moneys for this purpose. They have the opportunity of using the funds of the Post Office and the Government Insurance Department, and if that had been provided for the proposal would have been better received by the House and by the country. I would urge the Government to consider the suggestion made by the honourable member for Marsden, that the money raised by Consols should be used for the purpose of lending to farmers: that would be an improvement on this Bill. One objection to the present proposals is that the interest on a million and a half per annum would be a continual drain on the coffers of the colony. Honourable members seems to be unanimous on affording aid to settlers. I agree with them, but I may say I only agree with the preamble and first clause of this Bill; in the remaining portions of it I hope to see many amendments made. I disapprove of so large a sum as £5,000 being lent to any one person. This would only permit a few persons to obtain loans. I think this should be reduced, at any rate, to £3,000. Then, I do not think I can support the proposal to raise a million and a half for more than one year. It could not be taken as any reflection on the Government to say that there should be an annual Bill to say what amount should be raised. The Treasurer is asking too much when he asks for authority to borrow so large a sum as a million and a half a year for an indefinite time. It may be said the Government would have to provide all the machinery necessary to give effect to this Bill, and that it would not be wise to start the machinery unless we were assured of carrying it on for a number of years; but the Government can always rely on the good sense of the House to support their proposals, provided that the scheme works satisfactorily. It would not be wise for the colony to pay 4 per cent. for the money raised: the whole essence of the scheme is cheap money. Unless we raise the money cheaply in the Old Country we cannot lend it cheaply here, and by raising it at 4 per cent. and lending it at 5 per cent. there will not be sufficient margin to pay working-expenses. In reference to what has been said about lending on lease in perpetuity—that settlers under this form of tenure will be unable to take advantage of the provisions of this Bill; I see nothing whatever to prevent this. If a man takes up bush-land and falls bush—say he takes up a hundred acres and falls in one year a hundred acres, and has complied with the conditions of his lease up to that time, undoubtedly he could then obtain an advance under these proposals; and it wants clearly laying down that the amount lent should not be according to his interest in the land, but according to the improvements he has made. Another very objectionable feature is contained in clause 56, which provides that,—

“If the balance in the Management Account is at any time insufficient to meet the charges thereon, the Colonial Treasurer may from time to time advance such sums out of the Consolidated Fund as may be necessary to meet the deficiency :

“(a.) Provided that the total amount so advanced in any one financial year does not exceed the sum appropriated by Parliament for such purpose ; and

“(b.) Provided further that all moneys so advanced shall be repaid by the Superintendent into the Consolidated Fund so soon as the balance in the Management Account will admit of such repayment.”

That is very objectionable ; the taxpayers of the colony should not be called upon to make up any deficiency that may occur ; the whole scheme should be self-supporting, and if it is found, later on, that the Management Account is not self-supporting, I think that any extra cost should be borne by those who get the benefit of the scheme. I wished to say these two or three words, as I intend to vote for the Bill, but shall endeavour to get it amended in Committee.

Mr. PARATA.—I rise to support the second reading of this Bill, as I think it is a Bill in the right direction—namely, to assist farmers. I do not know whether it will be applied to the Natives, but I should like to see it applied to them—that is, if they wish to come under it. I have nothing further to say, but I should like to reply to a few words the honourable member for the East Coast used in regard to the Natives of the South Island. He said the Natives of the South Island, as compared with the North Island Natives, had had to come to the Government to beg for four or five acres of land. I say he is wrong in making that remark, as the Natives did not ask the Government to give them land. The condition was, when the treaty was made between them and the Crown, that they should have this land. Therefore it was not right for the honourable member to say that the Natives of the South Island have asked for any such thing. Of course those Natives have not got such a large territory or extent of country as the Natives here have, but I will guarantee that in twenty years' time from this the Natives of the North Island will not be nearly so well off in comparison with those of the South Island. In the South Island they all hold small holdings at present, and they improve their land, and they work man and man to keep their wives and families. They do not plunge, and go drinking and holding meetings and wasting their moneys as they do in the North Island, and combining these things with horseracing and gambling. I could not allow these remarks to pass without challenging them, and therefore that is my reason for saying these few words. I will support the Bill through all its stages.

Mr. HALL.—Although the hour is very late, I think I must take this occasion to say a few words in favour of the Bill. I do not suppose it will take many minutes for what I have to say, but I think one of the probable questions is this : Will this Bill induce men to borrow more than they would otherwise do if it were not passed ? That argument has been used constantly on the floor of this House during this discussion, and it has been said that the consequence of this Bill passing will be to induce men to borrow who would not otherwise do so. I may say this : that money can easily be obtained at present from the loan companies and agents all over the colony, who are now offering money—as we see by the advertisements in almost every paper in the colony—in various sums at various rates of interest. Therefore the opportunities, I say, for people to borrow at the present time are as great as they can possibly be supposing this Bill were passed. Now, the next question is, Will the margin of one-third be sufficient to cover the expenses and the losses likely to be incurred by transactions under the Bill ? When we take into consideration that one-third is considered sufficient margin all the world over—and one-third in New Zealand under the present system of loans is always considered sufficient—I think we may safely say, with the care which will be taken by the Board which it is proposed to set up, that the one-third margin will be ample to secure the State against any loss which might accrue. Now, the honourable member for Bruce brought forward a very peculiar argument to-night. He said it was a bad thing to mortgage, and at the same time he said it was a bad thing to bring in any legislation which would have the effect of driving away capital from the colony. Then, the logical conclusion is, that if it is a bad thing to mortgage it is a good thing to drive capital away, but if it is a good thing to mortgage then it is a bad thing to drive money from the colony. The honourable member for Bruce was wrong in saying that it was a bad thing to mortgage. Take, for instance, a man who has expended £100 on labour upon a house which he is building ; he cannot finish it, for want of money, unless he borrows. Is he to allow that building to go to wreck and ruin when, by the expenditure of a small sum of money, he could make it reproductive, to bring in rent which would not only pay for his own labour, but for the money he has spent upon it ? Take a man who has grassed his land, but who has no money to stock it to make it profitable : it is necessary he should borrow ; but, according to the honourable member for Bruce, he is not justified in borrowing. It is the duty of the State to help men precisely in that position, and that is the intention of this Bill. I do not agree with the proposal to lend large sums of money ; for if a man wishes to borrow £5,000 he cannot be considered to be a poor man, or one who should come to the State to ask for help. The honourable member for Inangahua brought forward a curious argument also. He said that cheap money will have the effect of lessening the improved value for the purpose of taxation. It is the first time I have heard such an argument used. It is a singular argument, that the cheapening of money lessens the values of land. I always understood it had the contrary effect, for if you sold a farm which had upon it a mortgage at a high rate of interest you would get less for it than if the mortgage was at a low rate of interest. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay asked what would be the value of a white-pine house in thirty-six years, but that argument falls to the ground when the fact is remembered that fifty per cent. of the loan will have been paid off in twenty or twenty-five years, and that there will be an appreciable difference in the valuation of the security at that time and the value when the money was advanced. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay forgets that there is still the land, and the increased value from the time the money is lent till the time it is to be repaid. I think the value will then be very considerably increased, and the security undoubted. I was rather surprised at what the honourable member for Palmerston said with regard to the exclusion of the State tenantry from participating in the benefits of the Bill. Why, the honourable member has admitted over and over again that the village-settlement scheme has been a grand success.

Mr. PIRANI.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HALL.—And yet this is only legislation of the same kind; it is only the same scheme, on a larger scale! The man with five acres of village-land borrows £25 for a house. He gets an advance of about one-half on his bush-felling, and so on, often valued at £7 10s. and £10 an acre. These settlers pay their rent regularly, and the State considers this splendid security. The State keeps the fee-simple of the land: and it will have security on the larger areas proposed under this Bill. This is on all-fours with the village-settlement scheme, and I may say I think the State has full value in the security in this case. The question has arisen, Has the country asked for this measure? I say, most emphatically, Yes. If I am, at any rate, to take my own district as a criterion, I was asked during the election, both off the platform and on it, whether I would be in favour of a scheme whereby money would be lent out to settlers at a moderate rate of interest. I consider, as I have said previously, that it is absolutely necessary, in the interests of these small settlers, that money should be borrowed and lent out at a cheap rate of interest: the large owners can look after themselves. Then, is borrowing disastrous when the money is for reproductive purposes? As I have said before, whenever it is used for reproductive purposes it cannot be said it is not well used. Take the leaseholder: What is his position? At the end of six years he must have 20 per cent. of his area in grass; he must also have an amount equal to £1 per acre in improvements on his land besides. Now, when he has made these improvements so far, I think he is entitled to some consideration, and to have some means extended whereby he may make his land more reproductive. When money is available, he will use it for the best interests of himself, and consequently for the benefit of the colony. The great hardship the settlers have felt in the past with regard to borrowing money has not been entirely confined to the excessive interest which they have had to pay—and, notwithstanding the many contradictions which have been made to that statement, I say that the average rate of interest throughout New Zealand is now 8 per cent. They (the borrowers) have not only, therefore, to pay this large interest, but also heavy fees in connection with raising the mortgage. I know many instances myself in which the expenses have been on this scale: There is, first of all, £8 for procuration; the valuation, £2; the drawing of the deeds, £2; and other expenses, £4: making a total of £16, which is equal to 2 per cent. on the amount borrowed—£800; thus causing an extra $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. to be added to the $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., making the total 8 per cent., or 3 per cent. more than the settler would have to pay under this Government system. Now, if we can abolish that, and

2.0 the great apprehension that many settlers feel when they go to borrow money that they may fail to raise it, it would be a good thing. In many instances settlers have collapsed because they have no confidence in the borrowing system. I do not wish to detain the House further, because I have said substantially what I wished to say. I shall give a general support to the Bill, though I shall be inclined to vote for amendments, first, to lessen the amount to be lent, and, secondly, to secure Boards of Commissioners which shall be removed from all corrupting influences. If any member of this House will move in this direction I shall be most happy to support him. At the same time, I may say I congratulate the Colonial Treasurer on having brought forward this measure on such very short notice. Taking the Bill altogether, it is a very good one; and I am sure there is sufficient intelligence in this House to make the Bill workable and in the best interests of the colony.

Mr. PIRANI.—I wish to make a personal explanation, Sir. The honourable member for Waipawa misrepresented me when he said that I stated I was opposed to the Bill including Crown tenants. What I said was that the Bill could not include Crown tenants, because the provisions would not apply. I am in favour of including Crown tenants in the proper manner, but not in the manner provided in the Bill as drafted.

Major HARRIS.—Sir, this is a matter I have taken a considerable interest in since the year 1881. I have advocated it on several occasions, and I found that at that time the settlers were pleased at the very idea of it. What their feeling is at present I am not aware, but I think they must have changed their minds very considerably if they do not approve of it now. I thank the Government for having brought this measure before the House, and, whatever may be the result, and whether the Bill goes through Committee in its present shape or not, I think the settlers generally have reason to thank the Government for taking them into consideration at all. In reference to the opposition to this measure, I take very little notice of that at all, as I think it carries very little weight. For instance, in times past we have heard what has been said about the Cheviot Estate, and what the purchase of that estate was going to lead to. We know that there were as many members against that as there are against this measure, and the prophecies were that it was to be a very great failure; and now we hear this is to be a great failure. I remember when the Land- and Income-tax Bill was proposed as a substitute for the property-tax: when that measure was before the House there were as many prophecies of evil against it as there are against this. It was said that the money could not be received under the land-tax, and it was afterwards found that a considerable sum over what was estimated by the Government was obtained under the new proposal; and this also was to oppress the settlers very much. The settlers found out it would be an advantage to them. They had been taxed on their improvements, and they were relieved from such taxation. So that we need pay very little attention to opposition coming from such a quarter. At the same time, it is well to hear both sides of the question, and to let honourable members judge between the parties. We have been told, as we were told in regard to the land- and income-tax, that the Government are driving capital out of the country. That is strange, because some of those very honourable gentlemen have also stated that this Government is reducing the rate of interest. Now, some of the honourable members opposite state that they could obtain money at 5 per cent. I think it is very good of them to make that known to honourable members on this side of the House, because some honourable members on this side of the House who may possibly require money may thus be put in the way of getting it. I think, however, this House should not be made the medium of advertising cheap money. If advertising is to be done it should be done through the newspapers. Those who have obtained money at 5 per cent. must have very good security, and such transactions must take place on a large scale. Small holders of property, I feel quite certain, cannot obtain money at such a rate. There is no member in this House who knows of a person possessed of but small property getting money at 5 per cent. on that property. If there is a member in the House who knows such a case I should like him to speak up. There is no reply to that. It is only the large holders of property who can obtain money at 5 per cent. I shall support the Bill, but will reserve to myself the right, in Committee, of doing what I can to improve it. I believe it is the wish of the honourable gentleman who has brought forward the measure that we should do our best to improve it. I object to the amount of £1,500,000, proposed to be raised for this purpose. I think we might agree to a smaller amount than that, seeing that we have money in the Public Trust Office, Insurance Office, and Post Office. If these moneys could be utilised to commence such a scheme it might be well, and then, subsequently, if it was found desirable, the scheme could be enlarged. I should like, however, the people to have a voice in the matter. I object also to the Bill in this respect: that the money is to be lent on land under the Land Transfer Act. I do not think it is right to require persons to bring their title under the Land Transfer Act, because it will, perhaps, cost them £20. I have known several cases where it has cost £20. I object to the salaries which it is proposed to pay, for I think it is quite possible for this scheme to be managed by the officers at present in the Government service. I object to the maximum grant being £5,000—I think if we made it £1,000 it would be much better; and I have an objection also to the minimum advance being fixed at £50. I think it would give greater satisfaction if the sum fixed were much smaller. It is the very small people I like to favour all I possibly can. I think if it were £25 it would be very much better. There are a great many of them I know have taken up rough land in the back country. They have taken up land with very little means to do it. They depend a good deal upon the labour they can get round about. They go away with little else than the flour they take with them, and an axe on their shoulder; and I think, after spending their time in the bush, they can quickly improve it to the extent of £50, and it would be a great advantage to them if they could obtain an advance of £25 upon their improvements. I feel sure they would be very thankful if they could get that. We have been told this afternoon, by a gentleman who should have known a great deal better, that the farmers have been pets, and he says that they get the £500 exemption. Well, Sir, residents in towns get the same. Those who have properties in towns get the £500 exemption, and I do not see that farmers can be looked upon as pets in a case like that, where others are receiving a like benefit. I regret very much that there should be a mention at all of the farmers as against the townspeople. I think we ought to agree that what is good for the one would be good for the other, and not to grudge giving a little assistance to the farmers seeing that they have such a number of roads to make, and that all the improvements done in the country have to be done by them: and no doubt they are of assistance to the towns, for, of course, the towns could not do without them. I should like that we should feel that there is really no compulsion about this at all. There is no farmer compelled to take the money if he can get the money cheaper or to greater advantage from a private individual. There is nothing to compel him to take it from the Government; so that there is no disadvantage to him in that respect. Now, it has been mentioned here this evening that this will be no good to settlers who are already in debt—that they will not be able to obtain advances. I feel confident they could obtain advances, and could pay off their present mortgages with them, with the money from the Government—that is, if they could get sufficient to pay off the mortgages at present. As to the amount of two-thirds, well, I think that that means that the officials who would have to look after this matter would be empowered to go to that extent; but it does not follow that they would go to the two-thirds limit in any case. They would have power to do so if they thought it worth while to do it. I think it will be a great advantage to persons to have thirty-six years in which to pay the money; and they will feel, while they are paying the 1 per cent. over and above the 5 per cent., that that goes towards paying off the principal. I think that will be a very great advantage, and particularly so when they know that they can reduce the amount of their indebtedness as they go on by paying sums in at any time they wish. I also think the charge made by the Government for obtaining this money is reasonable. I shall not detain the House longer at this hour of the morning.

Mr. WARD.—Sir, I can quite understand that on a subject so intricate and difficult as this some honourable members should have a certain amount of misapprehension and misconception, and I say, without any discourtesy to honourable members who have endeavoured to study and master the Bill, that in some cases they have a very incorrect idea of what is intended under the Bill. I shall be able to show this before I finish. I know I shall have to travel at a very rapid pace in order to deal with the criticisms of the Bill within the limited time of half an hour. The honourable the senior member for Wellington City, at least, when he proceeded to criticize the Bill very severely—and, having made his criticism, at an earlier period of the debate, he took himself away from the House, and did not remain to hear what was said in connection with the important points he raised—did not understand the matter, or else placed the position before the House for the purpose of misleading honourable members. I refer particularly to the cost of raising the loan, and to the amount of the expenses in connection with that loan,—to the lawyers' fees, as well as the other expenses. I shall come to that matter presently. Before I proceed further, however, let me say to the honourable member for Patea that his statement that this Bill had been altered since it was introduced is incorrect. The title of the Bill was altered, but nothing in the Bill save the title was changed. The Bill in every other respect is the same as it was prepared in the first instance, and there is no alteration in it. Then, the honourable gentleman said that stock had gone down since the introduction of the Financial Statement. It is a pity the honourable gentleman does not adhere more closely to facts. What has happened since the Financial Statement was delivered? I may say that I have in my hand, but have not time to read it, a full résumé of the Financial Statement which appeared in the London Times and in other London daily papers a day or two after the Statement was delivered in the House, in which the whole of the important proposals contained in the Statement were reviewed. The cheap-money scheme, the proposal to obtain £750,000 for land-purchase and roading—all the financial proposals of the Government appeared in the London newspapers on the 24th July; and this is what has happened: Our 4-per-cent. stocks have advanced from 107 to 109½, and the 3-per-cents have since gone up from 101 to 108. I am absolutely correct in what I am saying. The information I have given honourable members is contained in the cables of the 6th September,—a few days ago,—and the statement I am making is perfectly correct. During the debate I have been twitted by the honourable member for Patea with having made a slip of an "0" in the remarks I made in introducing the Bill. I stated at the time, before sitting down, that I had in the hurry misread my notes. But two honourable gentlemen in the House have since made worse slips. The honourable member for Patea said the Government under these proposals, on the 1 per cent. repayments, would acquire £150,000 a year. Compare this with my slip. He turned £15,000 into £150,000; and he has the coolness to twit me with having made a slip of an "0"! But honourable members have not thought it proper to similarly twit my honourable friend with having put one "0" too many—

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—That is what they "0."

Mr. WARD.—The honourable member, in that case, said £150,000: it was quite a pardonable slip, and any one might easily fall into the same error. I remind him of his mistake just to show that people who live in glass houses should not throw stones. Again, what did the honourable member for Nelson say? He said £750,000 was paid to the Assurance Fund. To have been correct he should have stated £7,500. I corrected him, and then he said he had made a slip, and put himself right.

Mr. GRAHAM.—It was not of so much consequence as yours.

Mr. WARD.—Slips of this sort sometimes occur when such matters are hurriedly dealt with in the House. The honourable member for Nelson, like the honourable member for Patea, made a much worse slip than I did, and yet they both coolly criticized my slip, and forgot their own entirely. I remind them of this; it may do them good. I corrected the mistake at once, and I think honourable members have nothing to complain of in this respect. I have just one word to say about the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs. He said that this Bill was a copy of the Victorian Act. When I heard him say that I was very much amused, because, as a matter of fact, it is not a copy of that Act. I have no copy, and I felt perfectly sure that the draftsman had not a copy. I sent to the draftsman asking if he had a copy of the Victorian Act, and he assured me that he had not, nor had he used that Act in connection with this one, and since Dr. Newman had made the statement he had tried but failed to get a copy of it. Finally, I asked the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs if he had a copy, and he kindly lent me his copy to-night. Then I found, by a close examination of the Victorian Act, that the only similarity between the Victorian one and this is in the last schedule, which happens to be the same—namely, a 5-per-cent. table. I think my honourable friend should be more careful in regard to his arguments, because when an honourable member begins to criticize an important Bill like this he should be well fortified before depreciating the efforts of the Government in introducing it: and he should not have made a statement which is incorrect. The fact is, the rate of interest being the same, the table was bound, if correctly computed, to be the same. Then, the honourable member and some other members misexplained, or they do not understand, the way in which it is proposed to work this land-bond system. What did the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs say? He said, assuming that a man wanted to borrow £500, what would he require to do? He would require to go to his butcher with his bond, and probably have to pay something by way of discount before he got the money. As a matter of fact, if a man wanted to borrow £500 he would not get the bond at all, as the bond would be given to the man who lent the money to the Government. Yet in discussing that important point the honourable member absolutely led this House to suppose that the man who borrowed the money was the man who got the bonds! But the man who borrows the money is not the man who gets the bonds. The man who lends the money is the man who gets the bonds, which is a very material difference. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay criticized the Bill not unfairly, but he made one or two statements that I shall refer to as I pass on. He said that money was hoarded up because the confidence of capital was shaken. I want to know, that being the case, how it is that one institution alone is said to have sent out something like a million pounds from the people of this colony; and I think it is unfair for the honourable gentleman to make a statement to the effect that there is a want of confidence in the Administration of this country, causing money to be withdrawn from investment in the colony. But the honourable gentleman said it was rather difficult to argue against such a scheme as this: and probably it was difficult for him to so argue, seeing that he advocated the borrowing of twenty millions in 1877 for a scheme under much more unfavourable conditions. He said that taxation was then much lower than it is now. Was not that a very good reason for now endeavouring to give the people cheaper money. And if their taxes were so much less then, surely they could better afford to pay more for their money. Then the honourable gentleman wanted to borrow twenty millions. Would honourable members believe that at the time he referred to the total amount of mortgages existing in this colony was only £5,635,248, including town and country mortgages? Yet the honourable gentleman, who professes to be so cautious, advocated the borrowing of twenty millions of money—to do what? To wipe off £5,635,248 of mortgages.

AN HON. MEMBER.—There are no records to show that.

MR. WARD.—The honourable member does not like that. If the honourable member wishes for records, he has only to look up the parliamentary returns, and he will find the whole thing there recorded: £5,635,248 was the amount of mortgages, and £20,000,000 was the amount that my honourable friend advocated should be borrowed; and he also advocated that the money should be lent at 6 per cent. Then he went on to coolly ask, Even if this money were borrowed, what advantage would it be to farmers, to lend it at 5 per cent.? The honourable gentleman went on to say that money lent at 5 per cent. would be of small benefit to the farmers. All I can say is, if there is to be very little advantage to the farmers out of our proposal, what advantage would it be to them to obtain money at the rate of 6 per cent., as the honourable member suggested? And yet he went on to say that he approved of a scheme to advance the money to settlers out of the deposits in the Post-Office Savings-Bank. He is most inconsistent. Now, I want to know where the difference comes in. If he used the deposits of the people lodged in the Post-Office Savings-Bank for the purpose of advancing loans to people in this colony, where is the difference between doing that and paying interest to the people direct, as is proposed under this Bill? There is little or no difference. Any proposals the Government makes would be opposed by the honourable member. I now pass on to the remarks of the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout); and I want, in connection with this matter, to place before the House, in the first instance, what the position is. The honourable gentleman stated deliberately here that there would be a loss of £20,000 a year interest upon the investment proposal, and he gave a series of figures to show how this loss would be incurred. He said the Treasurer forgot to tell the House what the loss was going to be between the time the money was raised and the time it would be paid by the colony and become interest-bearing, and what the cost was of raising the loan. I forgot nothing of the sort; and now I will tell honourable members what the cost would be of raising a million of money. I believe the honourable gentleman clearly understood it when he asked the House to believe that there would be a loss of £15,000 at 1 per cent. When he said that, he knew perfectly well that the loan was extending over thirty-six years, and that, in respect to the cost of raising it, it was not, as he asked us to suppose, all chargeable in one year, but ought to be extended over the whole period for which the loan is issued. Upon a loan of a million to be raised at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the cost of raising would be £15,000, and management and expenses £15,000; the interest at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. would be £35,000; the Insurance Fund, £25,000; and the investments, £1,000,000: that would make it £1,073,000. On the other side, the credit would be £1,000,000 for the money invested; valuation-fees to be paid would be £1,050; the interest at 5 per cent., to be paid back to the department, would come to £50,000; fees for law-costs, £525: or a total of £1,051,575. Now, from the £1,070,000 there is to be deducted £14,500—I am now calculating for a period of thirty years only, instead of for thirty-six years—that leaves you a balance of £1,055,500; and for Solicitors and Valuers you would require to deduct £10,000 contributed by other departments: leaving a total of £1,045,500. With regard to this amount of £10,000, I would ask honourable members who have been talking about these expenses if I did not explain to the House that these Solicitors were to do the whole of the business of the Public Trust Office and the Government Insurance Office, and other Government departments, and must these lending departments of the Government not be charged for the services rendered in that way? This Advances to Settlers Office would be credited with the amount of £10,000, the contribution for work done for other departments, and the fees for work done by the office; and, in connection with a million of money raised in the way I have just stated to the House, would you believe that, instead of a loss, as some honourable members have tried to make out, there would be a profit to the colony of over £6,000 on transactions extending over thirty-six years and a half?

Mr. FRASER.—What about the mortgage-tax?

Mr. WARD.—The mortgage-tax has nothing whatever to do with this position. I am prepared to deal with the mortgage-tax, but I am not going to be put off this matter. The position has been utterly misrepresented. That is often very astutely done by certain members of this House; but I am prepared to put this table of the exact position in Hansard, and I ask those honourable gentlemen to dispute it if they can. Every item that ought to be debited is debited, and, instead of a loss, as some honourable members endeavoured to show, there would be, under this proposal, a profit of over £6,000 after debiting it fully; and honourable members who from their standing in the House ought to know better have no right to attempt to mislead the House and the country in such an important matter as this, which could be demonstrated with the greatest possible ease if honourable members would take the trouble to look at it. The honourable member asks what about the mortgage-tax. We heard the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) say this was going to cost £6,200 on £1,500,000, and we heard the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw) repeat the same error, and the honourable member for Waitemata and honourable gentlemen all round the House were doing the same thing. Now, did these members not know there was a deduction of £500 to be made from the £1,500 mortgage before the mortgage-tax is levied at all? If they did know, why did they not deduct it? Does it not show that these honourable members do not know what they have been talking about? I tell them now at any rate that it is so. And I say they do not know what they are talking about. If they look at the Land and Income Assessment Act they will find that there is an exemption of £500 on a mortgage up to £1,500 to be deducted, the exemption decreasing by £1 for every £2 of increase in the amount of mortgage. Those honourable members made no deduction, as was clearly shown by the fact that the senior member for Wellington City said, "You have not provided for the mortgage-tax." What is the position of the Government Insurance Department and the Public Trust Office? Do they deduct the mortgage-tax? Most undeniably not. The Government do not intend to deduct the mortgage-tax in each individual case. What would be the position by the time the million of money had been lent out? Instead of the loss which members talk about, the loss would be about £2,000. It would really seem as if members assume that the whole of the twenty-nine millions advanced to the people of the colony at the present time was going to be advanced by the Government under this scheme. We know that there are now people in the colony trying to put out money at $5\frac{1}{2}$ or 6 per cent. But were they doing it before they heard of this proposal? Certainly not. If private individuals are found willing to lend money at 5 per cent. the Government will be only too glad to step aside. The Government merely desire to see cheap money in the colony, and, if the effect of the proposal of the Government is to induce private individuals to supply the necessary want, that is all we require. When honourable members talk of the deduction of the mortgage-tax, let them fairly put the position. Even if it were intended to charge the mortgage-tax it would not be imposed on existing loans, but on fresh business; and if we advance a million a year on individual mortgages, the tax, so far as the Government are concerned, will not be calculated at all on individual mortgages, but the gross amount of the mortgages will be calculated and the lending office will be asked to provide for the tax. That is the position which the Public Trust Office and the Government Insurance Department are now in. Therefore, if honourable members think the Government intend to put an incubus on the shoulders of the settlers in this way, they have made a great mistake, because it was never intended, and, in fact, would not be likely to be the case. Then, again, about the Bankruptcy Act. We heard the senior member for Wellington City talk a great deal about the Bankruptcy Act; and what did he say? He said, "Does the House know that under the proposals of the Government a man may get his discharge from every creditor but the Government, but for the term of his natural life he would remain undischarged in connection with his liability under this Bill?" The Bankruptcy Act would not apply in this case at all. Now, if honourable members look at the Bankruptcy Act of 1892, clause 132, subsection (d), they will find that under the law as it stands at present a man is responsible to the Crown even if he obtains a discharge from his other debts. What we are doing under this Bill is only widening the existing law. For what purpose? For the purpose of protecting the State. When the Government advances up to two-thirds of the value of the security it is essential that the State should be protected, and we have therefore taken the necessary safeguard in this Bill by saying the Bankruptcy Act should not apply, and, in doing that, we have only made an extension of what is already the law. Yet the senior member for Wellington City said this was an outrageous and dreadful condition imposed under the Bill upon the unfortunate settler. But, as I have shown, all that he referred to is done under the existing Bankruptcy Act, and we have simply made an extension of it. If it is thought necessary in Committee that this important clause should be amended so as to insure for the man who is unfortunate enough to go through the Bankruptcy Court the necessary protection to enable him to go back and resume his holding of land, I am willing to consider that. But I assure honourable members that the colony is not going to be put in a position whereby any creditor, or any combination of people, may say, "Here is the Government which has advanced so much to the settler; under the circumstances, we are going to have a hand in taking from this man what he has acquired from the Government." We are not going to put the settler, or any person who obtains a loan under the Bill, in that position. It is in the interest of the person who has obtained a loan from the Government that he should be protected in the way now suggested. Now, Sir, the honourable member said that this was a departure from the Financial Statement, and I have heard it said by honourable members in the House during this evening and the other evening that this was also a departure from the Governor's Speech. I am very much surprised to hear honourable members who have read the Financial Statement and the Governor's Speech come to this House and say it is a new departure. In what respect is it a departure? It is a departure so far as the details are concerned, and in the introduction of a provision to advance to leaseholders: but nearly every member of this House wanted that put in. As a matter of fact, I introduced it into the House in the Trustees Bill; and, lest the Trustees Bill should not go through, I decided that it should be put into this Bill, so as to strengthen the position of the Government in their endeavour to assist the leaseholders who have taken up land for settlement in the colony. The Government thought that leaseholders should have an opportunity of obtaining cheap money, and we have therefore put it into the Bill. We have heard honourable members say that this is one of the reasons for their opposing this Bill, because it is a departure in this respect. Now, I tell honourable members, with all due respect, that it is not possible to bring down all the details of a measure in the Financial Statement. If you want strict adherence to the proposals in the Financial Statement, the Government would have practically to introduce their Bills side by side with the Financial Statement. Then, again, with regard to the proposal in this Bill to raise debentures at 4 per cent., I am amused at the misconception of some honourable members on this point. Now, I tell the House that the Government do not intend to pay even 3½ per cent. for this money if they can get it for less. They hope they will not require to pay more than 3 per cent. for it. The proviso in the Bill, which says debentures can be issued at 4 per cent., is very necessary, for the reason that the money may be temporarily required for the purpose of carrying on the business under the scheme. Temporary accommodation may be required for two or three months at various times, in which case it would perhaps be necessary to pay at the rate of 4 per cent.

An Hon. MEMBER.—But you have it in the latter part of the clause also.

Mr. WARD.—If it is in the latter part of the clause it can be struck out; but I say that is the reason for it; and any Government or any members of this House who wanted to make a success of a large proposal such as this would have hampered themselves in the initiatory stages of carrying out the business of the department if they had not inserted such a proviso as this. Then, the honourable member for Palmerston stated that the Government was intending to issue inscribed stock, and he was surprised at the proposal to issue inscribed stock in the first instance: but the provision in this Bill to issue debentures at 4 per cent. is an extra precaution. Those honourable members who say we cannot get money at 3½ per cent. do not seem to know what is going on in the world, and I would therefore invite them to listen for one moment to a paragraph from Commerce, dated the 8th August, in which it states that deposits have fallen to ½ per cent., and it goes on to state further that call-money can be overwhelmingly supplied at ½ per cent. I am not going to read this paragraph at length, but it goes on to say that nothing short of wholesale shipments of gold abroad could ever alter the overburdened condition of the money-market. In addition to that, there is a statement in another financial paper to the effect that £100,000 was recently lent in London for 16s. 8d. for the use of it for one day. I think honourable members, when they hear that, will agree that the Government should be able to get the money at 3½ per cent., and at as cheap rates as any of the other colonies. We heard the honourable member for Wairarapa making comparisons between New Zealand and Canada, the Cape, and Natal. He says that the Canadian $\frac{3}{4}$ -per-cents stand at 105 to 106, those of the Cape at 106, and those of Natal at 108. I think those were the figures he quoted. But does not the honourable gentleman know that Canada and the Cape are much older borrowing colonies than our colony? Is it not something creditable to this colony that our stock stands at 109? The honourable member said New Zealand stocks were only 103, side by side with those of Canada, at 105; the Cape, 106; and Natal, 108. I say the honourable member cannot point to any time in the history of this colony when our stocks ever before reached these figures. The honourable member, I am sorry to say—like some other honourable members—makes statements apparently for the purpose of decrying the credit of this colony. Who is responsible for whatever want of confidence there may have been from time to time in respect to this colony at Home? Who has contributed the articles to the Investors' Review making statements to the detriment of New Zealand? Who made the communication to the Scotsman, which was read by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) to-night? Can the honourable member tell me who made it?

Mr. BELL.—No. Can the honourable gentleman?

Mr. WARD.—No; and I do not believe the honourable member knows who it was.

Mr. BELL.—No.

Mr. WARD.—Certainly not. That information, published in the Scotsman, looks very much as if somebody in this colony supplied it.

Mr. BELL.—It must have been sent by cable.

Mr. WARD.—It was not sent by cable. I have read the full résumé published by the London Times of the proposals of the Government. The article published in the Scotsman looks as if it had been supplied by some one who assumed that he knew the finances of this colony and the Government proposals. Who has taken this active interest in the colony at Home? Does anybody in New Zealand ever take such an interest in the affairs of Scotland, for instance, as to write here in such a way about their affairs?

Mr. BUCHANAN.—We have lent them no money.

Mr. WARD.—No, but we shall be able to do so some day, I hope. There appear to be certain busybodies who are ever ready to damage the credit of this colony so long as they think that by doing so they are injuring the credit of the opposite party. In reply to the honourable member for Chalmers, who advocated the currency of this colony being materially changed, I may point out to him that the change which he suggested was tried in Queensland, and was an entire failure. The paper currency there fell off 50 per cent., and a loss of £20,000 occurred to the Government during the first year it was tried. The experiment was so unsatisfactory that I do not think there is any probability of this colony trying the system. My time is almost finished, and I must therefore come to an immediate conclusion. With regard to the £5,000 limit, which some honourable members have taken exception to, I wish to say, if you are going to shear the Lending Board of the power of making solid investments, you will weaken the scheme, and prevent the making of small investments. Take the case of insurance companies: to enable them to become strong and safe, they find it necessary to take large risks as well as small. So, if you want to make this lending office weak, you will confine it to small investments alone. We want to make small loans, and that is why I desire to have the loans spread over different classes of risks. The strong must help the weak. Some honourable members—for instance, the honourable member for Wairau and the honourable member for Nelson City—named very small sums as the maximum. If the suggestions of those honourable members are approved of in this respect I shall invite honourable members at once to say that the Bill shall go no further, because no Government would take the responsibility of a scheme which would be made so weak by reducing the securities to such an extent as would result from only making investments up to £200, or even £300. In connection with the proposal that we should each year submit the requirements under this Act for the year to the House, I wish to say this: It is an important point that there should be a limit to the amount to be raised under the Act, and in Committee I shall be perfectly prepared to discuss the matter reasonably. I want to point out, however, that, if a limit is proposed from year to year, that will seriously impede the working of the scheme. I would suggest to honourable members, in connection with this point, that, if they want to see the business successfully carried on, it is a proper thing to say there should be a limit; but if you say the limit is to be one from year to year you will seriously hamper the business of such an office. I think it would be the proper thing to say it should last for so many years, and stop there. I think that is a fair thing. It is quite debatable, and I am prepared in Committee to meet it. Now, in connection with the expense, let me once more point out this important fact: Legal expenses at the present time cost us at the rate of over £7,000 a year. I do not say that is excessive; but under this proposal it is not intended to add to the legal expenses of the country one single sixpence. If honourable gentlemen do not like the legal expenses connected with the scheme, let them direct that the Registrars of Deeds shall perform this work. If they wish to do that, it is possible, and can be considered in Committee; but the proposal in the scheme is one which will not increase the legal expenditure. The only increase will be in connection with the Valuers, and I regard them as more important than the Solicitors; and I think the House will be of the same opinion, and will see that it is of the greatest importance that it should be carried. My time is up, and I can only say that the Government are in earnest in their desire to benefit the people of this colony, and I believe lasting benefits will be conferred upon the people if the proposals in this Bill are assented to.

SUNNYSIDE ASYLUM.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON said he had been told, in regard to the system of co-operative work that had been applied to skilled workmen, that in some cases these workmen had not averaged 5s. a day, and that after the co-operative work was done these workmen were given work at a higher rate of wages than the ordinary days wage to compensate them for the loss they had incurred in working at such low wages. He asked a question some time ago with reference to fair wages, and it appeared there was a clause in the Public Works Department conditions for tendering which stipulated that the current rate of wages must be paid. He thought the Government should certainly set a good example; and if his information was correct—namely, that 5s. a day was the actual amount earned by these men—he thought it was not quite so successful as they could wish. Regarding this particular block of buildings referred to in the motion, he could say from personal observation that if the men there made anything like wages they had made them at a loss to the department, because they were not provided with sufficiently good tools to carry out the work. He thought, if this return were furnished, they would be able to see what were the wages paid to the men, and would see also the average amount earned by them on this job. He therefore moved the motion standing in his name.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That a return be laid upon the table of the cost of the new block of buildings (containing baths and closets) at Sunnyside Asylum, referred to in the last annual report on asylums, showing (1) actual cost of material, (2) actual cost of labour, (3) number of men employed, and (4) time worked and wages earned per week by each man, stating nature of employment, and whether on co-operative or day labour."—(Hon. Mr. JENKINSON.)

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI objected to this motion altogether. If they were going to take up this position they might as well move for a return to find out how shopkeepers managed to carry on an extensive business, what their receipts were, what rates and taxes they had to pay, and what return was left them, after discharging all these demands, to meet business engagements. He could see no necessity whatever for asking for returns of this character, and he was therefore prepared to move, That the motion of the honourable gentleman be not adopted. They were met there to legislate on matters affecting the welfare of the colony; they were not there merely to look after the interests of a particular class of men—to find out what wages they got, and what wages they did not get. It seemed rather strange that the Minister had nothing to say in regard to this matter.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said this was a sort of dictation to Ministers. He could inform the honourable gentleman that Ministers quite understood their duty, and were not going to be dictated to by the honourable gentleman. The motion was a very proper one, and he entirely agreed with it.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—Well, we expect to hear something from Ministers on the question.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said they were not going to be dictated to by the honourable gentleman. It was a constant cause of irritation to hear Ministers accused in this way because the honourable gentleman did not get everything he wanted. He objected to this class of interruptions from the honourable gentleman, and he hoped the Council would not tolerate it. The honourable gentleman had stated that Ministers did not say anything.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—We expect the Ministers to guide the Council.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said they were not going to be guided by the honourable gentleman.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said that, with regard to what had been stated by the Hon. Mr. Jenkinson, he always understood it had been the case hitherto that Ministers should give their opinion upon matters of importance like this; and he thought it was the duty of Ministers to express their opinion in this case, because it was impossible that each individual member of the Council should know the whole ins and outs of the question. He trusted, therefore, that for the guidance of the Council Ministers would express an opinion.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY rose to a point of order. This reflection had been cast upon him personally, he supposed, by the Hon. Mr. Shrimski. He might say that he never allowed a motion to pass by without making himself acquainted with the facts. He had on this occasion ascertained from the department whether they had any objection to the motion, and he thought silence was generally understood to give consent. It was never his wish to take up the time of the Council needlessly, and he did not trouble it with more speeches than he could help; and on this occasion, having ascertained from the department that they had no objection whatever to the motion, he thought it unnecessary to intervene.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE would like the honourable gentleman in his reply to say briefly what was the policy underlying his motion. Did he desire to demonstrate that it was a good thing to take this work on the co-operative principle, or did he desire to say that these works having been dealt with under the co-operative principle had led to the payment of a small wage to the labourers? For his own part, he had no objection at all to the return. As a matter of interest, he wanted to know what the honourable gentleman's precise object was. He had no doubt it was a want of keenness of perception on his (Dr. Grace's) part, but the honourable gentleman seemed to him not to make it quite clear to the Council what his object was in making the inquiry. Was it his desire to demonstrate that the erection of this building by co-operative labour was a good principle? Secondly, was it his desire to show that, notwithstanding the erection of the building on the co-operative principle, the co-operative labourers did not receive sufficient wages? and if that was so, what did he wish to deduce from that argument?

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON had been in hopes that the honourable gentleman would explain his object. Did he propose to show that the workmen who were put on the job were supplied with bad tools? If they did not earn 5s. a day, was it the Government or the men who had lost by the work? Probably the honourable gentleman would explain what was expected from the men if they were bad workmen and had bad tools given them.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON said that, in answer to the Hon. Dr. Grace, he could only say that the honourable gentleman might put what construction he liked on the return when it was furnished; but he did not want it to be thought that it was in the interests of the workmen alone that he had asked this question. He had the idea that co-operative work, when extended to skilled work, would not be a success. It might be easy for the officers of the Public Works Department to give out estimates, and to fix prices for unskilled work at something near a remunerative rate, both for the men and for the colony. But in the case of skilled work, where they had probably four or five different classes of workmen employed, he was very much afraid the officers of the Public Works Department would not be able to make estimates sufficiently exact either to give the workmen a good wage, or, if they did give them a good wage, on the other hand prevent a loss from accruing to the department. In reference to the particular work mentioned in the motion, he thought a great part of it was done on the co-operative principle; and when he spoke of those workmen not having sufficient tools, and tools of the right sort to do the work, he spoke from actual knowledge, because he happened to be an Official Visitor to this asylum. During one of his visits there he saw some of the workmen—at least, one man in particular, a bricklayer's labourer—working with a bucket which had the bottom worn out, and a little bit of board put in to serve as a bottom; and besides that he had a piece of rope to haul up the material to the scaffolding, but the rope was 3ft. or 4ft. too short. It appeared to him that, if the work was to be conducted—not necessarily in the interests of the men—but in the interests of the public and in the interests of the department, these men should be furnished with good tools. He did not know whether these men furnished their own tools or not, but certainly they should have had better tools. At the same time he noticed the carpenters working with tools which did not appear first-class, and with which they could not possibly do the work satisfactorily. He did not know that it was on this special job the men got 5s. a day, but he was told in Christchurch that on some jobs that would be the wage earned. He thought the Hon. Mr. Shrimski, when he objected to the motion, spoke rather hurriedly. He thought the motion brought forward was rather in the interests of the public service, and he had considered that the honourable gentleman would be only too willing to support him in moving a motion like this. But the honourable gentleman had said, if they were to ask for returns of this kind, they might as well ask for returns in reference to shopkeepers. It was quite true the colony had nothing to do with shopkeepers in business, but it was quite true also that, in the interests of the public service, they should inquire into these things. These buildings were carried out by the Public Works Department; and if members came there to legislate for the country, and to do their duty with regard to it, he thought they should keep their eyes open to the manner in which the public money was being expended. He would only ask members to look back scarcely a couple of months at the work that was done on the Museum here, and, though members who were accustomed to pass that building might not have noticed it,—he did not say it was done by co-operative labour, but it was done by the Public Works Department,—it was positively sickening to see the way in which the work was carried out, and the weeks and weeks that were occupied in painting it. He thought, if the Hon. Mr. Shrimski reflected a moment, he would agree with him that this was a most important part of their duty: to see that the public moneys expended were expended in the right way, so that the Public Works Department got a fair return from the money. They must act fairly, and, while getting a fair return for the wages given, they must at the same time give a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. He did not think for one moment that the department would have any objection to furnishing the return. He only wished the Council to understand that he had simply moved for the return in the interest of the public service, and in order to see that they got a fair day's work for a fair day's wages, and paid a fair day's wages for it.

Motion agreed to.

BOROUGH-SLIGHTING.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH did not intend to take up the time of the Council at any great length in dealing with this motion. He thought it would be admitted that it was not outside the duties of Municipalities to provide cheap gas and water for the inhabitants of boroughs. In fact, the Legislature had contemplated that the Municipalities would undertake such works as gasworks, for in the Municipal Corporations Act there were no less than nineteen sections dealing with the question of lighting. The whole of the machinery for dealing with this matter was provided in the Municipal Corporations Act of 1886. Clause 353 provided that the Borough Council might do all things to light the streets, and to supply the inhabitants with gas. They might acquire land on which to erect the buildings; they might raise a special loan for the purpose; they might supply gas outside the borough; they might levy a gas rate; they must keep a separate account for all gas receipts; and clause 369 authorised the Borough Council to purchase gasworks. It was this portion of the Act, he thought, which required amendment, and to meet the case he had given notice of the motion which he was now moving. He would like to point out to the Council that clause 369 enabled the Corporation to purchase gasworks already in existence in the borough or in the neighbourhood. It further provided that the Corporation or Council might erect gasworks; but upon what conditions? This was where the hardship was—in that the Corporation would have to approach the Legislature and get a special Act passed enabling them to commence such works. Now, he would ask honourable members' attention for one moment, and ask them to call upon their experience as to the trouble, and the cost, and the difficulty of getting a special Act passed through the Legislature when that special Act dealt with vested interests, and such large vested interests as honourable members must admit gas companies' interests were. Clause 369 appeared to be very fair on the face of it, for it provided that the Corporation might purchase gasworks; but upon what condition? When the gas company was willing to sell. Well, it was needless for him to say that gas companies were good speculations as a rule, and gas companies, as long as they could make 10 per cent. or 20 per cent., were not likely to willingly offer their properties for sale to Borough Councils. He thought he had said almost enough to lead the Council to believe he was right in assuming that the Municipal Corporations Act required amending in the direction of his motion—that was, if it was a desirable thing that a Corporation should possess gasworks. He might also add that the law at present—the Act he had quoted from—granted a monopoly to a gas company. It had passed into a proverb almost that monopolies were bad; and in connection with this matter he might be permitted to read the opinion of a recent writer upon monopolies. His attention had been called by an honourable member present to a book on this subject. The writer was dealing with the action of the State in the matter of certain undertakings which were total or partial monopolies. He said—

"There is a large and constantly-increasing class of industrial undertakings possessing privileges which give them more or less the character of monopolies, and which thus call for special regulation by the State. It is a matter of speculative interest to ascertain what these undertakings are, and what are the characteristics which they possess in common, so that we may be able to recognise and define them."

He then went on to say,—

"The following is a tolerably complete list of these undertakings: Harbours and natural navigations, canals, docks, lighthouses, roads, bridges and ferries, railways, tramways, gasworks, waterworks, the post-office, and telegraphs.

"In some of these—e.g., docks, railways, gasworks, and telegraphs—competition has been attempted; whilst others have been monopolies from their commencement.

"But in none of them has competition proved to be completely successful. It is of great importance that this point should be kept steadily in view, since it is only in those cases which competition cannot fully regulate, and so far as competition does not regulate them, that the need for special State interference is felt."

The Hon. Mr. WALKER.—Who is the writer?

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH said, T. H. Farrer, dealing with the question of "The State in its Relation to Trade." He dealt with monopolies under all the heads that he (Mr. McCullough) had just quoted, and, in speaking of gasworks, he went on to say,—

"The case of gas-supply is peculiar, since gas-manufacture has reached a high state of development and success; and the complete effect of the attempts Parliament has made to control the monopoly is better seen than in cases where profits are still small. In many cases the dividends have become so large that the public are painfully aware of the conflict of interest between themselves and the shareholders; and, on the other hand, in certain large places, prudent Municipalities have made a good thing for the ratepayers out of the supply of gas.

"There is one case—viz., Manchester—in which the gasworks have been originally established by the Municipality; and there may be others. There are many cases in which works originally established by a company have been subsequently bought by the Municipality, and these cases are on the increase; but how few they are, in comparison to the cases of gasworks still owned by companies, may be seen from the following figures:

The total number of gas companies in England and Wales, according to the parliamentary return of 1881, is 336, with an aggregate authorised capital of about £41,500,000. In the metropolis there are four gas companies, with a capital of £13,000,000. Besides these, there are a certain number of public gasworks in the hands of private persons; and against this number of private enterprises there are 136 cases in which the municipal authority is the owner of the gasworks."

He had thought fit to point out these opinions to the Council in dealing with the question of monopoly. Turning up the English Acts of Parliament dealing with gas companies, he found that in nearly every case there were certain conditions introduced, Parliament evidently feeling a monopoly was being granted. The Acts made provision, first, that the price of gas should not exceed a certain figure, and, in the second place, that the dividends should not exceed a certain percentage, evidently with the intention of conserving as much as possible the interests of the gas-consumer. In the Act authorising the Droydsden Gas Company, the provision was that the cost should not exceed 6s. per 1,000ft., and that price was only to continue for five years, after which the price of gas per 1,000ft. was to be reduced to 5s. 6d. In Leicester the price was not to exceed 4s. 6d., and the dividends were not to exceed 6 per cent. In Croydon the price was not to exceed 6s., and the dividends were not to exceed 7½ per cent. In an Act incorporating no less than sixteen gas companies in and around London the provision was that the gas should not exceed 4s. 6d. per 1,000ft., and the dividends were not to exceed 10 per cent. It would be seen, then, from these facts that Parliament had attempted to regulate in some way the price of gas to consumers, and to limit the amount paid in dividends. He would like, in contrast, to call the attention of the Council to the provision in some of our local gas companies' Acts, such as that of Auckland, for instance. In the Act passed by the Legislature authorising the formation of the Auckland Gas Company it was provided that the dividends were never to exceed 20 per cent.; and in some of the other enactments the same provision was to be found—as, for instance, the Wellington and Nelson Acts—namely, that the amount paid in dividends was not to exceed 20 per cent. Honourable members would notice the vast difference between the percentage allowed by this Legislature and the percentage of the dividends allowed by the Parliament in England to gas companies there. Another peculiar condition was attached to the Acts of Parliament in Great Britain, and that was, should the profits exceed the amount allowed to be paid in dividends, the excess was to form a reserve fund; and, further, that should any two ratepayers apply to the Court when this reserve fund was of a large amount they could demand an inquiry, and, if the result of the inquiry was such, in the opinion of the Court, that the price of gas could be reasonably reduced, the company was thereupon called on to make a reduction in the price. All these facts pointed to the attempt of the Legislature to conserve the interests of gas-consumers by attaching these conditions to Acts authorising the construction of gasworks. The gas company of Auckland paid no less than 15 per cent. to its shareholders. Its entire capital was £146,215, and it had a reserve fund put aside of 18s. 1d. per share. It would be evident from these figures that the shareholders of the company were in a very favourable position. Under those circumstances, he thought he was justified in saying that had the City Council or the State any control over the gas company of Auckland it might reasonably have been asked to reduce the price of gas. The price was 10s. per 1,000ft., less a discount of 2s. 6d. if paid within the month. That was 7s. 6d. net. The price, whether for lighting, for cooking, or for motive-power, was the same—no reduction was made for cooking or motive purposes, as was the case in other places. It was considered a hardship in Auckland, for it retarded to some extent industrial pursuits, cheap motive-power always tending to increase the number of local industries. Other gas companies in the colony did not pay as large dividends as the Auckland one. Napier paid 10 per cent.; Wanganui, 10 per cent.; Gisborne, 10 per cent.; Hokiika, he was sorry to say, only paid 5 per cent., but Greymouth made up for that by paying 12½ per cent. The Christchurch Gas Company paid 10 per cent. Probably honourable members who were well acquainted with Dunedin and Christchurch would be able to tell the Council the feeling in those cities concerning this question of gas-supply. He remembered seeing a discussion in the Christchurch Press some twelve or eighteen months ago. There was an agitation for the construction by the Corporation of gasworks in opposition to the gas company now having the works there, because the inhabitants thought the price of gas was too high. He believed the result of that agitation was the reduction in the price in Christchurch. The Acts authorising gas companies in New Zealand practically gave the companies a monopoly: first, because there was great difficulty in a Corporation getting authority to establish gasworks themselves; and, in the next place, it was questionable whether a Corporation should go into competition with a company then existing, for it would probably entail loss on both. He wished to take a middle course by giving Corporations authority to purchase at a reasonable and fair price. If gas companies had a monopoly, the question arose: Should the monopoly exist for all time?—because, unless there was some alteration in the law, it would be a monopoly to existing companies for all time. This was not right or fair in the interests of the inhabitants. He thought his motion was liberal and fair. There was no attempt to take an unfair advantage of the companies. It distinctly provided that it should be at the almost unanimous desire and wish of the inhabitants of a city that the Corporation should purchase the gasworks. It required a majority in favour of it of not less than two-thirds. All would admit that that was a very large majority. In the next place, the company was afforded an opportunity of selling at a reasonable and fair price, and it was only in the case of a company refusing to sell, or asking too high a price, that the provisions of the Public Works Act were enforced. This course was suggested that the greatest good might result to the greatest number. He might be told that it would entail hardships upon the shareholders of gas companies to ask them to relinquish what they might consider a very good investment. But the same argument was used with regard to the proprietors of large landed estates, who, under the Land for Settlements Bill, would be called upon to relinquish their properties. The position was somewhat similar, and, if the principle was right in the Land for Settlements Bill, they could not help admitting that it was equally right to deal with the gas companies in the direction he pointed out. He hoped the Council would think so. No doubt many members of the Council were interested in gas companies, and knew more about their working than he did. He was only dealing with the facts and figures he found in the balance-sheets of gas companies, but he was sure that, no matter how much they might be personally interested in the question, it would not at all influence them in dealing with the broad question, as to whether the local authorities of large cities should or should not have the opportunity given them of acquiring the gasworks on fair and reasonable terms. He would be sorry to make any motion or suggest any dealing with the property of other people except in a manner which might be characterized as reasonable, fair, and straightforward. He hoped the Council would not accuse him of wanting to take any course that could be characterized to the contrary. He therefore hoped that the Council would admit that the Municipal Corporations Act required amending in the direction he pointed out, and that his motion would be adopted.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That it be a recommendation to the Government to include in any Bill to amend 'The Municipal Corporations Act, 1886,' provisions whereby Borough Councils desiring to acquire gas or electric-lighting companies' works or property may have the following powers conferred upon them, viz.: (1.) The Council to have the right to demand from a gas or electric-lighting company a statement in writing of the price required for their works, such statement to be lodged with borough officers within forty days from the receipt of the notice demanding such statement. (2.) Should a company refuse to sell, or the price be in the opinion of the Council too large, and no probability of an agreement being arrived at, then the Council to have the right to take the said works compulsorily under the provisions of 'The Public Works Act, 1884,' and the price and the compensation to be paid for such taking shall be assessed in manner provided by that Act: Provided that, before the Council of any borough enter into negotiations with a gas or electric-lighting company for the purchase of works, a poll of the ratepayers of the borough shall have been taken in that respect, and a majority of at least two-thirds shall have been declared in favour of the Council acquiring such works."—(Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.)

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE was sure that the honourable gentleman was only actuated by public spirit in this matter; but there was another side from which they ought to regard the question. The colony was acknowledged to be in great want of capital for many enterprises that it was desirable should be entered into in the country. Was it just, was it fair, was it reasonable, as the honourable gentleman said, that when a company happened to make some little profit at a certain time, its property should be taken away and vested in a Municipality? The honourable gentleman said they had the principle already introduced in the Land for Settlements Bill,—which, he might remark to the honourable gentleman, was not yet passed. But there was this difference: The Land for Settlements Bill dealt with the country as a whole, and conferred certain powers on the Government. This Bill was to confer powers on Municipalities. He presumed the honourable gentleman had before his mind some case in which a gas company had succeeded. He was not at all aware that he had made any proposal to take up any "lame ducks," for which the capital was not sufficient, or where the anticipations of the capitalists had not been realised.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—I have not found any.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE said all the honourable gentleman wanted was to take away from persons who had been fortunate in their investments the result of their enterprise, capital, and work. He was not one of those who thought it desirable that the Government should monopolize all the work of the colony, and especially all the profitable work. They had heard plenty of people talking about annexing the property of the Union Steamship Company, and others talked about annexing other enterprises in this colony; but he had always looked upon this as a very bad thing, because they would come to be mere waiters upon Providence, and that was a very great pity; and when it came to extension of such powers it was time to stop. He did not think that any further powers should be given to Municipalities than they already possessed. There was no difficulty whatever in coming to a voluntary arrangement with a gas company. In some places they had done so, and that ought to quite meet the honourable gentleman's views. No Government could take up a question of this sort; and he did not think there was any particular good to be derived from arguing on matters of this sort as in a debating society. For his own part, he would vote against the resolution, as he did not think the proposal was a wise one. If it were passed, and if it had any effect at all, it would have a very prejudicial effect on enterprise and the introduction of capital into the colony. He thought himself that those who had started the electric light in this colony deserved a great deal of encouragement, and should not be led to believe that they might have their work taken from them at any time if it proved remunerative. He could not see the advisability of putting more powers into the hands of Municipalities, and hoped the motion would not succeed.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER said one wanted to know why they should be asked to pass such a resolution. It did not appear to lead to anything, or to have any relation to any measure which was before them, or likely to be before them in the near future; and, as to the Council giving a lead to the Government, he thought the Government had proved that it did not want the Council to give any such indication. If the Government wished to embody a further application of the principle of compulsory purchase to any department of labour it was quite able to do so. For his part, he thought the principle was utterly bad—utterly and irredeemably bad. The honourable gentleman had made the suggestion that it was founded on the principle of “the greatest good for the greatest number.” Now, the greatest good for the greatest number could be secured by maintaining the sacredness of contract—by maintaining the freedom of the people in this or any other country to enter into contracts which should be binding upon them, and should not be varied by the will of one party to the contract. The honourable gentleman said that the price which might be paid for the gasworks under his proposal would be a fair price—that he wanted nothing unfair. How did they know that it would be a fair price, and that nothing unfair would be proposed? They knew that the Municipalities would be endowed by the proposed legislation with compulsory power, which they were, he supposed, entitled to believe they would exercise in the way which, in their opinion, would contribute most fully to the revenues of the Municipality; and he saw no reason to suppose that, if that compulsory power of purchase was given, there would be anything but unfairness. The honourable gentleman had told them of certain restrictions which were imposed in England and, he supposed, in some of the colonies as to the price charged for gas, and as to the dividends which might be declared. So far as he knew, they had not by their legislation imposed any such restrictions; and now were they to be asked, because of their neglect to do so, to compulsorily place these people, who were induced by their legislation to go on with useful works, in the same position as if the Legislature had had the wisdom to make those restrictions?

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—There is a restriction in every Gas Act.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER said that that should lessen the inducement to interfere by the application of so dangerous a principle as allowing one party to a contract to vary the contract. No doubt Municipalities ought to be encouraged to undertake the supply of gas and water to the people: in fact, they had not been without the encouragement to do so. It had been pointed out that the state of the law at present permitted them to enter into negotiations for purchase, and he knew those negotiations had, in some places, been actually carried out. With regard to the Municipality of Dundedin, the gas supply was in the hands, first, of private individuals, as were also the waterworks. The Municipality, being desirous of possessing these means of supply, entered into negotiations with the firm which supplied gas, and brought the negotiations to a successful issue; and the price that was asked was not an unreasonable one, for a large profit had resulted from the supply ever since the purchase was made. The same might be said of the supply of water to the inhabitants of this district. So far as he could discover from the address they had listened to, nothing at all had been adduced which ought to induce them to interfere further with freedom of contract. He would vote against the resolution, and hoped the Council would not pass it.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said the motion offered another illustration of the prevailing spirit—that wherever an institution had been successful we must either pull it down or buy it. If the motion of the honourable gentleman had been what it should have been, it would have gone in the direction that all the gasworks, good and bad, should be bought compulsorily. But he gave each Municipality the right to hold in terrorem over the gasworks to say that, “Unless you reduce your dividends to the vanishing-point we will compel you to sell.” The honourable gentleman overlooked altogether the great public benefit that gas companies had rendered when the place was very sparsely populated—when capital was invested with a certain amount of risk. He was overlooking the fact that in many instances these companies, instead of declaring anything like substantial dividends amongst shareholders, had expended their funds in developing their works. These circumstances were not taken into account, simply because 10 and 15 per cent. was paid now as a fair return for what shareholders had sacrificed in the past. The honourable gentleman also overlooked the fact that, if a company continued to abuse its powers for any length of time, no doubt the Legislature would step in and enable Municipalities to establish gasworks of their own. The honourable gentleman, he (Mr. Stewart) noticed, had not given them any comparison between the rates charged by the Corporations having their own gasworks and the rates charged by the gas companies. He thought it would be found that there really was not much difference. He had no doubt that, if the honourable gentleman wanted to get the gasworks here, he could get them at a reasonable price. The rate charged in Wellington was very reasonable, and the gas company had to compete and was now competing with electricity. And it must be borne in mind that there was another important factor in competition now—namely, cheap kerosene; and people were not absolutely compelled to rely on gas to the extent that they might have been at other times. He objected to the motion entirely, as being simply a direct attack on enterprise and the investment of capital, and also what might be termed an attack on successfully-managed companies. The charge in Auckland did not seem unreasonable,—7s. 6d. a thousand,—although he had no doubt the honourable gentleman would like to see it down to 2s. 6d. He (Mr. Stewart) thought it was a very dangerous motion, and would certainly oppose it.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR regretted very much that the honourable gentleman should have brought such a motion forward at this particular time of the session, and on this particular day, because it opened up a very large question, which they could spend a week over, and then not get to the end of. He would not attempt to follow the honourable gentleman into the general question, except to point this out: that there was no monopoly in gas companies at all. He had been good enough to quote the Hokitika Gas Company. He could tell the honourable gentleman that its dividends had come down from 15 to 6 per cent. in consequence of the competition of kerosene, without any electric light. The difference in the price of kerosene and the cheapness of lamps made it a very successful competitor against gas, and they could not call that a monopoly where the competition was so keen on this single account. That destroyed all the argument so far as monopoly was concerned. Was there to be no honour in Parliament? Were they to insist on persons bringing down private Bills and going to large expenses, and, at the same time, was Parliament to be allowed, without any private Bill, to sweep away private interests legally acquired, and force persons to abandon what they had spent money on? That was a thing they ought to repudiate. They had had enough of it already in their recent legislation. It was not worth while to go into the details of the motion, as there was so much that might be said about the question. This was not the time to go on with the discussion of such a large question, which might take up a whole day at the least, and the best plan of disposing of it would be to move "the previous question."

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH.—That is very unfair.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR said it was not unfair at all. The attempt made by the honourable gentleman was unfair in the extreme; and his reason for moving as he did was to avoid further discussion, because at this period of the session, with the business they had before them, it would be very unwise to enter into a general discussion on which nearly every member of the Council might have a good deal to say.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN agreed with the honourable gentleman who had last spoken as to the merits of the resolution, but disagreed with what he proposed to do with it. He thought the question should go to a direct vote, and certainly hoped, himself, that the Council would negative the motion. His honourable friend the mover of the resolution was, he thought, a specimen of what bad example could do. He said they were taking people's land from them when their neighbours wanted it, and compelling the former possessors to move on, and why should they not do the same in this case? He (Mr. Bowen) had no interest in any gasworks in any way, but he, like every one, had an interest in the progress of the country, and if they were to hold, as it were, a threatening rod over everybody who showed the way in private enterprise, all he could say was that all enterprise would be as dead as Cæsar. It was so now. He was very much struck by an expression that had dropped from the mover. He was sure that in private life he would not be an advocate of such a doctrine or practice as he now suggested. He said he had done his best to propose reasonably fair and straightforward means to get hold of the gasworks. That was what it came to. We were to adopt what was reasonably fair and straightforward! Under the new dispensation, the words "fair and straightforward" were to be "reasonably" qualified. His honourable friend said it was very hard on the boroughs and on the ratepayers that they could not get hold of these gasworks; but he seemed to forget that it was in their power to make any condition they liked with these companies when they applied for the necessary concessions. They were very anxious to get the companies established at the time they were started, and they made terms with them; and yet the minute they found the companies were prospering they turned round and said, "It is not a good bargain, and we want to be off with it"—just like the little boy who said he would not play any longer, when he did not get the best of the game. There was another fallacy in the honourable gentleman's description of the position of these companies. He talked of the shareholders generally as if they were deriving extravagant rates of profit. But honourable members know that a great number of the shares held in any company had been bought at very high prices from the original shareholders, and those who had bought them were by no means getting a large profit for the money they had put into those shares; and they had put their money into them, at a price which did not promise a high rate of interest, on the understanding that the State protected property and enterprise. They never believed that the State was going to encourage spoliation because a few people in some borough chose to get up an agitation and cry out that it was against their interest that enterprises of this kind should be allowed to remain in private hands. As to competition, his honourable friend opposite spoke of kerosene; but it was not kerosene that would endanger gas interests; electricity was now in the air, and electricity was causing a great deal of anxiety to the gas companies in the colony. In Christchurch there had been a good deal of excitement over the question whether electricity was to be introduced into Christchurch for lighting purposes, and the gas company there was very anxious about it. There was no doubt at all that they would have plenty of competition in this colony, and all those companies were trembling—as all companies were—under the threat of competition. He did not think it at all likely that very large profits would be made for a very long time by any company; there were an enormous number of inventions every day which would cut into their profits. But if the State was to interfere it would become a very serious matter. He agreed with his honourable friend opposite that this was rather an academic debate at this stage of the session, and he did not think it was worth while going into the whole of the merits of the case; but he could not help pointing out what a victim of bad example his honourable friend was.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN quite agreed with the honourable gentleman who had just sat down that the proper way to dispose of the question was not by moving "the previous question," but by voting against the honourable gentleman's motion. What did "the previous question" mean but this: "That this question be not now put"? To his way of thinking, this question should not be put now or at any other time, and he trusted that the Council would distinctly negative this question, as it was undoubtedly a mischievous proposal. It was quite in accord with the socialistic proclivities that now manifested themselves in everything, and he thought the whole thing a mistake. The country was suffering from these attacks of the Legislature on every kind of property, and the whole community was suffering seriously from this, and to a much greater extent in a negative direction than in a positive one, although people in many cases were hardly conscious of the fact. Everything was uncertain, and people were not sure whether, if they invested their money in any enterprise, they would be allowed to go on with it or not. He was interested to some extent in a gas company. It was proposed originally that Palmerston North should start its own gasworks. The authorities there considered the question of the Municipality starting that enterprise, but they came to the conclusion that it was not worth their while. Then a private person undertook to supply the Corporation with gas on certain terms, having the right to carry on those gasworks for, he thought, twenty-one years, with a further extension of twenty-one years, and on the same terms and conditions. Ultimately, the concern was formed into a company, of which he was a shareholder. There had been a great deal of trouble in connection with the matter, and there had been only a small dividend, so far—namely, 5 per cent. It would be a monstrous thing to take from the shareholders of this company a property which was beginning to pay in a very moderate manner. The shareholders looked forward to the future, and, as the place extended and the population increased in Palmerston North, no doubt the time would come when the dividends would be increased. Considering the small dividends paid now, and the larger dividends which might be expected hereafter to come, he thought it might fairly be considered that for the local body to forcibly take over the thing would be a most iniquitous proceeding,—nothing short, in fact, of downright robbery and confiscation. So far as the gas company in the town referred to was concerned, they had exercised the greatest caution in their whole system of management in order to obtain any return at all. It was quite a mistake to suppose that there was anything in the nature of a monopoly in this business when they had always before them the competition of kerosene and the possible competition of the electric light. The whole thing, he believed, was an entire delusion. Had the Municipalities managed these things satisfactorily and attained success with them? In the very year when the concern promised to be a success, to come down with a proposal of this kind, to take it over before it had actually proved to be a success, would prove disastrous to the Municipality itself.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT said that, from what he had heard of the discussion, it appeared to him that the Council was really there in the interests of companies and corporations rather than in the interests of the people.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER objected to this remark. In the whole course of his life he never held a single share in a gas company. He hoped the honourable member would not persist in such insinuations; they were unworthy of him.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT had not said that the honourable gentleman held any shares. He only said that, so far as he had listened to the discussion, it had been in the interests of property rather than in the interest of the whole people. He would be very glad if that was not so, but everything he had heard bearing on questions of this sort since he came to the Council had been in the interests of the companies and other monopolies. Nothing was said about the interests of the whole people when the interests of these combinations were concerned, and he conceived that to be where the fallacy of the discussion came in. There was no interest to be considered as against the interest of the public. The motion provided that gasworks should be taken, but certainly taken at their fair equivalent, and he considered this was a proper thing to do in a case of this sort. If they went back into the history of the question they would find that in every case where a Corporation acquired gasworks the people as a whole had benefited by them. In Dunedin, during the old times, they were paying 15s. a thousand for gas—and very bad gas it was—when the company existed. The people agitated for years and years, and, ultimately, the Corporation acquired the gasworks, and now they only paid 7s. 6d. a thousand for lighting, and 6s. 6d. a thousand for heating purposes. Since then the Corporation had rebuilt the gasworks, which were at the time in a ruinous condition; and they had from fifteen to twenty thousand pounds lying to credit of the Gas Account in the Corporation books. Where would those profits have gone had the citizens not owned the works? The Hon. Mr. Bonar said there was no protection for the companies; but he (Mr. Bolt) said there was every protection for the companies, for they were to be paid for the whole of their property. What did they want more than that? If the honourable gentleman thought the effect of such a clause introduced into the Municipal Corporations Act was that no companies would come forward to construct new gasworks, he thought the honourable gentleman was mistaken, and that the result would show that. If any gasworks were constructed, according to their own showing there would be no hardship if the gas companies were paid a fair equivalent for their works—they had no need to say anything about protection at all. The only question was, whether the compensation was just or not, and that question was for the public body to consider—not the Corporation alone, but the people as a whole, and the company interested.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH would reply very shortly, as he did not wish to intrude upon the attention of the Council. He regretted to have to say that he thought most honourable gentlemen who had spoken had not read his motion. The Hon. Sir George Whitmore spoke as if a Corporation was going to take gasworks whether the shareholders liked it or not. Now, the first condition of the motion was that a Council should be authorised to negotiate for the purchase of gasworks by a two-thirds majority of the ratepayers taken at a poll. The Act as it stood required the company to agree to sell before the Corporation could buy it out. As long, however, as a company was paying dividends of 10 and 15 per cent. it was not likely the Corporation would ever get the opportunity of buying the gasworks. He did not think it could be controverted that it was desirable Borough Councils should have an opportunity to supply cheap light and cheap water to the community. He said they had not that opportunity under the law as it existed, and therefore he was anxious to amend it in the direction indicated in the motion. The gas company and the Council could come to an amicable arrangement if they thought fit. It was only when they could not agree, and there was no reasonable prospect of agreeing, that the provisions of the Public Works Act would be brought into force; therefore he did not think that any great hardship would be done. He himself agreed with the Hon. Mr. Bolt that all the honourable gentlemen who had spoken had spoken as if his motion was a direct attack upon capital. Now, he did not wish to make any attack upon capital. He only wanted to give an opportunity to the inhabitants of a city or borough to buy gasworks if they thought fit.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They have got power now.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH said they had not got the power unless a gas company desired to sell. The only object he had was to place a Council in a position to acquire gasworks by paying for them. The Hon. Mr. Oliver said, How did they know that the Council would act fairly? The same question might be asked touching the dealing with land for railway purposes under the Public Works Act. Had it ever been said that the arbitrators under that Act acted unfairly? Therefore there was not any reason to suppose they would not act fairly in the question of gasworks. The Hon. Mr. Oliver also said his motion was a one-sided affair, and was wanted only by a few agitators. He thought he had made provision for that by saying it required a two-thirds majority before the Council could undertake the negotiation. The Hon. Mr. Stewart said there seemed to be a demand in New Zealand to pull down or to get possession of every successful venture or industry in the colony. He would call the attention of honourable members to the fact that there was a desire on the part of ventures which were not paying—for instance, the Bank of New Zealand—to come to the State to help them.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH said it was very much like it. The Hon. Mr. Stewart made an admission about gas companies that he (Mr. McCullough) did not think fit to make: he said that a great deal of the plant was put down out of the earnings of the company. That was a fact, he (Mr. McCullough) believed. There was no getting at the books of gas companies to know what their profits actually were. One company that he knew something about was paying 15 per cent., and part of the plant was paid for out of profits. The Hon. Mr. Stewart admitted that fact, and he dared say the honourable gentleman knew a good deal about such matters. Companies were not only paying 15 per cent., but were erecting plant out of their extra profits. The Hon. Mr. Bonar said there was a good deal of opposition to gas companies, which had the effect of keeping the price of gas down. He particularly mentioned kerosene; while the Hon. Mr. Bowen referred to electric light. His (Mr. McCullough's) motion dealt with electric-lighting companies just as much as it did with gas companies. If the price of gas was brought down, and kerosene and electricity competed with these gas companies, he was giving the gas companies a fair opportunity of getting rid of bad ventures, and honourable members ought to look at the question from that point of view. He was giving facilities to the gas companies to get rid of their works when they ceased to be paying. Honourable members ought to support his motion on that ground alone.

An Hon. MEMBER.—But would the Municipalities buy them?

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH said, of course they would; and that was why he wished to give them the opportunity. The Hon. Mr. Bonar said there would be no opposition and expense in getting a private Act through the Legislature at the present time. He had asked what about the expense in the first instance.

He would point out to the honourable gentleman that there was no opposition to these private Acts going through in the first instance; but would any Act go through now with a provision that 20 per cent. might be paid in dividends, when money was to be had at 5 or 6 per cent.? If a Municipality brought in a Bill at the present time, they would very soon hear all about opposition. The power of gas companies would be exercised in Parliament very forcibly; he need only refer to the attempt made to take a Bill through the Legislature authorising the erection in the City of Auckland of electric-lighting works. Who opposed it? The gas company.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON.—No.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH did not wish to take up the time of the Council on this point. With regard to what the Hon. Mr. Bowen had said as to his (Mr. McCullough's) use of the phrase "reasonably fair terms," he was sure that any terms that would be offered to the gas company under present circumstances, or to the landowner for any land which the State required, would not be considered reasonable and fair terms; therefore he used the term "reasonably fair terms." He hoped the Council would pass the motion; and, as to the way it was brought in, he might refer to the Hon. Mr. Stevens's motion the other day, dealing with a Bill in another branch of the Legislature. He was only following a good example, and, following that example, he was justified in putting the motion on the Order Paper.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON wished to have an opportunity to say two or three words in explanation of the flat contradiction he gave to the last speaker.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH said that, if he had been wrong in the statement he had made, he was quite willing to withdraw it. He had always heard that the opposition to the Bill he had mentioned came from the gas company.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON said the opposition, as far as the City of Auckland was concerned, was entirely upon the instruction, unanimously carried, of the Auckland City Council. It was carried, with the exception of his own vote, on the judicial committee which was appointed by the Council to deal with the matter. He believed such decisions were hardly ever disputed; but he raised the question, as a member in the Council, whether the Auckland people should not be left free to treat with any company, and he was pleased to say the Council allowed it to go through in that form. He had said then, and he said now, that he never held a single share in a gas company, and it was the Corporation solely which offered opposition in the case which had been mentioned.

The Hon. Mr. McCULLOUGH was quite willing to accept the honourable gentleman's correction.

WESTLAND AND NELSON COALFIELDS ADMINISTRATION BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said a Bill was passed last year giving the tenants on this reserve a right to leases for twenty-one years. Representations had been made to the Government that this term was too short, and it was therefore proposed to extend the leases to a term not exceeding forty-two years. That was the whole object of the Bill, and after its second reading it was proposed to send the Bill to the Waste Lands Committee. On the former occasion a great deal of information with regard to the reserves was furnished, which would be in the recollection of honourable members.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON objected to the Bill, because it was against his principles to allow any more coal-reserves to be alienated from the Crown, especially for such a long period as forty-two years. Twenty-one years was a sufficient time to allow any company to have power to take coal out of a reserve. He would divide the Council on the second reading.

The Hon. Mr. KERR thought the last speaker was not aware of the circumstances. This had nothing whatever to do with coal. There were a number of people located on the reserves, having their houses there, and up to last session they had no tenure, when leases were granted for twenty-one years. But it was then urged that the time was too short for them to erect substantial buildings, as they would have no compensation at the end of that term; and representations had been made during the recess which had warranted the Government in proposing the present measure. If the Hon. Mr. Jenkinson had been conversant with the facts of the case, having liberal and extended ideas, he would be only too glad to support such a Bill, it being entirely in the interests of the inhabitants of Westport. As the Bill was going before the Waste Lands Committee, and as he had spoken on it last session, he would not offer any more remarks.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT hoped the Bill would not pass. He trusted these long leases would not be continued. At some time it would probably be found that the community should buy out these leases, and it would then be urged as a reason for compensation that the people had forty-two years' leases. It was unfair that they should be left in the hands of a few people for a great number of years. He felt sure that before the leases were up there would be an agitation for the community to acquire them, and possibly large compensation would be claimed.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said it was obvious that the honourable gentleman who had last spoken, and the Hon. Mr. Jenkinson, had not read the Bill, or had not understood it. It had nothing whatever to do with coal any more than with the skies.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON.—What is the title?

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART said if the honourable gentleman would read the Bill, and endeavour to understand it, he would see that it was a mere title. This was land on which persons had built houses, and there was no coal under it at all. There was no coal there. It was a reserve connected with some coalfields. He was very much surprised that honourable gentlemen should get up and speak on a subject they had never paid the slightest attention to, or, if they had, were evidently not capable of understanding.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR would explain to those honourable gentlemen that this Bill did not apply to coalfields, but to the Township of Westport, which was some nine or ten miles away from the nearest coalfield. The original town had been built on the beach; the sea encroached on it and washed it away, and the people got permission to move higher up the river; and they had never been able to get a title to the Town of Westport till last session, when they were granted leases for twenty-one years. This was too short for people to put up proper buildings, and it was therefore proposed to extend the leases to forty-two years. When the Bill went before the Committee the honourable gentlemen would find the position to be exactly what he said.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON.—What is this piece of land?

The Hon. Mr. BONAR said it was a piece of land on the bank of the Buller River, set apart as an endowment for the construction of the harbour, and had nothing whatever to do with coal-mines.

The Council divided on the question, "That the Bill be read the second time."

BULLER COAL COMPANIES.

Mr. R. MCKENZIE gave notice of the following question: To ask the Government—(1.) If they are aware that 220 men have been dismissed within the last few days from the Deniston coal-mines? (2.) Are they aware that a population of from four hundred to five hundred people are kept on the verge of starvation through a dispute between two coal companies as to haulage rates of coal at Mokihinui? (3.) Will they take some steps to relieve the distress existing amongst these coal-miners and their families, by starting relief-works or otherwise?

Mr. SEDDON said he might save the honourable gentleman the trouble of asking this question. The Government considered the position was so serious that they had taken the only alternative there was for them to take. The Westport Coal Company's Gracity Creek Mine had kept its men idle, the Cardiff Coal Company had also kept its mine idle, and the Mokihinui Coal Company had done the same. These companies were not complying with the output conditions of their leases, and instructions had been given to give them notice to determine the leases of the whole of these mines.

RANGIORA COURT.

On the motion of Mr. J. W. KELLY, it was ordered, That a return be laid before this House showing—(1) The number of summonses issued by the Clerk of the Court, Rangiora, from the 1st September to the 15th September, 1894; (2) the names of persons issuing such summonses, and the amounts involved in each case; (3) the names of the persons against whom the summonses were issued.

ELTHAM CO-OPERATIVE WORKS.

On the motion of Mr. G. J. SMITH, it was ordered, That a return be laid before this House showing—(1) The number of men employed on the co-operative works at Eltham; (2) the gross earnings of the men for the last three months;

(3) the highest amount earned by any one workman for each of the three months; (4) the lowest amount earned by any one workman for each of the three months.

WESTPORT TELEPHONE.

Mr. R. McKENZIE asked the Postmaster-General, If he will make provision on this year's estimates for the establishment of a telephone exchange at Westport?

Mr. REEVES, on behalf of the Postmaster-General, had to say that the department would be glad to open a telephone at Westport if a sufficient number of subscribers were guaranteed to enable the telephone to be established without loss.

CHINESE.

Mr. COLLINS asked the Government, If it is true, as stated in a Christchurch paper, that Chinese immigrants have been arriving in Wellington in considerable numbers? Is the Government prepared to deal with this evil at an early date? Will they raise the poll-tax so as to give this colony similar security to that enjoyed by New South Wales and Victoria, and avert that commercial, social, and moral ruin which threatens our larger centres of population, and which experience shows inevitably follows upon insufficiently-restricted Mongolian influx?

Mr. REEVES said they were quite prepared to take further steps to prevent the influx of Chinese this session, if honourable gentlemen would allow the public business to proceed, so as to enable them to pass a Bill. Personally he was exceedingly anxious to pass a Bill. With regard to the first part of the question, it was not true, as stated in a Christchurch newspaper, that Chinese immigrants had been arriving in Wellington in considerable numbers: that was to say, it was not true if by that it was meant that a larger number of Chinese had been coming in than had been going away. There seemed to be an opinion to that effect, but, as a matter of fact, during the last six months ninety-four Chinese had come into Wellington and ninety-six had gone out. Therefore more had gone away than had arrived.

KELLY'S CREEK WORKS.

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked the Minister of Labour, Whether any married men have been discharged from the works at Kelly's Creek, West Coast Road, and single men retained, and whether among those retained there are any who are connected with or have any interest in any business carried on in the locality? If so, will the Minister give their names and occupation, or the business in which they are interested? He had received a letter affirming that certain statements were true which he had embodied in the question, and he had put the question so that the Minister might give the information asked for.

Mr. REEVES said that all the men specially taken on at the Kelly's Creek works had had their services dispensed with on the 4th of last month. The only men now there were a blacksmith and the permanent employes engaged in the maintenance.

SUGAR-BEET.

Mr. MONTGOMERY asked the Minister of Agriculture, With respect to the proposed bonus on sugar-beet,—(1.) If he will supply small quantities of reliable seed to such farmers as have land suitable for the purpose of growing it? (2.) What is the cost of the machinery necessary to manufacture sugar-beet? (3.) Will the department issue a leaflet on the subject?

Mr. J. McKENZIE might say that a small quantity of seed had been ordered, and would be distributed when it arrived in the colony. With regard to the second part of the question, as to the cost of machinery, inquiries were being made in connection with the matter. With regard to the third part, the department would be very glad to issue a leaflet with the information required to persons interested.

AMALGAMATION OF BANK OF NEW ZEALAND AND COLONIAL BANK.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Colonial Treasurer, If he will consent to the paper laid on the table about the bank agreement being referred at once to the Public Accounts Committee, giving full power to that Committee to investigate statements made therein?

Mr. WARD might say that, after the Government had considered the proposals, they would then decide whether or not it was necessary or desirable that the matter should be referred to the Public Accounts Committee; but the Government must first come to a decision upon the proposals submitted to them.

MAPS AND AGRICULTURAL TEACHING.

Mr. McLACHLAN asked the Minister of Education,—(1.) Whether he will, in view of the excellent and accurate maps of the colony issued by the Government Printing Department, recommend that these maps be used in our public schools? (2.) Seeing that the public-school syllabus requires, under the heading of "Science," that the elements of agricultural knowledge should be taught, will he have a text-book prepared for that use in our public schools?

Mr. REEVES said (1) the Surveyor-General had the matter in hand, and (2) a professional gentleman of high reputation was preparing a text-book for the purpose.

WHITE ANTS.

Mr. MITCHELSON asked the Minister of Lands, If the Government Entomologist has taken any steps to ascertain the correctness or otherwise of newspaper notices regarding white ants, and whether any official report has been received upon the subject?

Mr. J. McKENZIE might say that the Entomologist had supplied the Government with a preliminary report on the matter, but further inquiries were being made at the present time. The department was getting a report on the matter, and when this was received he would be glad to inform the honourable gentleman.

WATERCOURSES.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Minister of Lands, Whether he will refer to the Committee to whom the Land Drainage Act Amendment Bill is referred the matter alluded to in a question answered this session about liability to maintain common watercourses?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said he had to answer this question, Yes. He would refer the matter to the Committee on the following day.

J. AIKEN.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Minister of Lands, If James Aiken, of Waverley, has been relieved of his leases of Section 7, Block XI., Section 1, Block XII., and Section 6, Block XV., Taranaki District; if so, by whom, and for what reason? He might explain that a little over a year ago Mr. James Aiken was a competitor at a sale of University reserves, at which he got an area amounting to 23,444 acres. He competed for almost every section, and it was known in the district that the reason of his competition and bringing-up of prices of this land from the upset of 6d. an acre to as much as 3s. 9d. an acre was that he had a block of 7,000 acres almost adjoining it which he wanted to dispose of, and by raising the price of the other sections he naturally increased the prospective value of his own. Immediately after he had obtained or had been dropped in for these three sections he left for a trip Home for the benefit of his health, and remained away twelve months. When he came back he wished the Land Board of the district to relieve him of these sections. They refused to do so, and it was said that since that, by some means, Mr. Aiken had got relieved of the burden, while those he compelled to pay additional prices had had to stick to their bargains. He would like the Minister to inform him if he knew anything of the circumstances, and if there was any truth in the statement that this speculator had been relieved of the sections in question.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE could not vouch for the truth of the whole of the story the honourable gentleman had told them in connection with the matter. He did not know whether the man in question was a speculator or not; but he would tell the House candidly all that had happened, so far as he knew, in connection with the matter. This Mr. Aiken had been a leaseholder of a number of sections, as the honourable gentleman said, and had fallen behind with his rent, and would not pay it. He claimed to have paid more rent for the land than the land was worth, and said that his neighbours were all in the same position. The matter was brought before him (Mr. McKenzie) by the honourable member for Patea, who introduced Mr. Aiken as a respectable settler living in his part of the country, and as a gentleman whose word he could trust. Later on Mr. Aiken made application to surrender these sections. The matter was referred by him as Minister to the Board at Taranaki, and after going into it the Board recommended that the surrender of one section should be accepted; and the surrender of that section had been accepted. The reason was this: If they had not accepted the surrender of the section the Board would have had to declare it forfeited, and it would have come to the same thing. They had no power to force the man to pay rent—he would not pay; and he supposed if the remainder of the settlers in the same block who took up land at the same time made a like application to the Land Board they would be dealt with in exactly the same way.

AMALGAMATION OF BANK OF NEW ZEALAND AND COLONIAL BANK.

Mr. TANNER asked the Colonial Treasurer, Whether he will obtain and print, for the convenience of members, the complete balance-sheets of the Bank of New Zealand and the Colonial Bank for the years 1888 to 1893, inclusive? He asked this question in order that members might be in a position to get whatever information might be gathered from the balance-sheets.

Mr. WARD might say that instructions had been given to have the balance-sheets printed and circulated as soon as possible.

An Hon. MEMBER.—For how long back?

Mr. WARD.—From 1888 to 1893.

FOOT-ROT.

Mr. BUICK asked the Minister of Agriculture, If he will instruct the Government Veterinary Surgeon to prepare a leaflet on the subject of foot-rot in sheep and the best treatment for its cure, and have the same issued to the settlers? He asked this question because during the last few months the subject of this disease among sheep had been exciting a great deal of attention among the sheep-owners of Marlborough. A large amount of newspaper correspondence had taken place, meetings had been held, and, as the result of this agitation, grave doubts had arisen as to the precise nature of the disease. Mr. Gilruth, the Government Veterinary Surgeon, had visited the district and, he believed, had obtained a considerable amount of information on the subject. It might be necessary that he should make certain experiments, but he would like to ask the Minister if, after these experiments were made, as the result a leaflet would be published giving full information as to the nature of the disease and the best cure for it under different circumstances.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE might say that the Veterinary Surgeon at the present time was making inquiry into the matter in the district, and that as soon as those inquiries were completed the department would get a leaflet prepared and circulated in the district.

GOVERNMENT DEBENTURES.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON desired to put a question to the Colonial Treasurer of which he had given him private notice. It was as to whether he had any objection to lay on the table the communication he had referred to in the debate upon the Government Advances to Settlers Bill, to the effect that our $3\frac{1}{2}$ -percents were at some recent date quoted in London at 103. He asked this question because, from the information accessible to honourable members in the ordinary way, such a statement was hardly credible, although it might be very gratifying if correct. He found from the Economist, which was a recognised authority on these matters, that on the 14th July our $3\frac{1}{2}$ -percents stood at 101 to 102; that on the 21st July, after the Bank of New Zealand legislation was announced in London, they fell to 100 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 101 $\frac{1}{2}$; and on the 28th July, after the Budget proposals had been cabled to London, they again fell to 100 to 101. In the Economist of the 18th July this reference to New Zealand occurred: "Australasians have not moved"—speaking of stock—"with the exception of New Zealand, these having fallen on sales, due to the announcement in the Budget of a statement that a renewed issue of a million or a million and a half is in contemplation." The latest date of which they had quotations was the 4th August, when the quotations were 99 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 100 $\frac{1}{2}$. He was sure the colony and the House would be glad to know if there was authentic information as to the rise in price indicated by the Colonial Treasurer.

Mr. WARD said the honourable gentleman probably was aware—if not, he had the honour to inform him—that in July, the date to which he referred, the quotations given were exclusive of dividends. That being so, the honourable gentleman, he was sure, from his knowledge of finance, would at once observe that there ought to be a material difference between the values of stocks under those circumstances and the values of stocks with dividends added. The statement made in the House the other evening was on information received in reply to a cable by the Government to the Agent-General, who in reply stated that for six months the $3\frac{1}{2}$ -percents stood at 103, and the Agent-General would not advise the Government in connection with that matter incorrectly. That was his reply to the honourable gentleman. It was not the business of the Government or the desire of the Treasurer or of the Treasury to in any way state in connection with the stocks of the colony that the position was other than what it really was. When he informed the House the other evening that this intimation had been received from the Agent-General, he assumed that the House would take the statement from the Government as indicative of what the real position was. If his honourable friend was not satisfied, he would have an extract of the cable taken out, certified to, and laid on the table.

BINDER-TWINE.

3.0. Mr. ALLEN asked the Colonial Treasurer, If he will take the necessary steps to place binder-twine on the free list? The matter was causing a considerable amount of interest in the South, and he had received communications from several farmers' clubs from time to time, asking if it were possible for this duty to be taken off. He hoped the Colonial Treasurer would give a favourable reply.

Mr. WARD said this matter had been under the consideration of the Tariff Committee. The report of that had been sent to the Government, embodying recommendations upon this and other matters, which would be taken into consideration by the Government, and when a decision had been arrived at the House would be duly apprised of it.

Mr. ALLEN said this was a matter entirely apart from what the Tariff Committee might report, and he would like to get a separate answer.

Mr. WARD said the Government could not give an answer until they had decided the question as a whole.

GREY EDUCATION DISTRICT.

Mr. GUINNESS asked the Minister of Education, Whether he is aware—(1) That the salaries paid to the head teachers in the Grey Education District are in most instances fully 33 per cent. less than are paid to head teachers doing similar work in schools with equal averages in other education districts of the colony; (2) that the teachers employed by the Grey Education Board are in nowise benefited by the return to payment to Boards on the working-average, instead of on the strict average, as recently made by the Minister of Education for the express purpose of benefiting the teachers throughout the colony; (3) that schools averaging five, six, and twelve pupils are managed by Committees enjoying the same voting-power at elections for members of the Grey Education Board as are enjoyed by the Committees of the largest schools in the district and in the colony? And, if so, will the Minister state what remedies he will propose to apply to these examples of injustice under which a large body of deserving men and women are groaning—men and women who are required to possess the same literary qualifications as other teachers, and to perform work equal in quality to that performed by their more fortunate brethren in more favoured parts of the colony?

Mr. REEVES believed the salaries were lower in that district, but scarcely so low, he thought, as the honourable gentleman's estimate. He believed also that the teachers were not directly affected by the payment on the working-averages except in so far as the finances were strengthened by the Boards getting more money. He presumed it would be worse for the teachers if the Board did not get that money. He did not think that there were schools averaging only five or six pupils in separate districts; but he believed there was one school averaging only eleven, and this was due partly to the smallness of the district. In small districts he noticed that the teachers were worse off than those in large districts. As to what he could do, he hoped next session to introduce a Bill to classify the salaries of teachers if the Government would permit him to do so—that was, if the House would pass the School-attendance Bill.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. McNAB said he noticed in the last issue of Hansard that his name had been omitted from an important division-list. It was when the Rating on Unimproved Value Bill was before the House. On that occasion he voted with the "Ayes." He also found that his name had been omitted from the record of a division that took place on the 31st August, when he had voted with the "Noes." He found there was no mention of his name on the division-list on the records of the House, but on examining the division-sheets themselves he found his name marked in both cases. Owing to the somewhat careless manner in which the tellers had marked the sheets, the clerk was unable to tell whether he was present or not. He was present at both divisions, and recorded his vote.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PIRANI moved the adjournment of the House in reference to the answer given by the Minister of Lands to his question (No. 11), and for the purpose of enabling the Minister to give a fuller explanation of this extraordinary case. He might point out that the gentleman who had been absolved from his obligation entered into with the Lands Department was the owner of 7,000 acres of bush-land in the Stratford district—a man of wealth; and, as the Minister of Lands had just said, his respectability had been vouched for by the honourable member for Patea. He thought there should be some further reason than that given by the Minister for relieving him from his obligation incurred when he leased the lands in question in the Taranaki District. On the date of the sale in question something like fifteen sections were offered for sale, varying in area from 1,000 acres to 645 acres, and they were sold at low prices. This gentleman competed at the sale of the sections, and ran them up to 3s. to 3s. 9d. per acre, and put the purchasers in the position of being very unfairly dealt with. Immediately after the sale this rich man left the colony for a trip Home, so that he could not be compelled to go on with his improvements. The other unfortunate purchasers went on with their improvements, and complied with their conditions and paid their rent. The settler who went Home returned, to apply to the Land Board to be relieved of payment of rent for these sections, but the Land Board refused to consider the application unless he paid up the rent in arrears. He paid up the arrears; and then the Land Board went into the case and refused to relieve him of his obligations. Upon that, with the assistance of the honourable member for Patea, he waited upon the Minister, with the result that the matter was again remitted to the Land Board, and, as the Minister had informed the House, the Board decided to relieve him of one section. Now, the principle involved was this: If a man of means, and able to pay his rent, chose to enter into a speculation of that sort, and could be relieved of the effect of his speculation, then, he considered, other Crown tenants in the colony had the same right to be relieved as this gentleman had. Of course, the Minister of Lands stated that the other purchasers of those sections, if they had the same reasons, could apply and be relieved of their sections, but the honourable gentleman forgot that the other holders had carried out the law by improving their sections, and therefore it would not be fair to expect them to throw away their improvements for the sake of getting out of paying the rent. This gentleman who evaded the law was in a better position, because he had not made improvements. If, as the honourable gentleman said, there was no way of making a rich man like this pay his rent for the sections he had taken up, then there must be some amendment of the law required, and he would like to ask the Minister if he could see his way to bring in an amendment so as to prevent any case of that kind occurring in the future.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said it appeared to him the honourable member for Palmerston knew very much more about this matter than he, as Minister of Lands, did. At any rate, the honourable member knew a good deal more about this Mr. Aiken than he (Mr. McKenzie) did. It was the first time he had heard that that gentleman was a wealthy man, or that he was a speculator, or that he held any large blocks of land. The honourable member for Patea had represented him to be a struggling settler. Now, it was quite possible that the statements of the honourable gentleman were correct, but the Land Board had reported that the land was too rough to dispose of at the price, and that being the case he believed they could not force this gentleman to pay his rent. The honourable member for Palmerston must know that it would be two years before this man could be compelled to make improvements, and therefore he had not broken the law except in so far as he had not paid his rent, and the only way the Government could come upon him for that was to forfeit his section.

Sir R. STOUT.—You could sue him.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said the honourable gentleman knew they were not in the habit of suing such settlers as the one in question.

Sir R. STOUT.—I know nothing of the sort.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said, if the honourable gentleman could point out a similar case where a man had been sued, he (Mr. McKenzie) would be much obliged to him.

Sir R. STOUT.—What about Scott's case?

Mr. J. McKENZIE said that was a different matter altogether.

Sir R. STOUT.—He was sued for rent.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said Scott was simply a dummy for a mortgage company, and the honourable gentleman himself put him in gaol without suing him at all.

Mr. SPEAKER reminded honourable members that the debate was confined to questions on the Order Paper.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said, with regard to the matter brought up by the honourable member for Palmerston, the Government would make inquiries, and, if it were found that this settler was a wealthy man, as stated by the honourable member for Palmerston, legal opinion would be taken as to the proper position to take in order to compel him to pay his rent.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said the Hon. the Minister of Lands was not correct when he stated that he (Mr. Hutchison) represented Mr. Aiken as a struggling settler. The Minister had drawn on his imagination for that. He perfectly recollected what he stated to the Minister, which was that Mr. Aiken was a respectable settler, who wanted to be relieved of unreasonable rents under three leaseholds acquired by him under the vicious system of public competition by auction. The Minister had dealt with this matter entirely on the information of his department. As to the other settlers in the same block—the University reserve inland of Waverley—they also had paid too much for their land. They were endeavouring to carry out the conditions of the leases, and were now desirous of getting the relief that had been extended to Mr. Aiken—namely, to be allowed the opportunity of surrendering their present contracts. He hoped the Minister would see no reason to refuse that relief, under the circumstances. While on the question of adjournment he might be allowed to supplement what he had said in reference to the quotations of Government stocks by a reference to the monthly investment list for August issued by a stock-broking firm in London. This list corroborated the quotations given by the Economist. The passage was as follows—

Mr. SEDDON rose to a point of order, as this was not on the Order Paper.

Mr. SPEAKER had considered the matter. The rule did not say that the subjects open to discussion must be actually on the Order Paper, which he thought was the intention of the new Standing Order, but that replies of Ministers to questions on that day might be discussed on the motion of adjournment; and, as otherwise there would not be opportunities during the remainder of the present session for private members to discuss matters of the kind, he had allowed it to go on.

Mr. SEDDON, of course, obeyed the ruling, but he desired to point out that it might lead to a member asking a question simply for the purpose of debate.

Mr. SPEAKER said that was no doubt the case, and he thought it would be inconvenient to allow such a practice to grow up; but he thought Ministers might get over that by not replying to questions without notice until questions of the adjournment of the House had been got over.

Mr. SEDDON hoped his honourable colleague would profit by that hint.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON would read the extract, which was as follows:—

Mr. Speaker

"The Colonial Department received a shock in the announcement that the New Zealand Government had had to come to the assistance of the Bank of New Zealand. The support took the extraordinary shape of a guarantee of preference stock of the bank at 4 per cent. for ten years, and was accompanied by conditions and circumstances which are not favourably received on this side. The bank itself is to become a Government institution, with head office in the colony—a position which past experience does not justify. The successful issue of the above stock was, moreover, accompanied by the announcement that the colony wants at once another one and a half millions from this [London] side to lend to farmers at low rates, and one million to be raised at home [in New Zealand]. There are so many objections to be raised to the idea of a Government becoming its own banker—mortgagee to many who may be its own supporters, and, as is further proposed, sole issuer of bank-notes in the country—that the proposals are viewed with considerable misgiving by stockholders here [in London], and have had an adverse effect upon the colonial market generally, and New Zealand stocks in particular."

Mr. CROWTHER thought the honourable member for Palmerston deserved great credit for bringing up this question. So far as he had been able to follow out the statement made by the Minister of Lands, it seemed that any of these tenants could jog along for one year and nine months without having any liability. Surely, if that was the case, it was time the system was altered. He had quite understood that in this case the sections of the Act referred to were sections that might hereafter be amended, and his own opinion was that if the Land Board made a recommendation to the Minister to release the tenants the Minister should act upon the recommendation. He thought the department must have had information other than that laid before the House that day, and, that being the case, it was absolutely necessary that the matter should be followed up and that something should be done. There was no doubt in his own mind that this was a very bad system, and the sooner it was altered the better.

Mr. J. McKENZIE, as a matter of personal explanation, thought that the honourable gentleman must have misunderstood him. What he had said was that if any tenant of the Crown made application for land he had to pay down half a year's rent in advance, and he would not be forced to make his improvements for a certain length of time. The section of the Act referred to stated this, and the applicant in question had made his half-yearly payment. They had no power to force this man to pay rent if he had not the means to do so; and, as a rule, settlers who came before the Government wishing to surrender their holdings were men who could not pay. He had got nothing out of the land, and consequently must have lost on the transaction.

Mr. ALLEN had not been satisfied with the answer given by the Colonial Treasurer to his question, and he hoped that, before the session closed, a much more satisfactory answer with reference to the question of the duty on binder-twine would be given. He had asked the question for a special reason—namely, that the farmers had found this year that they were in considerable straits, and they were endeavouring to reduce their expenses. This was an important item in their expenses, and it was somewhat unreasonable that the farmers should be charged a duty on their twine. He thought the Colonial Treasurer would admit that they ought to give some relief, and, as he knew the honourable gentleman sympathized with the farming community, that he would possibly have this duty removed; otherwise he must see that it would mean increasing the price, and doing serious injury to the farmers without benefiting anybody. There was especial reason that the Colonial Treasurer should remit the duty this year, on account of the bad season they had with their grain last year, and possibly would have this year also. It was not fair to say that this question would have to be left over until the whole question of tariff revision was dealt with. He thought it was a matter which should be considered this year, and immediately. Therefore he hoped that the Treasurer, who professed to be, and he believed was, earnest in his desire to help the farming community, would make the slight concession asked for and remit the duty at once.

Mr. DUNCAN desired to add a word to what had been said about binder-twine by the honourable member for Bruce. In 1885, when Sir Julius Vogel was Colonial Treasurer, the Auckland people prevailed upon him to put a duty upon this twine, for the purpose of supporting an industry. Mr. Peacock, the then member for Auckland, said it was going to largely benefit the colony, and would very soon reduce the price. This duty was carried then, very much against the farmers' wish and interest. Then, again in 1886 they found that the duty was advanced 2d.

Mr. WARD said the duty was not put on until 1888.

Mr. DUNCAN said it was put on in Sir Julius Vogel's time, and he was in the House in 1888. The position at present was this: that, although the raw material, in the shape of flax, was growing on the spot, and the twine could be made on the spot in large quantities, in consequence of the New Zealand duty Victoria was able to land twine in New Zealand 1d. a pound cheaper than it was found selling in the colony. They could land it here 1d. a pound cheaper, after paying freight and all charges both ways for raw material. He had been told also that Victoria would still land it here at 2d. less than the present price even if the duty were off; and he thought that, with the raw material and appliances at hand, if New Zealand could not hold her own, then it was time that something was done, and done at once. This was not a laughing-matter, as the farmers last year in Otago and in most of Canterbury were in circumstances of difficulty through losing a full year's crop of their wheat from wet weather, and the low prices which the crop would fetch would not pay for the harvesting. This question would have to be faced, and gone into at once, to give them some relief. If this article were placed on the free-list there would not be the slightest injury done to anybody, because, if it were true—and he believed it was—that it could be landed from Victoria 1d. a pound cheaper than the locally-made twine could be sold for here, then there must be something wrong. He trusted the Colonial Treasurer would inquire into the matter, and put the twine on the free-list at once.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON thought it was only right to say that the binder-twine, along with other items in the tariff, had received careful consideration from the Tariff Committee. He was not at liberty to say what the decision was that had been come to in the matter, but it would be a very imprudent thing to deal with binder-twine apart from the other items in the tariff. The whole ought to be considered together when a settlement was made. It was not such a very heavy matter for the farmer, this one item; and next year at furthest the whole thing must be gone into, and then it might be advisable to repeal this particular duty. Under the present circumstances, however, it would be somewhat invidious and therefore wrong to select this one item alone.

Mr. FLATMAN said it was evident that there were very few farmers on the Tariff Committee. The particular matter of binder-twine had been so well explained by the honourable member for Bruce and by the honourable member for Oamaru that he need not say anything except to express the hope that the Colonial Treasurer would be able to see his way to reduce the charge.

Mr. EARNSHAW said the honourable member for Pareora and the honourable member for Rangitara represented country interests. It could not be said that there was an undue proportion of town representatives on the Tariff Committee. The country members on that Committee were quite able to take care of themselves. He did not agree with the request that the House should deal with one special item of the tariff this session. There were several articles of the tariff which it was far more important to deal with than the one that had been referred to. There was cement, for instance; and there were other articles which should be immediately attended to. The Government had for four years burked this question. He, however, understood they would, in accordance with the recommendation of the Tariff Committee, appoint a Royal Commission to consider the question. The binder-twine made here was made solely by boy or cheap labour, which was demoralising to our towns. The question should be considered next session.

Mr. FLATMAN might explain that he was not a member of the Tariff Committee; neither did he say that the honourable gentleman who had just sat down was not able to take care of himself. He was getting on nicely, and would soon run alone.

Mr. McCLACHLAN said, in reference to binder-twine, many honourable gentlemen seemed to be ignorant as to that article. For instance, his honourable friend the member for Napier knew so little about it that he did not know binder-twine, or how to tie a knot. He might explain that in his district they imported a great many tons of twine. It was a very large item indeed. A farmer cropping four or five thousand acres required tons of twine, and if there was a duty of 1d. a pound on twine it handicapped him in his business. As the representative of a country district, he would be very glad to see the duty removed from twine.

Mr. R. McKENZIE said it had been stated that rings had been formed here to keep up the price of twine. That might be so; but rings had been formed in Victoria as well as in New Zealand, and they kept up the price there also. It was a well-known fact that, owing to a large syndicate in America having gone into liquidation recently, there was a very large quantity of binder-twine stored at New York and Brooklyn, and if quantities of that twine were allowed to come here it would mean closing the binder-twine works here. It was nothing serious to the farmers to have to pay the small amount that they had to pay on twine. He represented, he had no doubt, as many farmers as the honourable member for Oamaru or the honourable member for Ashburton. It would be inadvisable for the Colonial Treasurer to go into the question of the tariff piecemeal. They would have to deal with this question in a systematic manner.

Mr. BUDDO said the farmers suffered under so many grievances at the present time that this question of twine did not seem a large one compared with others. He might mention that he and his neighbours had been using colonial-made twine with advantage to themselves, and found it more than a penny per pound cheaper than the imported article. There were other matters connected with the farming industry which required dealing with more than this one: there was the question of railway freight and forwarding the grain to the seaports, bonus on export of clover, and others of importance.

Mr. WARD said the honourable member for Patea was a gentleman whom it was very difficult to get to accept a statement made upon an important matter in reference to which he was making inquiries, unless he really saw the proof in black and white. His honourable friend no doubt was thoroughly sincere in his desire to see what the position of the stock of this colony was, and, that being so, he hoped before he sat down to be able to prove that what he had informed him that afternoon and last evening was correct. The Melbourne Argus of the 8th September, which was a reliable paper, and one which was usually well informed, published the quotations for British and colonial Government stocks.

An Hon. MEMBER.—By telegram?

Mr. Flatman

Mr. WARD said the date was the 30th August. Under the heading "The Money-market, London, 30th August," it gave the position of this colony's stock as follows: New Zealand 3½ percents, 102½; and on the 6th September, as 103. That was an independent authority, and he thought it confirmed the statements which he had made last evening and that day. He hoped that would be satisfactory to the honourable gentleman.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Of course that is cum dividend.

Mr. WARD said the honourable gentleman gave the quotations for July, and he (Mr. Ward) pointed out that that was ex dividend. He informed his honourable friend that the quotations which he named, in September, were with the dividend added. Now, when he informed the honourable gentleman that the quotations were at 103, the honourable member did not any longer dispute the point.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said he did not dispute it; he only asked for information.

Mr. WARD said he had given the honourable gentleman the information, and now he said it was cum dividend. His answer was, of course it was. He stated the facts as they ought to be stated; and he again informed the honourable member, in confirmation of what he informed the House, that the Argus of the 8th September quoted New Zealand 3½ per cent. stocks at 103; and New Zealand 4 per cents, in the same paper of 30th August, were quoted at 109, and on the 6th September at 102½. It had been stated in that House that the Government were responsible for the depreciation of our stocks, and that since the Financial Statement was published and the Bank of New Zealand Shares Guarantee Act was passed our stocks had gone down. He hoped, however, that the independent source he had quoted would satisfy the most fastidious and critical that the stocks of the colony under the present Government had not depreciated. The honourable member for Patea last evening stated that our stocks had fallen since the publication of the Financial Statement.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Hear, hear.

Mr. WARD.—I say they have not fallen.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—They are rising with the approach of the interest-payment.

Mr. WARD asked if the honourable member could tell him any previous date at which our 3½ per cents were 103½.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Three months ago.

Mr. WARD asked if the honourable gentleman could tell him when our stocks were ever before at 103 with the dividend added, or when the time was approaching for the dividends to be paid. The honourable gentleman knew that he could not do so. He invited him to deduct the dividends, and take the balance, and then could the honourable gentleman tell him when our 3½ per cent. stocks with the dividend deducted stood in as high a position as they did now? The statement which had been made that New Zealand stocks had depreciated since the present Government had come into office, and in consequence of their proposals, was quite contrary to the facts. Every one admitted that the circumstances under which the colony had been called upon to deal with the Bank of New Zealand might have been calculated to depreciate the value of our stocks; and he thought it would have been gratifying intelligence to every one that we had maintained our position in the London money-market. That ought to be a matter for gratification on the part of honourable members. He might say, in connection with the quotation of the 3½-per-cent. stocks, that there was only one month's dividend accrued: that was another point which he thought the honourable gentleman should give the colony credit for. He had just had a memorandum handed to him stating that only one month's dividend had accrued. He assumed that the information was correct. But why, when our 3½-per-cent. stocks stood at 103, and in the face of authoritative information that that was so—why should honourable gentlemen opposite be so anxious to make out that they did not stand at 103?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Give us the facts.

Mr. WARD said he had given the honourable gentleman the facts.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Not until we have worried you.

Mr. WARD said the honourable gentleman did not worry him a bit. He (Mr. Ward) was very philosophical in his nature, and it took a great deal to worry him, and the attempts of the honourable gentleman to worry him would have no effect; but what he was desirous of doing on the present occasion was to educate his honourable friend. It was very difficult to do so, he admitted, but still he endeavoured to do so. The honourable member quoted from the Economist to show that the position of our stocks was attributable to the action in regard to the Bank of New Zealand. Now, he wished to give the honourable gentleman one or two authoritative statements which, side by side with the Economist, would be accepted as an equal if not a better authority. The Standard said,—

"The New Zealand loan, in the form of Bank of New Zealand 4-per-cent. preference stock, was stated this afternoon to be already one and a half times subscribed, and the lists only open nominally to-morrow. Large investing institutions are understood to have written for heavy amounts of it."

Then, again, in speaking of the same matter, the Capitalist stated,—

"Colonial Government securities have been in steady demand. A special feature was the launching of the Government-guaranteed 4-per-cent. stock of the Bank of New Zealand. Although the prospectus was only published to-day, the total amount of stock offered is already greatly over-applied for, and stands in the market at 1 to 1½ premium on the issue price of £101½."

That was perfect evidence of the fact that, according to the financial authorities at Home, this operation was regarded as being a successful and an essentially satisfactory one. It must be remembered that the currency of this bank stock was only for ten years, and it must be admitted that, for short-dated stock such as that was, under the circumstances it realised a very satisfactory price.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—What did they realise?

Mr. WARD said he was not going into that matter now; he was making statements against those which had been made by the honourable gentleman. The Government, he might say, had received a communication from the Agent-General in addition to that, in which he stated that the highest financial authorities in London regarded the whole operation as being eminently satisfactory. The Agent-General referred to the Bank of New Zealand and other financial authorities by name, and stated that in their opinion the financial operation was more successful than he anticipated. And the Agent-General went into the whole question whether or not it was desirable to have underwritten the operation or to have put them on the open market, and they had the positive assurance of the Agent-General that by financial authorities in England of the highest standing it was considered to be anything but desirable to put their stock on the open market without being underwritten, and the general opinion of the experts was that if it had not been underwritten not half of the amount would have been subscribed. And what would have been the position if it had not been underwritten? He merely wished to say that a file of British papers, every one of which referred to the operation which the honourable gentleman had brought up to-day, referred to the transaction as having been very satisfactory. That being so, he did not think it was necessary to take up the time of the House further than to say that every one was desirous of seeing this financial operation put through on the best possible terms. The Government on this side, and the Agent-General on the other, were desirous that this should be done; and the Government had the satisfaction of knowing that the different authorities in different parts of the world agreed in what was done by the Government of the day. In that morning's paper there was published the opinion of the Premier of Victoria on the subject. Now, Sir James Patterson was a hard-headed, shrewd man, and a man whose opinion was worthy of the consideration of people beyond the limit of his own colony. That opinion was worthy of consideration when they remembered that Sir James Patterson was the Premier of the Colony of Victoria during a time when it passed through a period of terrible uneasiness and difficulty such as they knew Victoria had passed through. What was his opinion of what was done by this colony in a great emergency? He would read it:—

"In common with the politicians and Press of New Zealand of all shades of colour, Sir James Patterson, of Victoria, who is essentially a practical man, has gone out of his way to indorse the action of his brother Prime Minister in New Zealand in guaranteeing the recent £2,000,000 issue of the Bank of New Zealand.

Sir James expressly eulogizes it as a statesmanlike move. Financial institutions, he says, are so bound up with a country that it would not do to let them sink. If the Victorian banks had stood together last year they would have been assisted, but they would not, and were too many for the Government to deal with. There were too many banks, and he advocated amalgamation."

Now, his honourable friend would see that people outside the colony appreciated what the Government were doing in this matter, and if the honourable gentleman could not himself appreciate what they were doing he thought he was a man of sufficient common-sense and acumen to accept the judgment of people who were competent to express an opinion upon the Government policy.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Who wrote that article?

Mr. WARD believed it was written by Mr. H. D. Bell, but he was not certain.

Dr. NEWMAN would like to draw the honourable gentleman's attention to the fact that, when he was quoting from that morning's paper, if he had turned to another column he would have seen that the Mikado of Japan and the Emperor of China had been so struck with the policy of the Government that they had offered to place the Premier of New Zealand in charge of the affairs of their respective countries. It was pure assumption for the Colonial Treasurer and his colleagues to take credit for the value of our stocks. They might as well say to a farmer that, because the price of calves had gone up five "bob" a head, therefore they were entitled to receive the support of the farmers, on the ground that they had been instrumental in raising the price of calves to that extent. He admitted that our debentures had never been at the price they stood at to-day: but why were they at that price? The reason was that money was so cheap in London that all gilt-edged securities were at famine prices. That was the position; and, our securities having been looked upon as good securities, they were forced up to an unreal and unnatural height by the cheapness of money. That was the reason of their having attained their present position; but to say that the honourable gentleman's Budget had had the effect of raising the quotations of our stocks was cool, empty assertion. That was the position. The actual position was this: Our three-and-a-halves were about 108 or 109½. When the news went Home that we intended to float two millions in London, at that time there was a drop in our stocks of 3 per cent. After the money had been subscribed they gradually rose, until now they were 108 or 108½; and the honourable gentleman was right in saying that they had touched a very satisfactory position. But he (Dr. Newman) believed these stocks would come down with a rapid run if the borrowing policy of the Government were to be carried into effect. It seemed to him that in England things were on the verge of a turn, and, even without any wrong policy on the part of the Government, in a short time our debentures would fall in London as fresh avenues of trade were opened up in that country. Too much had been made from time to time of our stocks being either up or down 1 per cent. He would like to ask the Treasurer, if this two-million loan was subscribed five times over, whether it was not a very great mistake to have it underwritten.

Mr. WARD.—We cabled Home, and asked them not to underwrite it.

Dr. NEWMAN said the net result of the operation was this: that the loan had been underwritten, and the Agents had expended an underwriting-fee of 1 per cent. That was £20,000 for underwriting the loan; and yet, at the same time, our loan was subscribed five times over. That was an exceedingly unwise position. Our Agents in London should have known that the loan would be rushed, and they should not have had it underwritten, and that money should have been saved to the colony or to the Bank of New Zealand. There was one matter to which he would like to draw the Colonial Treasurer's attention for half a minute. It was this: that, when we went to the London money-market to float loans and other things, we should adopt the plan of asking people to come to our offices in London, instead of going to the Bank of England. In this manner large sums of money could be saved by the colony. It was found in America that they had to pay very considerable charges for raising money, and they changed the system there. When people found they had to apply at the Treasury instead of at the bank, they applied as readily at the Treasury as at the bank, and the consequence was that the State saved a great deal of money. The bank did not bring any support at all to the raising of a loan. If a loan were popular money would come into the Agent-General's Office just as well as it would come into the bank. Therefore he thought they could save a great deal in connection with the raising of loans. He hoped the honourable gentleman would supply the House with information as to why this loan was underwritten, and why the colony's Agents had agreed upon such a waste of money.

Sir R. STOUT said he did not know what number of the British Australasian the Colonial Treasurer alluded to. He did not find it in the number of the 9th August.

Mr. WARD said he referred to the Argus of the 8th September.

Sir R. STOUT said the honourable gentleman said the British Australasian.

Mr. WARD said the newspaper he referred to was the Argus.

Sir R. STOUT said that in the 4.0. British Australasian of the 9th August there was nothing about it.

Mr. WARD said the date was the 2nd August.

Sir R. STOUT said in the British Australasian of the 9th August he found it stated that our bonds were down below par. He desired to say that he did not think it advisable they should take their information regarding their financial position from the newspapers. They were certainly misinformed. He had before him, for example, the Mail of the 6th,—honourable members knew that that was a weekly issued by the London Times,—and there was a long article in the Mail, and in this article they said that we were going to borrow a million and a half. They had no conception that it was a million and a half a year, and they thought the first a bold experiment; to the other they would probably have applied another term. He did not think it was wise for them to cumber their discussion with references to the Home papers. He thought they should be able in Parliament to think for themselves, without the aid of the outside Press. All he had to say was that any person who knew anything about stock transactions in London would know that as soon as you put new stocks in the market the price of stocks was bound to fall. A great deal of stock was taken up by brokers, who had to sell to different customers; and if the colony went yearly on the market with a million and a half, what would be the result? The brokers would not be able to “unload,” and the result would be that the bonds would go down. If the slightest tightness arose in the money-market, that would depreciate the bonds. He would like to say, judging from the way the business was carried on, that it looked to him as if they would not get through the session until November, and he thought it was a great pity that time should be lost. They could deal with the financial Bills, and then get the Public Works Statement before them, and take the other Bills later.

Mr. SEDDON concurred in a great deal that had fallen from the honourable gentleman. He did not think it right they should be judged entirely from the standpoint of the Press of the Old Country. The reason this had been quoted by his colleague was that certain extracts had been quoted by the honourable member for Patea from the Economist, and therefore his honourable colleague had shown that there was another side to the question, and it was right to put the one against the other.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They are not to be compared.

Mr. SEDDON said an honourable member said they were not to be compared. He was quite right; any comparison was in favour of the British Australasian: but he would say there were financial journals at Home, and it was very well known that the spirit moving behind these journals was not altogether in the interests of the borrowers. It was right this should be taken into consideration. Then, the article that had been quoted by the honourable gentleman had been corrected since. It had been written under the assumption, owing to a mistake in telegraphing Home the Financial Statement, that the Government were going to increase the land-tax by not less than £750,000. Very well; the effect of saying that they were going to increase the land-tax to that extent would in itself have a detrimental effect, and a number of articles which had come to hand had been written under that assumption; whereas it was to get £250,000 for the purchase of Native land, £250,000 for the purchase and roading of private lands, and £250,000 for improving, roading, and for the settlement of Crown lands—or, for these three purposes, a total of £750,000—that had been proposed. He felt it was only right they should set these matters at rest. Government were not responsible for the waste of time. They had asked members on their side of the House that there should be none. It might be of some importance that Mr. Aiken, who was a settler, should not have been relieved from paying rents due upon the land; but the question was, since every hour in that House was a matter of moment, whether or not the honourable gentleman could not have got what he wanted by simply seeing the Minister of Lands—by seeing the Minister of Lands and telling him what he was prepared to do in the matter. He agreed with the senior member for Wellington City that, if the members would not to some extent curb themselves, the result would be that the House would be sitting to the end of November. He could not help it if honourable members would do these things; he could not control them.

Mr. MASSEY did not wish to refer to the position of our stocks in the London market, but would say a few words on another subject which had been mentioned—that of binder-twine. He was sorry that he was out of the House when this question came up, but he came in in time to hear the honourable member for Kaiapoi, who represented an agricultural constituency, tell the House that this was a matter of very little importance to farmers. He was very much surprised to hear him express that opinion, for he had reason to know that it was a matter of very serious importance to the farming community, especially to those farmers engaged in the production of cereals. The duty on binder-twine was 15 per cent., but by the time the twine reached the farmers the duty made a difference to them of 1d. a pound. Now, as numbers of farmers used a ton of string in their operations, it would make a difference to them of £9 or £10—a tax from which they received no benefit whatever. Farmers received for their cereals at present European prices less freight and other charges; they had to come into competition with the cheap land and cheap labour of other countries; and yet in their own colony they were taxed on articles which they required. This, considering the present prices of cereals, was a serious matter. The present prices of grain would not afford much in the way of duty, and no one knew that better than the Colonial Treasurer, and therefore he hoped that honourable gentleman would see his way to abolish it, and the sooner the better.

Mr. MASLIN said, with respect to binding-twine, while he fully sympathized with the farmers and acknowledged that they had to compete in the world's market, he wished to mention that he noticed the total amount of duty paid on binding-twine imported from outside the colony last year was only £93 18s. That was the duty paid on binding-twine, whereas New Zealand exported to other countries binding-twine to the value of £3,200. The total amount imported was 229cwt., and the amount exported was 1,365cwt. of New-Zealand-manufactured twine. Seeing that the twine industry was in a flourishing condition, and could export twine, it was proved that this duty was no longer required, and he thought it should be done away with as soon as possible.

Mr. BUCHANAN said it was a matter of regret that the honourable gentleman who had just sat down did not give the subject a little thought before addressing the House. He told them that, as only the small sum he named had been paid as duty, the farmers could not possibly be suffering very much from the tax upon twine. The honourable member surely realised that the effect of the tax had been such as almost to kill competition from outside.

Mr. MASLIN.—We compete with outside.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that was so, and the correspondence which had appeared in the newspapers of the colony on this subject showed the Colonial Treasurer in a very unenviable light. The effect of Protection in this matter had been that the surplus twine manufactured here had been sent outside the colony to the Australian Colonies at low prices, while the highest price was charged in this colony; and yet they had a representative of farmers getting up in the House and telling them in the gravest possible manner—whether he meant it or not—that the farmers could not be suffering very much because of this duty! The farmers of the colony had been suffering heavily because of this, and if the Government had any sympathy with the farmers—and it had professed to have a good deal—it would repeal this tax as speedily as possible.

Mr. PIRANI could not help replying to what the Premier had said. He had spoken of wasting time over a very trivial matter. This very trivial matter involved rent to the extent of £135 a year, and it affected every Crown tenant in the colony. If that came within the Premier's idea of a trivial matter he thought there were very many trivial matters in the colony which it would be better to have fought out in the House. The point was that, in the ordinary course of law, if this man felt aggrieved at the decision of the Land Board, he should have appealed to the Supreme Court, but instead of that he went behind the back of the Land Board to the Minister. He thought the Minister, even if ignorant of the facts, as he admitted now that he had been, should not have interfered, but should have directed the man, as he had ample means, that he should take his proper recourse and go to the Supreme Court on appeal. Then, there was the other point, about collecting rents from Crown tenants. If the law did not allow the Minister to collect rents from Crown tenants who were able to pay, simply because they did not use the land, the sooner he brought in a measure to enable him to recover such rents the better it would be for the revenue, because it was now simply conferring a premium upon the speculator to go in for land, and, if he found the rent high, he could simply forfeit the land, and so escape liability for further payments. He thought the matter was one well worthy of consideration, and that it was of interest to colonists, as well as to the rest of the tenants,—who were treated in an invidious manner compared with this man,—that the matter should be ventilated.

Motion for adjournment negatived.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

Mr. WARD.—Sir, I feel that, after the financial discussion we had last evening, honourable members will probably be disposed to have this Bill cleared away in half an hour or so. With that object in view, I do not intend to go into all the details of the question, because I feel sure the proposals contained in this Bill are of so simple a character that little or no explanation is needed from myself in order that honourable members may thoroughly comprehend the scope of this Bill. Now, Sir, I take it that, while there may be diversity of opinion upon the usual methods of financing in this colony, there can be no exception taken to the proposal which has for its primary object that of enabling the people of this country to have a better means of investing their savings than they have at the present time. Under the Post-Office Savings-Bank system large amounts are paid in every year to that department, but there is a great difficulty in the way of that department being of such use as it ought to be to the people, and a difficulty which the department itself finds it is not easy to get over. I refer to the fact that it is necessary to limit the amount depositors may lodge upon which interest is to be paid by the colony. Honourable members know that the limit upon which interest is payable is £500. People desirous of placing larger sums on deposit in the Post-Office Savings-Bank are placed in the position of not being able to earn interest upon any deposit beyond £500. Honourable members may ask, Why is that not met by the Government taking authority to pay interest beyond £500? I will tell honourable members why. All moneys deposited in the Post-Office Savings-Bank are practically at call. That being so, the colony might be called upon at any moment to disgorge large sums of money when it was inconvenient to do so, and it would be a most imprudent thing for this colony, or any other colony, to allow large sums to be deposited which, in the ordinary course, might have to be repaid at short notice. That is the reason why the Government originally decided not to allow interest to depositors upon any sum exceeding £500. Another great difficulty in connection with the Post-Office Savings-Bank has occurred; and it is this: There are friendly societies and other societies anxious to avail themselves of the Post-Office Savings-Bank for deposits. There are also various other societies, among them building societies, which have desired to lodge their money for investment with our Post-Office Savings-Bank. Both classes of associations to which I refer, in the ordinary course might require to have their money payable at short notice. There have been strong representations made to the Government to change the present system. It has been represented that the present method has precluded those societies from using the Post-Office Savings-Bank for the deposit of their moneys at interest. Now, under the system proposed in this Bill both of these classes will have that opportunity afforded to them; they will have a system by which they can invest their savings, and at once place them in the position of earning a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent. under these Consols. Friendly societies, building societies, and people generally now unable to use the Post-Office Savings-Bank will have given to them under this system a ready and always available method by which they can invest their savings. If honourable members want another very good reason why it is desirable to have the system provided by this Bill I will tell them that other reason. It has been very well known in this colony for a long time past that many people who are anxious to deposit their moneys to receive interest have been very fastidious as to the places they should deposit their moneys in, and in some cases it has necessitated their deposits being limited to places where they could not earn money on their deposits. The result has been that very large sums of money, probably against the will of the people, and through no fault whatever on their part, are found to be transferred from this colony to elsewhere. That is not a good thing for the colony, while it may be a very good thing for the institutions that avail themselves of the circumstances in which they are placed. Under the proposal to issue Consols to the extent of half a million in one year, and half a million another year, it will be open to the public to select this in addition to the usual places in which they are now able to deposit their moneys for investment. They will have the State always ready to receive up to the maximum mentioned in this Bill, which will at once recoup them by the payment of interest. If we want to refer to other colonies, I invite honourable members to look at the system which has existed in other parts of the British dominions and in England for many years past. There the system of Consols is found to work admirably, not only so far as the State is concerned, but the Government have conferred upon the people a means of enabling all classes from time to time to invest their moneys in these Consols. I do not propose on the second reading to go into the whole of the details of this Bill, but I will point out to honourable members that under this Bill the smallest investor in the colony can invest £5 under this system, and interest will be payable at any post-office in the colony, and, if investors so desire, they can have the Consols inscribed in the ordinary way. The limit of time which the issue is not to exceed is forty years. It may be shorter: circumstances must regulate this. It may not follow that the currency of these Consols may extend to forty years, but there may be people who in the ordinary course may desire to invest not for the purpose of changing their investments; there may be many people who desire to provide for trusts or otherwise by investing in this class of securities for a long time. Honourable members may ask, What are the Government going to do with the money when they get it? That is a natural question, and, as usual, I am prepared to inform the House how we intend to use the money.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—More fully than usual?

Mr. WARD.—The complaint of honourable members on that side of the House is generally that we are too full in our explanations. Now, by a system of circumlocution, the honourable member for Wairarapa desires to stop me from making a very necessary explanation, because in this case I consider an explanation very essential. Honourable members want to know what the Government are going to do with the moneys that are invested in these Consols. In the first place, I am sure honourable members opposite are very anxious, judging from the way in which they attack the Treasury benches, to see a diminution in the Treasury bills. Portions of these moneys could from time to time be used in lieu of Treasury bills. That is one purpose to which moneys received can be used by the Government of the day, and that is the direction in which a portion of the moneys received will be utilised as it may be convenient for the Treasury to do. Now, Sir, there has been, I think, an impression that this idea of creating Consols of the colony is going in for what some honourable members are disposed to term by the very obnoxious expression of "wild-cat" proposals: I do not know who first suggested this, but it appears to me that honourable members who are ready to use terms of this kind ought to be prepared to condemn the system of finance which existed in that country which we profess in many things to follow, but which we find nowadays following the lead of New Zealand. It is not a fair term to apply to a sound system of finance, as is the issue of Consols. It may be, of course, a convenient term for stigmatizing the actions of the Government in connection with finance; and I think any Treasurer is deserving the sympathy of his fellows, because, it matters not what he intends to do in the interests of the colony, he will find he is subjected in many cases to assertions and ideas which emanate from others as to his actions or intentions, which, to my mind, very often have no application at all. Now, Sir, the maximum amount of these Consols is one million. The rate of interest to be payable, named in the Bill, is not to exceed 4 per cent. I wish to say that if the Government can see their way to receive deposits by these Consols at a less rate than 4 per cent. they will endeavour to do so; but the House should understand that if we receive no applications at less than 4 per cent. we shall exercise our judgment and discretion, and, if we should find it necessary, we shall issue them at 4 per cent. I

9.30. think, myself, that, looking at the proposal all round, it should meet with the general approval of honourable members on both sides of the House, because, after all is said and done, the object of every man in this House, and in this country, should be to see that the finances of New Zealand are placed beyond question on a sound and stable basis. While in past times different Governments and Treasurers have availed themselves of the system of issuing Treasury bills time after time, I think there can be few honourable members who desire a continuation of that. I now put forth, in preference to that system, one which is very much better for the people of the colony, which will enable them to invest their earnings with the Government of the colony, the colony utilising those funds, and paying interest to the people of the colony, and giving them an exchangeable security. An effort has been made in the Bill to guard against what was expected to be one of the difficulties in the first instance—that is, to guard against syndicates outside the colony availing themselves of this system of investment by purchasing these Consols in the colony. Honourable members will see that on reference to the Bill; but if that effort is not sufficient I am quite prepared to accept any suggestion in Committee to further guard this.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What clause is that in?

Mr. WARD.—I have not looked at the Bill this evening. I feel I am quite able to explain the Bill without reference to its clauses. At any rate, it is quite evident that it is the desire of the Government to have this system in practice. What we intend is that there should be available for the people of this colony a sure, ready, and exchangeable system for investment of small sums of money with the Government of the day, and that they should get a ready form of security in the shape of Consols. The desire of the Government is to protect the people of the colony from any possibility of these Consols being bought up by outside people and syndicates that may desire such security as this, and, if that is not already met, then, in Committee, I am perfectly prepared to have such amendments made as will enable that to be done. It is customary in this colony to hear honourable gentlemen say that the Government is quite anxious to go in for borrowing large sums of money. When I tell the House that the British Consols current at this date sum up to a total of £525,000,000, they will see that this form of investment, this system of financing in the Old Country, is one which is regarded as very first class. I merely refer to the fact, because when the Government of this colony proposes to issue a million of Consols it has not been unusual to hear some honourable gentlemen very strongly condemn it. Now, I take it that, while there are some honourable members anxious to see the financial stability of the colony conserved, the Government are, and I personally am, as anxious as any member of this House can possibly be to see that. Any one who looks to the future, and who also knows what has taken place in the past, will allow that this colony should not go on as it has been going under the former system. I say it is a matter of duty on the part of the Government and of members of this House to see that the changes taking place day by day and week by week and year by year are met by the necessary alteration in the system connected with the finances of the colony. We have passed the time when large sums of money are being raised—though I know honourable members will dispute the point—I say we have passed the time when the colony has at its back in London for the Public Works Fund large sums of money on which to lean for financial purposes. That time is past, and under the financial proposals of the Government this is the only substitute we have that can take the place of the former system. I say that advisedly. Honourable members cannot say that the proposal under which money is obtained for lending to settlers is one on which the ordinary finances of the colony can be carried on. I cannot refer to that matter, and I do not intend to do so; but in that respect there can be no such thing as the colony, in the ordinary course of its finance, being able to rely upon moneys obtained for this purpose for carrying on the extraordinary business of the colony. That being the sole question, to my mind—

An Hon. MEMBER.—Where is the clause you have referred to?

Mr. WARD.—There are regulations to be proposed in reference to this matter. When I said it was safeguarded I had in my mind the fact that it is provided under the Bill that regulations should be created for all purposes by the Governor in Council. I may say the object, the desire, and the intention of the Government in framing those regulations will be to protect this money from being subscribed by people outside the colony, and I may further add that if that power is found to be insufficient the Government are prepared in Committee to consider such amendments as may meet the case. In placing the matter before the House, I desire honourable members to view it—as I am sure they will, and as the Government is desirous that it should be taken—in the light of whether it is necessary or desirable, in the interests of the colony, that a large number of people who may be daily earning money should have an opportunity of making a safe investment, and one which, should they in the ordinary course of events desire to get rid of it in connection with their private affairs in any way, they may always know is such an investment as can be at once exchanged. I trust the Bill will commend itself to honourable members. The proposal, I think, is a thoroughly safe one. We have a precedent to the extent of £525,000,000 of investments in Consols for our guidance, and I have very much pleasure and confidence in proposing the second reading of this Bill.

Dr. NEWMAN.—The cheers which greeted the Treasurer as he sat down reminded me of what occurred in English history on a certain occasion when the church-bells were ringing throughout England because war had been declared with Spain. A man wiser than his fellows said on that occasion that before long the people of England would be wringing their hands with grief; and I take it that before the policy of this Government has been carried out—if this House is not wise enough to check it—the people of this colony will be wringing their hands over the large amount of debt that has been put upon them. The policy of the Government reminds me very much of those coats which one can buy in the shops, which are called “patent reversible coats,” with one side for fair weather and the other side for rough. When the honourable gentleman brought down his Financial Statement he had a paragraph relating to these Consols, in which he alluded to the thrift of the people, and it was said that the object of raising this million of money was that the Government might use the funds to promote the development of the country. That was the object of raising the million of funds then. The honourable gentleman says, “Hear, hear”; and yet, within the last ten minutes, he has told the House nothing whatever about the development of the country, but has said that he wanted it for deficiency bills—for Treasury bills are nothing but deficiency bills.

Mr. WARD.—Are not Treasury bills used for the government of the country?

Dr. NEWMAN.—Yes. Those honourable gentlemen when they took office got £800,000 of Treasury bills. They raised another £100,000; afterwards they extended it to £476,000; and the honourable gentleman proposes to-night to extend it another whole million. Has the policy of the Government any continuity? Does he mean that this is going to develop the country? What are Treasury bills. Deficiency bills or Treasury bills, by whichever name they are called they mean the same thing. They mean that there is a deficiency—a shortage in revenue; and the honourable gentleman is going to take these deficiency bills, or whatever he calls them, simply and solely because the revenue of the colony is going so much to the bad,—because he is afraid of a deficit. I hope this House will very carefully scrutinise this Bill before it passes it. This is one of a crowd of Bills that are now before us, every one of which is borrowing in some direction. It is idle for honourable gentlemen to use other phrases. What is the preamble of the Bill? It is simply a pretence from start to finish. It says, “Whereas it is expedient to encourage thrift by affording to the people of New Zealand facilities for the safe investment of their savings.” Sir, this Bill is nothing of the kind. It is a borrowing Bill; and what a crowd of borrowing Bills we have! We have a borrowing Bill for the Midland Railway, two millions for the Bank of New Zealand, and now we are going to have a Globo Assets Bill for two or three millions more; and Heaven only knows how much more. Evidently the honourable gentleman who has brought in these Bills thinks that he has only to ask the House to fly kites, and then a new era of prosperity will dawn upon the colony. Sir, there is no cash anywhere in his financial proposals. He seems to think—and the House cheers him on every occasion, no matter how wild and reckless his proposals are—he apparently thinks that he has only to propose these Bills and the country will be all right. What happened at the time of William III., as described by the historian, meets the present position. We have only to go back to the history of Great Britain to find out what our present position is. It was then said that the Land Bank of England would form the salvation of England from every trouble; it was said that it would be like the miracles wrought for the Israelites—that is, quails day by day and manna every evening—and when the honourable gentleman is bringing in a Bill he looks round as though he were the Messiah of the colony and were going to endow it with every blessing. The honourable gentleman is not yet out of his troubles; he has got to see the result of it yet; and I hope the House will have the courage to compel him to withdraw this Bill. Before the Bill should be passed, even supposing the second reading is granted, the honourable gentleman ought to define definitely what he is going to do with the money. He told us on the 22nd of July, or thereabouts, that it was to be used to develop the resources of the country; and to-day he expects a deficit, and therefore he is going to make use of this form of Treasury bill; while to-morrow he may like to do something else with it. In the history of this colony there never has been anything in the way of placing a million of money in the hands of a Treasurer who merely tells us what he is going to do with it. Then, I would draw attention to the astounding fact that he says in his slipshod fashion that there are in England £525,000,000 of Consols. The honourable member has not the faintest notion what the debt of England is. That £525,000,000 are mere Goschens—24-per-cents. Outside of that there is a debt of £200,000,000, and outside Consols the floating or unfunded debt; and, therefore, saying this twice over, it was no mere slip of the tongue, like the matter of saying £15,000 instead of £1,500, as he did the other night, but is an actual mistake. He says that England has only this £525,000,000 of Consols.

Mr. WARD.—I did not.

Dr. NEWMAN.—He said it twice over.

Mr. WARD.—I did not say "only."

Dr. NEWMAN.—A curious thing is—and I hope honourable members notice it—that whenever a question is asked on this side of the House as to what clause anything is in, the honourable gentleman goes on, and presently there creeps along those benches a bit of paper, and he reads it out and says, "It is clause 36," or something like that. It seems to me the gentlemen who sit on the chairs draft the Bills and prepare the notes; and the honourable gentleman is so busy flying his kites and issuing his new paper that he has not time, from start to finish, to study the Bills. Then, we have a remarkable thing: the Premier one night told us that this Bill was to get at the stockings and teapots of the old women of the colony; and the Treasurer, being impatient with the Premier for talking of stockings and teapots of old women, has, in clause 32, "gone one better." He has said to himself, "Where is the money to come from? I have used all there was in the Public Trust Office and in the Government Insurance Department." The Premier says to the Treasurer, "Go to the stockings and teapots"; and the honourable gentleman, searching where he can find some more money, turns to the little boys and little girls. Clause 32 begins, "Any person being a minor, if over ten years of age." He is going to boys of eleven or twelve attending the State schools, and is asking them to turn out all the contents of their little money-boxes. That is clause 32; and I have no doubt, if the Minister of Lands can think of some others after he has exhausted the stockings and teapots and the money-boxes of the poor little children, the rest will be gone for, too. I hope before the House passes this Bill it will insist on a provision saying what the money is to be used for—whether it is to be used for any definite purpose outside Treasury bills; and, if it is only for the purpose of meeting Treasury bills, I hope the House will not agree to it. We had far better face the music straight away, and keep on fighting, than let the country go in for paper money. I would suggest that the honourable gentleman should use a little more caution in his finance. If he means to borrow all this money in this direction this year, what is he going to do next year? This country cannot go on increasing its burden of interest. This is not the first time in the history of Great Britain and of the colonies that there has been an attempt to boom and make everything prosperous by writing on paper. Over a hundred years ago there was an American statesman called Pelelah Webster, who said, "It is absolutely cruel and wrong to tax the people of the United States. So long as you have a printing-press and some bales of paper you can create no end of wealth," and he was applauded from one end of the country to the other; but the result was, after he had used his printing-press and bales of paper, the United States were landed in utter misery and despair. It is just as silly for a colony or for a country to write on bits of paper and say these are worth so much as for any one of us to float any number of I.O.U.s and think we are rich. I would ask the House to consider another question. The honourable gentleman talks of these securities as if equal to cash, and I would put it to him, will persons invest in these securities? I think, to a certain extent, there will be a difficulty, and that difficulty will be in passing them on. Supposing any one were to buy one of these debentures—say, for £100—how would he pass it on and get rid of it? If it were put in the bank at 4 per cent., when due £100 in gold or notes would be paid; but, on the other hand, if he got a hundred debentures and tried to sell them in the open market, I take it that very often they would not fetch above 80 or 85 per cent. Despite what the Treasurer may say, it would be very difficult to get more than that. Therefore I think very many of them would not be taken up. I do not propose to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, as it may be amended; but when it is called on for its second reading I, for one, shall vote against it.

Sir R. STOUT.—I should have been glad if the Treasurer, in moving the second reading of this Bill, had explained its object. Its object, I understand, is to raise money locally in order to pay off our Treasury bills, so as to have less Treasury bills than we have been in the habit of doing with before.

An Hon. MEMBER.—He did not say that.

Sir R. STOUT.—Well, I am going to deal with that. I presume that is the argument that will be used. I ask this House to consider what this Bill means. Nothing pains me more than the easy, jaunty way in which the proposal to borrow millions is received by the House. Do honourable members know what will happen this year? If the Bills before the House at present pass we shall have pledged this colony to five and a quarter millions for this year; and not only that, but we shall have pledged it for two and a quarter millions next year; and so it will go on increasing. What is meant by this Bill? Let me point out to the House what this Bill means. This money is to be used for converting our floating debt into a permanent debt. That is what it means. I undertake to say, except in stress of war, that has never been done in England; and it has only been done in our colony upon two occasions, and it was done then because we were in such a financial position that we could not get increased taxation. We were showing deficits in our revenue, and it was absolutely necessary to convert some of the floating debt. What is to happen now? The colony is going to take the floating debt—because, what is a Treasury bill? It is exactly the same as an English Exchequer bill; it is supposed to be issued in aid of revenue; it is issued before the revenue is collected, and it is supposed to be paid off by the end of the year. What are we going to do? To take the floating debt—which with due finance we ought to be able to keep within bounds—and convert that floating debt, which now amounts to £1,476,000,—that is our limit, though the whole amount is not drawn—we are going to convert a million of it into a permanent debt of forty years' standing, without sinking fund; and the result will be—what? We still maintain our Public Revenues Act. There is no proposal to amend or to repeal that. Therefore we shall have £1,476,000 still available as Treasury bills whenever the need arises. I ask the House to remember that this is simply borrowing a million, not to expend in the purchase of land, or for public works, or for railways—not to buy Native land or to expend in lending to farmers—but to convert our floating debt into a permanent debt of forty years' standing. I undertake to say that if a single member in this House had ventured to urge this proposal on the hustings he would have been hardly listened to at the last election. I ask the House to be careful what they do. This Bill is simply borrowing money to convert the floating debt into a permanent debt of perhaps forty years' standing. Let me look at this from another point of view. What does the Bill propose? It is to give what is called a further means of safe investment to persons who have money to invest in the colony. I do not deny for a moment that people may desire this class of security. I do not deny that the honourable gentleman may be able to get this million in two years, although I do not think the colony's funds will stand it. But supposing he does, I ask the House to consider what this means. Where is the money to come from? It must necessarily come from somewhere. To say that money is not at present invested is simply absurd. I do not suppose money is uninvested either in banking institutions or loan companies. People are not hoarding their money without putting it somewhere. This proposal will mean, therefore, that it will take the money out of the savings-banks; it will take it out of the general banks; it will take it out of the building societies and out of loan companies. And what would be the effect? If you deplete the banks, what will it mean? You are now engaged in banking operations. You are to be engaged in banking operations, at any rate, for ten years. If you deplete your bank, if you are going to discourage deposits in your bank, you will have to come to the aid of the banking institution again by giving a further guarantee. If the bank cannot obtain deposits here and in London, what will necessarily follow? That it cannot carry on banking or ordinary commercial business.

Mr. REEVES.—The money goes into it.

Sir R. STOUT.—I am amazed at a Minister of the Crown knowing so little about finance. Does the honourable gentleman say the Bank of New Zealand is the holder of Treasury bills at present? Certainly not. It does not go into the bank. How do you have Treasury bills invested? Not in the Bank of New Zealand, or very few of them; therefore it is not going to the bank at all. You are encouraging people, instead of depositing their money in the banks, to take up Consols. This weakens the banks. It will stop the banks giving advances to various concerns; it will limit their aid to commercial enterprises and to the manufacturing industries; and the result is, it will be taking the limited capital of the colony out of commercial enterprise and out of manufacturing enterprise. And why? If we need to borrow this money, the fair thing is to borrow in the cheapest market where you can get it. But if you borrow it from your own people, and take their capital away, what will be the result? Not a manufacturer or farmer but will be crippled under this Bill. There is no way out of it. I do not deny that this will be a safe investment for people who want it; but I do not think the Government should create this class of investment. It ought to encourage the capital of the colony—it is limited enough—being devoted to the encouragement of our farming and manufacturing enterprises. If you ask the people in New Zealand to take up Consols you will leave nothing for any new enterprise whatever. I do not think the colony is called upon to do that. You are weakening our financial institutions by this operation. The honourable gentleman says he is going to stop syndicates from abroad purchasing these Consols. There is no provision in the Bill to that effect. Section 36 cannot have that application. There is no power to make such a regulation. But honourable members cannot have seen what power the honourable gentleman takes under the Act by section 35. Do honourable members know that after he has issued stock under this Act he may go to London and may convert the whole of it under the Consolidated Stock Act of 1877, and practically borrow in the London market the whole of this stock; so that, instead of there being a provision in the Act to stop a foreign syndicate getting any of the money, he has power to convert this loan under section 35. What is the argument, therefore, in favour of the Bill? The only argument that may be used in favour of the Bill is this: that the colonial people, distrusting banks, having no commercial spirit, no enterprise, no manufacturing enterprise, may wish to invest their money in Government securities, and not lend on mortgage nor to manufacturers or to banks. There may be a small demand for this kind of investment, but I do not think the demand is sufficient to cause us to pass this Bill, especially when I can point out that this floating debt of ours is to be made a permanent debt for forty years to come. This is simply another Bill to borrow a million of money, and to increase the permanent debt of this colony, without any sinking fund or other provision for its being paid off. Then, there is one point more I wish to refer to. I have already mentioned that the Public Revenues Act does not affect this. The point is this: What is the argument that can be used in favour of selling these Consols? The only argument the honourable gentleman has used is that, because there are in England under the late conversion of Consolidated Stock scheme many millions of Consols in England, therefore we ought to have a million Consols in this colony. But they have a good many things in England that we do not want here, such as State Churches, and all those things. We do not want these here at all. Does the honourable gentleman not know that we have already nearly thirty millions of Consols ourselves in England? We have already created those Consols in England ourselves: and I do ask this House to think what this Bill means. Are we going to allow one million to be added to our permanent debt—to be made a permanent debt for forty years? I have seen loan Bills proposed in this House, and I have heard loan Bills discussed in this House, but I think this is the first time that I have listened to this House proposing such a measure as this as lightly as if it were a mere trumpery Bill to advance £500 or £600 to a local body to help it with its finances. That is the way millions are talked of in this House. The honourable member for Ellesmere took exception to my asking the question, "Are we to have repudiation?" Because I mentioned the term the honourable member thought it was a wrong term to use. But I do ask the House what is to be the end of this colony if this borrowing is to go on. How can we stand it? Is our taxation to be increased? Is it not a fact that we have had claims coming up from different parts of the colony from people who wish to be relieved from different taxes? We were to have had the Customs taxation reduced, but I venture to say, if these borrowing Bills are to be gone on with, that, instead of having our taxation reduced, we must have taxation increased. There is no other outlook before us. Our revenue is not being increased. We are dealing with a falling revenue: our railway revenue is falling; our Customs revenue has fallen lower than last year. What is to be the result? I do ask the House to consider this carefully. This matter ought not to be dealt with in a party spirit at all, and I do ask the House to consider the responsibility that rests upon it in this matter. I say it is a grave responsibility. I say we are in the midst of a financial crisis such as never existed in the colony since I came to it, now more than thirty years ago,—neither in the case of the Three-million Loan, nor the various war loans that we have raised, nor the borrowing policy of 1870. We are face to face with a crisis more grave than any of these. I say our financial institutions are really staggering under their troubles; and what are we about to do? We are about to intensify their troubles by passing this Bill; and the Bill is not going to be any benefit to the colony whatever; it is going to injure the colony in every way. It may benefit a few people who may want what are called "safe investments." I do not suppose it will relieve a hundred of our people; and I ask, is the colony going to pass such a Bill as this, considering the state it is in at the present time? I am aware, Sir, the Government wish to get their business hurried on, and I shall say no more on this subject. I shall certainly record my vote against the Bill, and I do hope the House will rise to the occasion and reject such a borrowing proposal as this.

Mr. SEDDON.—Sir, I may say that I am somewhat surprised at the speech I have just listened to; for I should not have expected to find an apologist and advocate for the financial institutions, syndicates, and money-lenders of New Zealand in the person of the senior member for Wellington City. I say unhesitatingly that the necessity for this measure has arisen in the colony; and, in fact, if the statesmen of New Zealand had been true to themselves and to the people, opportunities such as are offered in this Bill would have been given to the people of New Zealand before. What has caused the depression which the honourable gentleman has now mentioned?—though I do not for a moment agree with him that the crisis exists which he has depicted. I say we have year after year been draining the country, and have been sending £3,000,000 per annum from New Zealand to pay interest on the public and private indebtedness. At the present time, the honourable member must admit that something like £3,000,000 sterling leaves New Zealand yearly for this purpose alone; and I say, notwithstanding all the money the honourable gentleman mentioned as being the public debt by way of loan—and amounting to thirty-nine millions—of this large amount, the people of New Zealand had no chance to invest therein. No, there is no opportunity given; and I say this is a drawback. That is what is crippling our resources and keeping our people poor. This is the first opportunity that has been given to our people to invest in the Consols of their country. And then the honourable member tells us that this means the conversion of our Treasury bills into a permanent debt of £1,000,000 sterling. The honourable gentleman knows that, with the authority we have as regards our Treasury bills, at any time, if they are used for this purpose, they can be converted by a fresh issue of Treasury bills. There is no power asked in the Bill to limit the issue. The honourable member told us that there was £1,476,000. He did not tell the House that, of that amount, £476,000 remained in England for the Imperial-guaranteed debentures. We have a million pounds sterling to come at any time those are redeemable. I challenge the honourable gentleman to find a word in the Bill that can be construed to mean that the money raised under this proposal is to be permanently used for Treasury bills, or that it is to be a permanent debt on the colony. I challenge the honourable gentleman to find one single word on which that construction can be placed. When the Colonial Treasurer was asked what it would be applied for he said it would be applied for this purpose, but he never told the House that he was going to use this money permanently for the purpose stated by the honourable member. Then, Sir, to show that the honourable gentleman has not read the Bill at all, he tells us that we are going by regulation to prevent syndicates from taking advantage of this Act. If the honourable gentleman will read section 3 of the Bill with section 36 I think he will find that section 3, at all events, will prevent what the Colonial Treasurer said was to be provided against. Section 3 says,—

"The Governor may from time to time, by Order in Council, authorise the Colonial Treasurer to receive by way of deposit from persons in the colony such sum or sums as may be mentioned in such order, not exceeding in the whole one million pounds sterling, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding four pounds per centum per annum."

So that there is an Order in Council to be issued, relating to people in the colony. Then, under clause 36, there is full power given to make regulations, which, together with the other section, I say, provides sufficient safeguards. But the Colonial Treasurer, in concluding his remarks, stated that if anything further was necessary he would be quite prepared to meet it in Committee, and I say that all the objections taken are purely Committee objections. Sir, my honourable friend and colleague says that he is well able to deal with dummies; and, if there is to be any dummying in this, we have been able to stamp dummying out in one direction, and I have no doubt we shall be able to do it in another. Then, the honourable gentleman stated that all these moneys in the colony are at the present time invested. I at once say that he is incorrect in making that statement. We know very well that there are large sums of money which have been drawn out of financial institutions, and sent out of the colony; and there are large sums of money which have never been reinvested at all.

Sir R. STOUT.—Where is it?

Mr. SEDDON.—I undertake to say that once these Consols are negotiable we shall very soon find where this money has been. It will soon come to light, and it will be invested. At the present time it is lying dormant. This has been proved unquestionably in the neighbouring colonies, and I say that when the depression was in this colony the same thing obtained here. The honourable member stated that we should be crippling the banks. I say we are not, because the money that will be received will be paid to the bank, and will probably assist the commerce of the country. The honourable member stated that it would not assist the commerce of the country; he stated that we should be crippling ourselves for years by sending money out of the colony. I say we shall be keeping our money ourselves. Now, it is a well-known fact that there are moneys that have been sent out of New Zealand for investment. The Government have information upon that head—that there are thousands and thousands of pounds that have been sent out of New Zealand.

Sir R. STOUT.—When?

Mr. SEDDON.—Not during our time, at any rate, but during the time the property-tax was in existence. The property-tax was the cause of sending a lot of money out of the colony for investment in the other colonies and elsewhere. I say if there had been New Zealand Consols at that time that money would have been invested in New Zealand; and if our present system of taxation had been in existence that money would never have been sent out. But it has been sent away, and we believe that with this form of investment in existence we shall get that money back to the country. That is my opinion.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Then, it is to come from without, after all.

Mr. SEDDON.—As I have said, it has been sent away from the country, and there is the means here of bringing it back to our people in New Zealand: and they are New-Zealanders. That is what I wish to impress upon the House—they are New-Zealanders; and I say it is almost discreditable to us to think that, in a country like this, with the advantages we offer, money should be sent from the colony to be invested elsewhere, where the security is not so good, and where there are not the same chances. Then, the honourable gentleman required an answer as to the moneys that are in the country and not invested. Has the honourable gentleman never posted himself up in the position of the Post Office at the present time? In the Post-Office Savings-Bank at the present time there is something like £40,000 lodged over the £500 limit, and bringing in no interest at all. The honourable member must know that this is a loss already—

Sir R. STOUT.—To whom?

Mr. Seddon

Mr. SEDDON.—I say this is a loss. The main loss is to the depositor. Take the moneys which are lying there, and I say they are dead to the investor, and it is a loss to him; and not only that, but there have been no opportunities for the investment of this money. I do not think for a moment that this proposal will have the effect the honourable member contended it will have, of crippling commerce. How can it in any way cripple commerce? Is it not a fact that in some of our institutions here the moneys were dead, and were locked up for much greater security than was required as a safeguard for the people's moneys? They were locked up absolutely, and were dormant, especially when commerce wanted them, and when the farmers wanted them; and when we wanted them for the good of the country they were not obtainable.

Sir R. STOUT.—Where was it?

Mr. SEDDON.—Looked up in foreign banking institutions: that is where it was. And I say, if the Government had had the power to issue these Consols, with the management left in the hands of the people, that the money would have been usable, and been used, in the interests of the colony. The honourable gentleman says that we are going to lock it up for forty years: and again the Colonial Treasurer has been misrepresented. That is the full extent which it can, of course, be available for—that is the maximum limit, and it does appear to me that this is another occasion showing how eagerly advantage is taken of any pretext for attacking any measure of Government policy. I am not allowed to refer to a previous debate, but whenever a maximum is named in a Bill, it is eagerly seized upon by those who oppose the measure, and is used for the purpose of argument. It has been stated all along that this is what can be done with the money. But I say it is not fair argument or criticism. There is a discretion given in the Bill to the Colonial Treasurer, and it is not to be said that we are going, or that the Colonial Treasurer is going, to exercise this power to the utmost. I say we must give him discretion, and he has asked for this discretion, and I think the House will, very properly, grant it to him. It resolves itself into this: that in dealing with these moneys it is necessary that there should be a safeguard. This is purely a Committee objection, which can be met in Committee. These large investments in the Consols should be safeguarded; they would not be negotiable—I say, myself, they would be unsafe—unless they are kept in a semi-liquid state. It is not possible that the money could be tied up as the honourable member would suggest—not for a moment.

Sir R. STOUT.—How can it be kept in a liquid state?

Mr. SEDDON.—I have received a paper here, and I wish to refer to what I have already said as to the amount of moneys that are at present put away, which people will not invest. We have had cases where persons have suddenly met with death, and large sums of money have been found on their persons. It is a fact that the moneys of some of these people are not invested. I say there are safes, and that there are moneys put away as I have stated. As I said before I say so now again, that there are moneys locked up in safes, and that there are a number of people of the middle-classes and the working-classes whose savings for years have been locked up, and it is only to be expected that it should be so. All the financial institutions, the banks of the colony and the bankers, must admit that these people, of course, necessarily are very cautious in what they do. But I say there was no necessity and no reason why they should put their savings for years in safes. They know that the Government is safe, and that the country is safe, and that the guarantee of the country is their safety; and I say that, if this measure is passed, investments of this kind can be obtained, and we shall find these investors coming forward: and I will also undertake to say that it will not at all injure the banks. There is no desire on the part of the Government to injure those institutions, but we desire to strengthen their position. In regard to what has been said respecting the borrowing of five millions and three-quarters, I say such a remark is unfair. There is nothing of the kind, and there is no necessity for the honourable member to make this misrepresentation. This country has suffered by misrepresentation being made—by misrepresentations sent Home on purpose to injure the credit of the colony—and I see the gravest objection to that. The Liberal party at the time of the Grey Government, in 1879, suffered owing to continued misrepresentation. The honourable gentleman knows what occurred then; yet what is he doing now? He is exactly following out those steps. He states that we are proposing to borrow five millions and three-quarters; but I say no such borrowing proposals at all have been submitted by the Government. Does the honourable gentleman forget this, when talking of the million and a half for advances against freehold lands to the settlers of the country: that the Government simply take the security on the one hand and make the advances on the other, and the country gets the benefit? Again, in regard to the £750,000, the value of the land taken in security is greater than the amount advanced for purchase and roading; and, as regards the advances to settlers, — say, three millions, — the land advanced against would be worth at least five millions. It is not at all like moneys borrowed in the past, for the construction of political railways, seeing that we are not asking for any money which will not be spent in reproduction and in the interests of the country. Does the honourable gentleman forget what the moneys were borrowed for in those days, and the conditions under which moneys in the past have been borrowed? I say we can show to the merchants at Home that the money proposed to be raised is required for advances to settlers, and that will be capital security even up to the utmost limit—that is, the two-thirds value—and any security can be given for the additional one-third. Undoubtedly, I say that the conditions are different. Then, we come to the question of the three-quarters of a million. That is a quarter of a million for the purchase of Native lands. Why, in that case we are getting freehold lands. Why are the Natives complaining? Why is the honourable member complaining that we are not paying the Natives fair value for their land, and only paying, in some instances, about half-value?

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I rise to a point of order. The honourable gentleman is travelling outside the Bill altogether, and is not dealing with the subject under consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER.—This is a monetary Bill that is under consideration, and I think members should have the opportunity of discussing the financial condition of the colony upon a measure like this.

Mr. SEDDON.—I do not complain. They have a bad case on that side. I was simply meeting the remarks made by the senior member for Wellington City in regard to the question of borrowing. He said we were unfortunate in the policy the Government have brought down this year; and I was going to say that the quarter of a million proposed for the purchase of Native land and for the roading of Native land is really the amount we are paying for the land; but we are getting double its value. If we were to believe what the honourable gentleman told the House, and what the Native members and the North Island members have also said,—they have repeatedly stated that the Government are not paying sufficient for the Native land; and I tell the House that for this quarter of a million we are asking power to expend we shall get a quarter of a million in return. That is, I think, a complete answer to the honourable gentleman. With regard to the quarter of a million for the roading of Crown lands and Native lands already purchased, I say that by doing this we are increasing the national wealth of the country, because we are increasing our population by attracting settlers to it with capital; we are also putting our own people upon the land; and I say, where moneys are expended for such a purpose, that it is fallacious, and wrong in fact, to say that we are going in for an habitual system of borrowing to such an extent that we shall be unable to pay our interest. I say the honourable gentleman ought to have been the last man to say that, and I am very sorry that he could have arrived at that stage when he could mention the word "repudiation" on the floor of this House. No man who loves our colony, who is true to his country—who is a true New-Zealander—should use that word on the floor of this House. Away with it! I scout the idea. I say that these moneys belonging to the people will be invested in assisting the production of the country, in increasing the population and assisting our various productions, and in giving heart to the people: and, Sir, to say this means ultimate "repudiation"—I scout the idea. And I have every reason to do so. With a season, I suppose, unparalleled in the history of this colony in regard to the low prices, with the bad harvests we have had for the past two years, we still find that we are able to show a gross surplus of nearly half a million, and a net surplus of £293,000, £250,000 of which we can pay over to the Public Works Fund out of our consolidated revenue. And then, with these facts before him, the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) talks about "repudiation" under such circumstances! Let us away with it. With the prospect we have before us, with our people in good heart and hope implanted in their breasts, let us not discourage them with any such pessimistic forecast. We propose to give them cheap money, and to keep most of the interest on that money amongst ourselves. We are going in the right direction, and probably the honourable member knows this is an absolute fact. It has been said, in regard to this proposal, that we are departing from the lines laid down—from the self-reliant policy of this party during the last three years. I tell the honourable member that this proposal, the policy of helping the people, and of providing in the colony the moneys required by the Government, was proposed in 1892, when circumstances arose which are familiar to the House; and we are now going on the lines then laid down. Those lines are absolutely safe, they have been tried in other countries, and the sooner we encourage this system here in New Zealand the better it will be for New Zealand. I am very sorry, myself, that there should have been anything said antagonistic to this Bill, and as indicated in the remarks made to-night, as I look upon it as being really one of the most beneficial proposals which the Government have brought before the House this session.

11.0. Captain RUSSELL.—Mr. Speaker, it was very amusing to me just now to hear the Premier charge my honourable friend the senior member for Wellington City with being an apologist for lending companies and for banks.

Sir R. STOUT.—"And syndicates," he said. Captain RUSSELL.—Yes. It was a most amusing thing to hear the Premier, who has been perpetually denouncing loan-companies and syndicates and every financial institution; and yet, by the queer irony of fate, he is the leader of a Government who have done more to bolster up banking institutions and monster syndicates, and in bringing about amalgamation of banks, than any honourable gentleman who has ever sat in the Parliament of New Zealand. What was the speech from first to last? It was really no defence of his policy, it was no defence of the Bill we are now discussing, but it was a long tirade of abuse against an honourable gentleman whom he was only too proud to follow some years ago. He taunted the honourable gentleman with buying political support in the days of district railways; and that was a most unjust charge, I have not a shadow of doubt. But I would ask, who was the most faithful henchman of the Government at that time? Who was the great fighting-man for the Stout-Vogel Government, except the Premier himself? There is an old proverb as to there being honour among thieves. I make no imputation whatsoever, but it is a saying which we ought all to remember. It is an inadvisable thing to talk against those with whom we have acted cordially and sympathetically in days gone by. In reply to the remark from the honourable gentleman opposite, I may say that there was a man in the House of Commons known as "Single-speech Hamilton," and I am afraid lest I should be known as "Single-speech Russell," because I am continually being told about one speech which I made some ten years ago. It was a very remarkable speech, or else it contained the only injudicious thing which I have ever said in Parliament, for it is the only speech of mine which the Premier ever brings up against me. I am, in this respect, quite unlike the honourable gentlemen opposite, who are perpetually retreating from the positions which they took up in former days. Every word which I said then I was perfectly justified in saying, and should say again if circumstances arose. This Bill, to my mind, is a perfect monstrosity; and I am determined that, so far as lies in my power, the House shall have an opportunity of saying more than either Aye or Nay in regard to this Bill, and I shall propose, before I resume my seat, an amendment traversing the policy of the Bill. What is the policy of the Bill?—for upon my word it is difficult to know. The Colonial Treasurer in introducing it told us that it was a very simple Bill; and it is a precious simple Bill, and we shall be precious simpletons if we allow the Bill to go through. It is a borrowing Bill in the very worst form. There is no attempt to conceal that it is a borrowing Bill, a Bill by which the Colonial Treasurer is to be allowed to get half a million of money as soon as he possibly can, and to squander it in any way he may possibly choose. The Colonial Treasurer told us that he would state what the money was wanted for, but he did not do so—or, if he did so, it is a worse Bill than I thought it was. He told us, in so many words, that it was a Bill to redeem Treasury bills—it was to be a permanent loan of a million of money to redeem Treasury bills. It may be said by some of his enthusiastic supporters that that is not the only purpose for which this money is to be used, but I have my reason for believing that it is the only purpose for which the money is to be used, for this reason: that the Colonial Treasurer told us, in reply to a question, that he would inform this House how the money was to be spent, and two or three of my honourable friends behind me laughingly interjected remarks in order to get an answer out of the Treasurer, but he told them that he was going to give an answer, and the only answer they got was that the money was to be used to take up Treasury bills; but not for an instant did he tell us that the power which he now possesses in regard to Treasury bills under the Public Revenues Act was to be restricted. He did not tell us that the Public Revenues Act was to be repealed or altered at all. The power which he now possesses under the Public Revenues Act he still intends to retain, in addition to borrowing this million of money. The Premier told us that the reason for this Consols proposal is this: that we have been sending money out of this colony, that we have been crippling our resources and impoverishing our people under the former system of borrowing in the English and cheapest market, but that under this system, by which Consols are to be floated, prosperity is to be brought to the colony. He said that the money is going to be raised in the colony, but I am as certain as we are all in this chamber at the present moment that scarcely any of the money raised by these Consols will be New Zealand money. The clauses of the Bill are absolutely useless for the purpose of providing against the investment of English capital in these Consols; and, whatever clauses may be introduced in Committee, I venture to assert that they will be absolutely inoperative, and that by no possible human ingenuity can you devise provisions which will prevent English capital flowing in to take up these Consols, if they are taken up at all. You may tell me that a clause can be drawn to prevent that, but how are you to prove that money which has come into this colony and is in the possession of any person for investment is not money belonging to some person in England but is the bona fide property of some person in New Zealand? It is absolutely impossible to distinguish it; and, for that reason, I say the money will as certainly be English money as any other loan which has ever been raised. The only difference will be this: that this money is to be raised at 4 per cent., while the other loans are to be raised, nominally, at 3½ per cent. The Colonial Treasurer went on to draw a comparison between the £535,000,000 of Consols in England and this wretched Consols Bill, or our colonial debt, as the case may be. As a matter of fact, there is no comparison at all, or, if there is a comparison, it is against this proposal. What is the true position? In England, under Mr. Goschen's scheme, they reduce the amount of interest paid to 2½ per cent. on the national debt of England, which is being persistently and steadily reduced; whilst under this precious scheme, if you please, we are now invited to pay ½ per cent. more than is paid for the consolidated stock of the colony, and our debt is certain to be materially increased; so that, as a matter of fact, there is no analogy whatsoever. Of course, there could be no analogy under any circumstances; but, even taking the honourable gentleman's own argument, there is no analogy whatsoever between the position of the Consols in England and those proposed to be created under this Bill. The Premier went on to tell us that large sums are lying dormant, and that in some cases money is being sent out of New Zealand for investment. We are perpetually being told in this House that it is quite impossible for any person to borrow money at a moderate rate of interest; that persons with first-class securities are crying out for investments, and that they cannot borrow money under 7, 8, and 10 per cent.; and, on the other hand, the honourable gentlemen opposite tell us in so many words that money is lying dormant, and that there will be a great rush to lend money at 4 per cent.; whereas hitherto it has been impossible, on first-class security, to borrow at anything under 7 per cent. And I admit that I should now sooner take a good investment in land of first-class quality than I should in securities with the colonial guarantee. We are told continually that if any person says a word affecting the credit of the colony it is unpatriotic. That is all nonsense, and the sooner we put that aside the better. If any person has a firm conviction that the policy which is being pursued is detrimental to the interests of the colony, it is his duty to say so fearlessly, whatever taunts may be thrown at him for doing so. To my mind, at any rate, the system of borrowing we are now pursuing is absolutely destructive to the interests of the colony, and I can see nothing before us but this: that we shall go on borrowing, squandering, and scattering money until the credit of this colony is absolutely damned and "reputation" is a word which will be not unfrequently heard in this House. I have thought for the past three years, and believe so now, that unless we are very careful indeed we shall be plunged by the Government, with its reckless proposals, into financial disaster the outcome of which we cannot see at the present moment. I have felt that ever since the Government came into office, and I can see no reason why I should not express that opinion, as I hold it so strongly. Then, the Treasurer went on to tell us that it was not fair to fix on the maximum figures in the Bill as the sum which is to be raised. What is the object of putting figures into a Bill if we are not to argue on those figures? So far from being improper to argue upon the maximum figures in a borrowing Bill, experience tells us that the maximum figures in such Bills are always reached.

Mr. SEDDON.—You did not do it yourself. You had power to borrow three millions, and you only borrowed two.

Captain RUSSELL.—Any borrowing done by the Government of which I was a member was to repair the damage produced by previous Governments. But the wretched past is a subject which the Premier is always bringing up. He knows that his own policy will not stand examination, and so he constantly endeavours to draw the hounds off the scent and run them on the proverbial red-herring. I have no intention of being very long, because this is a subject really upon which there need be no debate if members are only true to the promises which they made from the hustings, and are true to the real feeling of the country. I propose to move this amendment, so as to test the feeling of the House with respect to this Bill. I shall move to leave out all the words after "That," in order to insert these words: "it is not desirable, by the New Zealand Consols Bill, to still further extend the policy of borrowing, in direct contravention of the will of the country as declared at the late general election." Sir, when I look around the House, and think of the speeches of honourable members which I read before they became members,—that is to say, when they were last before their constituents when they really realised what the feeling of the country was,—I feel sure that there are very few indeed who can say that this does not voice the principle which they enunciated when they went on the hustings; and, however strong party ties may be, let us hold this in mind: that party ties should have no weight when men are pledged to a particular and well-defined line of action. If they showed a true devotion to the principles which they enunciated to the people, and which they believe to be true—if only honourable members would adhere to those principles, I should not have the shadow of a doubt but that this amendment would be carried by a large majority of the House. Sir, the Treasurer, in speaking to-night, talked about limiting the use of Consols to the people in this country; but, as I said just now, it is perfectly impossible to do so, inasmuch as it is impossible to trace the money as it comes out from Home. But, even supposing that such a thing could be—supposing that all the assertions about this scheme being a system of investment for the people of New Zealand are reliable, I would ask, what is the meaning of the 35th clause? Under it the Treasurer has power to convert the whole of the Consols into consolidated stock of New Zealand. It is of no use telling us that this scheme is for New Zealand, for here is the power to convert the New Zealand Consols into an English loan, which, I can see, will be availed of at the first emergency by the Treasurer, and this vaunted policy of investment simply in Consols for the people of New Zealand will vanish into thin air, and they will be converted into inscribed stock. This loan is different from any other loan, I believe, which has ever been before the people of New Zealand. It was introduced in a speech quite unworthy of the occasion. It was a speech which, cut down to its narrowest limits, meant this: "Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, you will be good enough to give me a million pounds, to do exactly what I like with." It took longer to make the speech, but when we analysed everything he said it amounted just to that: "Give me a million pounds, with which to play 'ducks and drakes' if I think fit." There is no proposal—to use a horrid word—to "ear-mark" the loan, or to allocate it to any particular purpose. It is simply to be paid into the hands of the Colonial Treasurer to spend in any way he thinks fit. Do honourable members—does any person—believe that such a procedure would be wise? No, Sir. I believe the country is antagonistic to the last degree to any such scheme as this; and I believe the House, if it ventured to express its opinion, would be as hostile as the country is. The idea that the country can ever prosper by perpetual borrowings of money, and the scattering of it about broadcast, in a manner irrespective of any scheme,—in a manner which can conduce to no particular line of policy,—in a manner which is more calculated to buy support than anything else—surely must be bad for this country. When an honourable gentleman said this evening that the Colonial Treasurer seemed to look upon himself as the coming Messiah, the Colonial Treasurer said “Hear, hear” to that. I do not believe the honourable gentleman will ever be the coming Messiah; the day will come—and probably that day is not far off—when the people will cry, “Crucify him!” The trouble, misery, and misfortune which are being brought on the colony by the borrowing policy of the Government will lead to such a state of distress that the people will cry out for some great retribution upon those honourable gentlemen, and I hope they will not go so far as to cry out for their blood, but undoubtedly they will call out for their ejection from office. Do not let the House think for one instant we can advance the true interests of the country by any such scheme as this. Let us all realise that it is only by energy, industry, and self-denial that a country can progress. So long as we borrow, in my opinion so long will the country be the reverse of prosperous. And, so that the House may have an opportunity of expressing its opinion on the subject, I now beg to move, That all the words after “That” be struck out of the motion, with a view of inserting in lieu thereof: “it is not desirable, by the New Zealand Consols Bill, to still further extend the policy of borrowing, in direct contravention of the will of the country as declared at the late general election.”

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—In seconding the amendment I desire to say a few words on the subject of the Bill the second reading of which has been moved to-night. It has been the occasion of a most extraordinary spectacle—that of the two leading members of the Government being at variance with one another as to the objects of the measure, and each in contradiction of previous expressions of opinion by himself as to the objects for which this million of Consols is to be raised. The Premier indulged us by appearing in a new rôle: I give him credit for not usually being guilty of discussing the financial aspects of a measure. Certainly, if he desired to make himself ridiculous he has every reason to be satisfied with the result. The way he floundered about in endeavouring to explain the Bill would suggest that he has not read the Bill; and the way he contradicted his honourable friend on the left in attempting to help him was distinctly amusing. The Premier said there was a necessity for the Bill. I quite agree with him. There is a necessity for the Bill from the point of view of the Government; but it is not the necessity which he indicated. He said the necessity arose from the fact that there was a large amount of money in the colony seeking safe and easy investment. That may be, to a certain extent, true; but, if it be true, it is here in the shape of money which is either invested in other enterprises, or is awaiting investment—lying, as he has indicated, in the Post-Office Savings-Bank in deposits over £500—aggregating £40,000—which, by the rule of the department, do not bear interest. Is he anxious that the taxpayers of the colony should pay interest upon that £40,000, the use of which the colony is getting at present, in the shape of Treasury bills? The Premier went on to say that, besides money in the colony desiring investment, there is a large amount of money which has been withdrawn from the colony, and might be brought back by this inducement; but if that money comes in the interest will certainly go out. If it comes back under this proposal, it will be capital from outside the colony, sent here for investment: and, no doubt, it would obtain perfectly safe investment at what in England would be considered a high rate of interest, as sure of payment as the best English stocks, for the honour and solvency of the colony are pledged to every one of these proposals—however undesirable from our point of view—that may be carried; every contract that the colony makes will no doubt be strictly performed, whatever sacrifice we may have to make to keep faith. These Consols would be perfectly good securities—gilt-edged securities—which investors in England will be glad to take advantage of, having the promise of 4 per cent. for a considerable number of years,—the period being indicated here as forty. The proposal is such, however, that no Government would dare to make except in the last emergency. I quite agree with the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) that if such schemes as these are adopted there is a crisis approaching in the affairs of the colony such as we have not known as yet. The Treasurer in his speech gave his explanation as to the objects to which the money to be raised under this Bill would be applied. He said it might be applied to the redemption of Treasury bills—that is to say, promissory notes which have a short currency beyond the financial year in which they are issued, but only issued in anticipation of revenue which is expected to come in to redeem them in due course. The present proposal, therefore, is that, instead of issuing Treasury bills at short dates, money is to be raised for present requirement, but not to be repayable till the end of a long period of years. The honourable gentleman referred to the large amount of money in England raised by Consols. That is perfectly right; but what does the money represent? It represents a great part of the national debt of England, raised in times of emergency; most of it in times of war.

Mr. WARD.—Not the national debt.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The greater part of it represents crises in the history of England, and, most of all, the expenses of disastrous wars. I take the Treasurer at his word; I accept his statement that the money to be raised by these Consols is intended to supply a want such as was supplied in England through the floating of Consols there. The Consols of England represent deficiencies from time to time in the ordinary revenue of the country. They were raised for the purpose of supplying deficits, and that is exactly what the Treasurer is forced to do in this year of grace 1894.

That I may not be supposed to be speaking without justification on the subject, I would ask the attention of the House to the fact that on the transactions of the last financial year there was absolutely no surplus at all, but a deficiency. The surplus is stated in the Budget to have been £290,288 on the 31st March. But, Sir, the credit balance carried forward from the previous year amounted to £283,779. The difference between these two sums, being £6,459, represents, by the book-keeping the Treasurer himself has set out in his Financial Statement, an apparent surplus of only £6,459. But that disappears when we consider that the balances held by the Government on the 31st March last were considerably larger than the balances on the 31st March of the preceding year. I can give the Treasurer the very items. On the State Forests Account the balance was greater by £1,916; on the Local Bodies' Account by £2,047; upon the Deposit Account by £4,833; and on general liabilities by £3,200: amounting in all four items to £11,996. Thus it appears upon last year's transactions, as evidenced by the Financial Statement itself, that there was a deficit of over £5,000. The senior member for Wellington City has already pointed out that, if we eliminate from the annual balance-sheet as brought down by the Treasurer those questionable transactions in the nature of borrowing on debentures for sinking-fund increases, there was a deficiency of over £17,000. Sir, the outlook is not promising. The June quarter of this year shows a falling-off in revenue, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, of £38,000; while the expenditure for the same quarter, as also compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, has increased by over £23,000. And if we look at that weather-gauge, the Customs revenue, we have indications which should fill us with the greatest concern. The Customs revenue is undoubtedly falling; and I hope it will not be imputed to us here as an offence or crime if we point out the real facts that ought to be in the mind of every member in this House who is desirous of legislating for the good of the colony. Here are the figures for the four months of the year as to which we have been vouchsafed information: For April, the Customs revenue was £129,213, for May it was £118,458, for June it was £115,758, and for July it was £130,343; in each instance, during the last three of these months, being less than the amount collected in the corresponding month of the preceding year. The total of these four months—one-third of the year—is £493,773, which will show a deficiency upon the ratio for twelve months when compared with the estimate of the Colonial Treasurer for the current year—an estimate written down by some £55,000 from the previous year. It will show a deficiency of a considerable sum.

Mr. WARD.—What sum?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The figures are these: £493,773 is the total Customs revenue for the four months; multiplied by three, it gives £1,481,319, as against £1,600,000, the estimate of the Treasurer for the current year.

Mr. G. Hutchison

Mr. WARD.—What is the difference?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—If my honourable friend puts down the £1,600,000—and he will, I hope, be careful of his oughts—and then deducts the amount I have given,—namely, £1,481,319 as the ratio for twelve months,—he will find the difference; and, as this House supplies the Treasurer at a cost of between £6,000 and £7,000 a year with an expert staff, he will probably get the sum worked out without troubling honourable members. These are the figures, and they do show a marked deficiency, which it may well be wished by every one here will be made up in the months yet to come. But the indications, unfortunately, do not point in that direction. My honourable friend the Premier referred to the opinions that were expressed from time to time as to the policy of the Government—the borrowing policy of the Government, which he will insist should not be described as borrowing—as to which he and his colleague the Treasurer are anxious to quote the favourable opinions from abroad. But the opinions of journals at a distance upon our proceedings here are not of much value. Most of the commendations that have been quoted turn out to be based on incorrect information: for instance, the latest opinions expressed in England are on the supposition that the financial-aid-to-settlers borrowing scheme is only intended to extend to one and a half millions—not for a series of years; and it is also supposed that this scheme of Consols is intended to take the place of the authority for an unlimited issue of postal notes passed last year. It is on such erroneous suppositions that we find very qualified commendation of the proposals of the Government, and this commendation only in papers which have not the position or the authority of such journals as the Economist. Here is the paper which the Treasurer quotes with effusion, the British Australasian; and although, on the incorrect basis mentioned, there is a sort of approval expressed in one part of the paper, we have only to look to another part to judge of the quality of the matter contained in this hitherto unquoted authority. For instance, I find a letter from a correspondent, in which reference is made to an interesting development that may be news to honourable members. There is a paragraph reproduced in this valuable paper to this effect: "A rebellion has broken out in New Zealand. Mr. Stout is leading the Government forces, and a man named Seddon is in charge of the rebels." Comical as this sounds, there is, after all, a grain of truth in the statement that "a man named Seddon is leading the rebels." He is at the present time leading rebels against the policy affirmed by the majority at the general election. The question is, What did you profess at the general elections, and what are you going to vote for now? Was such a scheme as this propounded to the electors? No, most certainly not; not a word of it. If it had been, the rebels would not be in the force they are on this occasion. This is the most wanton and profligate scheme of borrowing. The politicians of easy virtue, who are now reclining on the Treasury benches, have cast off all shame, and now parade their painted vice in the eyes of the colony. Unfortunately, they have succeeded in depraving others—a majority of this House—who are now as abandoned as themselves. No words can be too strong to denounce the depravity evidenced by the policy measures of this session. They are a complete reversal and renunciation of the principles of true liberalism and self-reliance—a change not to the credit of the colony, but in repudiation of the profession made only a few months ago to the electors of the colony, upon the faith of which the present Ministry were confirmed in power. Had it been foreseen that schemes such as this would be introduced this session so lightly, so airily, and so flippantly by the Colonial Treasurer, there would have been a howl of reprobation instead of the chorus of applause which is claimed to have arisen at the development of the policy of the Ministry. However, I trust, whatever the result of the division will be on the motion of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, that the electors of the colony will take note of the great and serious departure which marks the professions of the Government a few months ago from their performance now.

Mr. REEVES.—There is, of course, only one way of accepting such a motion as this, and the Premier, of course, wishes it to be understood that the Government takes up the gauntlet as promptly as the leader of the Opposition has thrown it down. This is a fair time for that attack, and we take it as such, and, if we did not accept it in that way, no Government would be fit to sit here for half an hour. It is a fair attack upon our financial policy, coming, of course, from the proper quarter from which an attack should come. And the attack represents the Opposition in this House, and it represents something more than the Opposition, because it represents that financial spirit outside the House which has always been hostile to this Government, hostile to this party, and, we believe, not in the interests of the colony as a whole. Here in this amendment speak the foreign banks, the foreign capitalists, that large class which has locked up the lands of this colony for so many years and held it against settlement, and that large class which has made use of the working settlers of this colony as a means of investing money at high rates, and, as a milch cow, to find excessive returns for the investment of their money in that way—the class which has lent money to settlers in years past at rates falling, perhaps, gradually from 15 to 6½ per cent., but always high. And at the present time, though lower than they once were, they are still high relatively to what they should be. That is the class, Sir, which dislikes our financial policy, and which attacks it to-night. Let there be no mistake about that. We expected that our financial policy would be attacked. Any policy which treads on the toes of the money-lender and the financial institution must be hated and attacked. We have waited for the attack, we have wondered in what way it would come, and because it has come in this way we are neither astonished nor are we dismayed. We are prepared to meet it. Now with regard to the honourable member for Waitotara. I have once had occasion, Sir, to sum up the honourable gentleman's method when he desired to be unusually dramatic. I once had occasion to sum up a speech of his in the words "tragic humbug," and, if I wanted some expression to describe his speech to-night, I do not think I could possibly improve on the words I then used. Nothing could well be more tragic or more magnificently insincere than the speech of the honourable gentleman: the solemn tones in which he warned us of a terrible and awful fate which is in store for the colony: the warnings he drew from the four months of the financial year which have already expired; the way in which he pointed out, basing his calculations upon these months, that we must reasonably expect the remaining months of the year to lead us to a deficit. All this reminded me of his manner in the days when he indulged in the same gloomy forebodings concerning the policy of the Ballance Administration. Because we adhered to that policy we were blamed by those honourable gentlemen opposite. Now, because we depart, as they say, from that policy we are blamed. It is said we are false to the policy of the late Mr. Ballance, and to the policy of the Liberal party in past years. Why is it that those gentlemen who are attacking us for departing from that policy attacked us in just the same language for sticking to the same policy in years gone by? Every word they said against our present policy they said against the Ballance policy in 1892 and 1893, and the honourable member for Waitotara was amongst them. He stood in the front rank and said the bitterest things. The honourable gentlemen themselves, unable to say anything effectual against us, borrowed the honourable gentleman from us and get him to lead the attack always. That party has to come to the Liberal party for brains and talents. It is some consolation to us to know that the ablest of our antagonists are borrowed from our ranks. It is a poor consolation, but still it is something. When they want instruments for attack they find them on this side of the House.

Mr. BELL.—Real talent comes over.

Mr. REEVES.—Fidelity never goes over. And why do the honourable gentlemen not regret that they should come? Have the honourable gentlemen no talent of their own, that they are obliged to borrow it from this side of the House? They had better develop a little native talent on that side, instead of always having to come to us for it. These opponents of a colonial borrowing policy—why should they set about a parliamentary borrowing policy? Why should they take the debating-power, financial knowledge, and parliamentary ability from this side of the House? It is a terrible confession of their weakness. Now for my honourable friend, if I may be permitted to note one or two of his remarks. Sir, he pointed out, as I say, that the revenue during the preceding months of the financial year had not been elastic—that it had been less than the revenue of the corresponding months of the preceding year; and therefore he said it is only reasonable to assume that we are going straight to a deficit. Now, it is a most unfortunate thing that we have had to meet exactly this argument before, and the result of the use of this argument has been terribly destructive to honourable gentlemen who accused us of going straight to a deficit. Does the honourable gentleman remember a speech made in 1892 by the Hon. Mr. George Richardson—how he gave us the revenue month after month, and how he prognosticated what the result would be? Does he remember the words which Mr. Richardson used then—words which became proverbial for years afterwards—namely, that we were “galloping to a deficit”?

An Hon. MEMBER.—No; Rolleston.

Mr. REEVES.—No; pardon me, it was Mr. Richardson. Mr. Rolleston never used those words: and thereby hangs a tale. They were used in the Press Association's summary of Mr. Rolleston's Halswell speech, but Mr. Rolleston never did use them. He forgot to use them. He meant to use them, and they were put into the Press Association's summary of his speech. Unhappily he forgot to use them, but they went through the colony all the same. The man who really did use them, and from whom Mr. Rolleston did borrow them—for those honourable gentlemen on that side are always borrowing—the man from whom Mr. Rolleston meant to borrow them was the then member for Mataura, the Hon. Mr. Richardson; and he based his remarks on this: that, because the revenue for the first four months had fallen, Mr. Ballance's Government were galloping to a deficit. We accepted the challenge, and said if he was right and we were wrong he and his party were entitled to the confidence of the country as its financiers, and that we should be no longer entitled to it. What was the result? Instead of galloping to a deficit we were able to come down next year with a surplus unprecedented in New Zealand. I should think that the honourable member for Patea, who was a member of the House at the time, would have been warned by the deplorable disaster—the awful cropper come by the honourable member for Mataura, and that he would not have made the same mistake.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Time will show.

Mr. REEVES.—Sir, I accept that. Time will show, as time has shown. If time shows that the honourable gentleman is right and the Treasurer is wrong, of course he will be entitled to the confidence of the country, and we shall not; but again and again time has shown that their prophecies are wrong, and that we have turned out right. I think we are entitled to say to our friends and our supporters outside that time is on our side, and that time will again show that we are right.

Mr. Reeves

Then the honourable gentleman went on. Passing from melodrama, he indulged in a little argument. He said that certain money was placed in the savings-banks to a considerable amount by investors, and that we were getting the use of that money for nothing, since it was there without interest; and what did our proposal amount to but simply this: that we were going to take that money out of the Savings-Bank, use it, and pay 4 per cent. interest upon the very money which was in the Savings-Bank, and which we were now getting the use of for no interest at all? He asked whether that was fair to the taxpayer. No; I do not think it would be fair to the taxpayer if we were getting the use of that money without paying interest. But it unfortunately happens that, though it is in the Savings-Bank at call, it is there in such a way that we cannot make use of it in a profitable manner. Therefore we are not getting the use of it without paying interest. But, if we get it, and pay 4 per cent. interest on it, we shall not be making a bad bargain by the transfer. That disproves the honourable gentleman's argument in that particular.

An Hon. MEMBER.—That is poor.

Mr. REEVES.—Well, it may be poor, but it is true; and the honourable member for Patea may be dramatic, but he is not correct. Therefore I take it that my argument is more useful than his. But the honourable gentleman went on to lecture the Treasurer about having referred to the English Consols, and spoke of the English debt as though it was something superior to anything that we borrow. Why? Because it was a war debt raised at times of emergency and panic? Does that make it better? On the contrary, it makes it very much worse. That money was raised by the million, the score of millions, the hundreds of millions to waste, to throw it into the sea, to use it in subsidising German princes and Continental emperors to lose battles against the Great Napoleon. Just because we wish to raise a certain small sum of money in the same way to spend in a useful and productive manner, is that method in any way inferior to the English method? That is a line of argument I am totally unable to follow. Raising money by Consols is financing—a sound method of raising money. Raising money by Consols to spend in war is a bad method of wasting money. Raising money by Consols to use as we intend to use it is a good method of using money, and is in no way comparable to the hideous waste of money in war.

Mr. BELL.—You call it raising money?

Mr. REEVES.—I call it raising money.

Mr. BELL.—It is raising money.

Mr. REEVES.—Yes, it is. And now let us come to that very point about raising money. What is all this fuss about? Why is all this unmeasured language used with regard to a fresh borrowing policy, loading the backs of the taxpayers with debt, plunging the colony into fresh millions, adding burdens to the shoulders of posterity, and so on, and so on? What does all this mean? What does it amount to? It is quite true we are going to raise money in this way; but we are not, by raising this money, going to increase the indebtedness of the country. If this Consols Bill is not passed, it will not make the very least difference in the amount of money we raise, and the honourable gentlemen on that side and on this side must recognise that. This is merely a question of how we are going to raise the money. The money has to be raised, and other Bills are to be passed by this House to enable us to spend it. The expenditure is to be limited, and to be regulated by those other Bills, as honourable gentlemen are aware. It is simply a question of how the money is to be raised.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It is additional.

Mr. REEVES.—No. On the contrary, it is not power to raise additional money at all, but merely a power to vary the method by which we shall raise money. I have not, Sir, been allowed to get out three sentences without at least half a dozen interruptions, and, though I do not mind one interruption at a time, it is really difficult to get on when there are six or seven voices interrupting at once. But to continue. I say again it is not a question under this Bill of raising one additional sixpence. If this Bill is not passed we shall still raise exactly as many thousands of pounds as we propose to raise by it, but it will be raised in a different way. It is ridiculous and idle to pretend that, for example, if, instead of raising money by Consols and redeeming the Treasury bills, we go on raising money by Treasury bills, that will make a difference in the total indebtedness. You will have Treasury bills instead of Consols—that is all. Or, again, it is equally ridiculous to say that if it is raised by debentures instead of by Consols the indebtedness of the colony will be altered. It will not be altered. As a matter of fact, it will simply be debentures instead of Consols. The question is, whether you are prepared to have a certain number of Consols or Treasury bills or a certain number of debentures, and, argue as those honourable gentlemen will, they cannot alter it or change it from that. The indebtedness of the colony will be the same, but the method of raising some of the money may be different. Now, the House can make its choice; what we have now to do is to consider the method of raising the money by Consols. If that is a bad method, and not equal to raising money by Treasury bills or debentures, then throw this Bill out. But if raising the money by Consols is in itself a sound accepted financial method of getting money, then I see no reason why this Bill should not pass. Very well. Now I come to the argument which has been brought to bear against the raising of money by Consols. That, I say, is fair argument. If what the honourable member for Hawke's Bay said is correct, then I say that is a fair reason for throwing the Bill out; because he argued that the mere raising of money in this way by Consols is a bad thing. He says it will deplete the banks; it will interfere with enterprise; it will interfere with industry; it is locking up the savings of the people, and diverting them from ordinary commercial and industrial channels.

Captain RUSSELL.—That was not my argument.

Sir R. STOUT.—That was what I said.

Mr. REEVES.—I am quite aware that the senior member for Wellington City said that, but I was under the impression that the honourable member for Hawke's Bay took up the same line.

Captain RUSSELL.—No.

Mr. REEVES.—Very well; the argument was used by the senior member for Wellington City, and it is a fair argument to bring against the Bill. It was something like argument, not mere melodrama or humbug. If it is correct, I say it is strong reason why the Bill should not be passed. But I see no reason for supposing that it will prove correct. In the first place, it is totally wrong to say that, if money is put into Consols, it will be taken away from the Bank of New Zealand. Every ten-pound note put into Consols will not be drawn out of the Bank of New Zealand necessarily, or out of any other bank. The chances are that a good deal would not come out of the banks at all. The chances are that some of it is not invested in any way. I have it as the opinion of experienced people connected with financial institutions that there is a considerable sum of money in New Zealand which is not in any financial institutions; which is not being invested or made use of at all; which is simply being hoarded up through lack of confidence in financial institutions—lack of confidence caused by the great disasters and panics in Australia. That money will come into the Government coffers; and there is other money, no doubt, that will do so. Some of the money lying at the Post-Office Savings-Bank at call will come in, and no doubt sums invested in other ways will come in, and I do not see why they should not. If the people want safe investments, why should not the State find the safest investments for them? Why should we not take care of our people? Why, if people want a safe investment for thrift, should we not find it for them? I say, undoubtedly, it is the duty of the State to do that, and that there is no duty which the State can more wisely or fairly undertake than that. The State can do it better than any private institution can do it, and there is no reason why we should not do it, or why the House should not support us in doing it. But about the question of the banks, so far from this scheme taking something out of the Bank of New Zealand it will put something in its way. The money that comes into the pocket of the State by way of Consols, every sovereign of it, will find its way into the Bank of New Zealand, for the Bank of New Zealand is the institution with which we do business and into which our money is paid. It is also the institution with which our financial offices do business—the financial offices which hold Treasury bills; and therefore if we redeem those Treasury bills a good deal of that money will indirectly find its way to the bank. There is no reason to think for a moment that this scheme will in any way weaken or deplete the Bank of New Zealand. As regards the other banks—ah! that is another story. But do these foreign banks always use all the New Zealand money deposited in them for the purpose of promoting industry and enterprise in New Zealand? What do the figures show? That there is a drain—an old drain, and a considerable drain—of New Zealand money out of this country through these same foreign banks. There may be a difference of opinion as to the amount of the drain. It may be exaggerated. I think there have been occasions on which and newspapers in which it has been exaggerated, but that the drain has existed, and has been a real one, is undoubted, and figures prove it.

Mr. BELL.—No.

Mr. REEVES.—I have the opinion of men, Sir, who have taken an attitude almost as friendly as that of the second member for Wellington City towards these foreign banks.

Mr. BELL.—They were wrong.

Mr. REEVES.—That, of course, is a matter of opinion. I say, therefore, that there is no reason to suppose that this system of 12.0. Consols is either unsound in itself or likely to be injurious to the State bank of New Zealand—by State bank I mean the Bank of New Zealand; and, as to foreign banks, I am inclined to think that on the whole they can take care of themselves. They are not weak institutions, and a question of £50,000 or £100,000 will not ruin them. The suggestion that a whole million is to come out of them, and to come in a hurry, will not hold water. It is exceedingly doubtful whether a million of capital will be taken up, at any rate, in a hurry. The taking-up of a million by New Zealand investors will be a matter of many months, and, as I said before, the greater part will not come out of the banks at all, and, of that which does, only a portion will come out of foreign banks. As to what may come out of the Bank of New Zealand, that and a great deal more will go back into that bank. For that reason there is no cause for thinking that the system will interfere with enterprise, or with the financial institutions of the colony. This in itself is a safe and accepted method of raising money; we have the English example for this, and therefore I do not see any reason why on this account the Bill should be rejected. I have already dealt with the point of whether this means additional borrowing or an additional burden on the shoulders of the taxpayers. It is merely a question of the method by which money is to be raised, the authority for using which will be given by the House in other Bills. Before I sit down let me say a word or two about the attacks made on the general principle. A great deal has been said about the platform pledges of those on this side of the House. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay undertook to tell us what our pledges to our constituents have been, and what our duty is to those who sent us here. It is quite true we ought to keep our pledges, and that we ought to remember our duty to our constituents; but I am inclined to think the Liberal electors of New Zealand will not go to the honourable member for Hawke's Bay as an authority on the conduct of their representatives, and I am inclined to think they will not look to that honourable gentleman as precisely the person to teach us what is our duty towards our constituents. He and his friends have done nothing during the last three years except to reproach us with having broken our pledges and forgotten our duty to our constituents. They have constantly told us what our duty was.

Captain RUSSELL.—Why did you not take our advice?

Mr. REEVES.—Because if we had we should have forgotten what our duty was, and we should certainly not have got that renewal of confidence from the constituencies last year which they were good enough to give us. Remember that we went back to our constituents last November after having done for three years everything the honourable gentleman and his friends said we ought not to do, and having refused to do everything they said we ought to do; and, in face of this deplorable obstinacy on our part, they sent us back with renewed and fresh expressions of confidence. Then they declined to send back about half of the honourable gentlemen's friends. They rent his party to ribands, and sent back our party stronger than ever. Therefore we ourselves are likely to be much better judges of our duty to our constituents than the honourable gentleman, and we are not likely to take his dictum on the point. What we were pledged to our constituents in is that we were not to have a renewal of the borrowing of the past. Did we pledge ourselves to our constituents not to raise money by debentures in the colony for the purpose of buying land? Do our constituents say that what we have done in this way was wrong? On the contrary, they returned us here because we had done that; because we had not hesitated to raise a very large lump sum of money to add to the debt of the colony: I mean the £300,000 which we spent on the purchase of the Cheviot Estate. Now, if you like, borrowing of that kind was an addition to the debt of the colony. We did that, Sir, and we went back to our constituents, knowing that it was perfectly consistent with our professions against borrowing in England in the old-fashioned way. And our constituents said that we were right, and they sent us back to go on doing what we had been doing in the past. Sir, our whole policy turns on that. We are going on raising money in various forms in this colony for the purpose of carrying on necessary works, and buying lands for settlement, and for roading and bridging in connection with those lands for settlement. That is the whole gist of our so-called borrowing policy. As to the cheap-money scheme, the principle of that was laid before the electors at the general election, and I say there is no part of our policy that was so universally indorsed throughout the length and breadth of New Zealand. Scarcely any one had a word to say against that. As to the details of the measure, we never professed to lay them before the people. We said we would use the credit of the colony to raise money to let out cheaply to the settlers of the country. The cheap-money scheme means simply that we should use the credit of the colony for the purpose of reducing the burdens of our settlers. Is there no difference between that and the borrowing of the past? Is there no difference between borrowing money to lend and raising it to spend? There is every difference in the world. People who borrow money to spend generally end in the Insolvency Court, but people who borrow money to lend, if they do it prudently, may make a fortune.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—May I ask a question, Sir, in reference to the time-limit? The Minister of Education, in commencing his speech, stated that the Government accepted the motion before the House as equal to one of no confidence. I should like to ask your ruling, Sir, as to whether, under the time-limit, on a subject such as this, members are not allowed an hour. I would refer you to Standing Order 103.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am aware of the Standing Order; but honourable members will bear this in mind: that when the amendment was proposed it was not intimated to the House that it was brought forward as a no-confidence motion, and the mover and seconder, when speaking, both limited themselves to half an hour. That being so, and as neither the word "confidence" nor the words "no confidence" appear in the amendment, it is not, in my opinion, competent for one side of the House to say that it so comes within the meaning of the Standing Order as to open the door to speeches extending from half an hour to a full hour. Of course, Ministers may regard the effect upon their position as they think proper, but I do not think it is clearly expressed in the amendment that it is intended as a want-of-confidence motion. I do not think it will affect one side of the House more than another if the rule is strictly enforced as regards the half-hour being the limit of speeches on both sides.

Mr. SEDDON.—It would, of course, be out of place, Sir, for me to question your ruling, but I may say that my colleague, at my wish and on behalf of the Government, has stated that the Government are bound to treat the motion as a want-of-confidence motion.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I quite understand that; but in the amendment as moved and seconded in speeches not exceeding half-hours it was not conveyed to my mind that a want-of-confidence motion was intended.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—I only wish to point out that I understood the Premier rose up to intimate that the Government would treat the amendment, when it was moved by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, as a vote of no confidence. The honourable member for Patea asked the Premier whether he intended to second the amendment. The Premier therefore sat down; and, on the first opportunity that was given, I understood it was met by the Minister of Education with a declaration that the Government would regard it as a no-confidence motion.

Mr. SEDDON.—That is so. I think the proper course is to accept the Speaker's ruling, and, as the first two speakers on the other side have only taken half an hour each for their speeches, I therefore accept that as a fair ruling, and I shall not challenge it.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I am quite willing to accept the Speaker's ruling, but I regret that the Hon. the Minister of Education was cut short in a speech which was one of the weakest and most ineffective I have ever heard him deliver in this House; and the same criticism is applicable to the other two members of the Government who supported this Bill to-night. It has been a continual floundering from beginning to end,—one member of the Ministry contradicting the other in the most ludicrous way. The Minister of Education used the words "tragic humbug," as applied to a speech delivered from this side of the House a year or two ago. Why, Sir, this attack upon foreign banks is nothing but drawing a red-herring across the scent. We had the Government assisting the Bank of New Zealand a short time ago to obtain foreign capital. Why, then, should he call the other banks "foreign institutions"? The only difference between the Bank of New Zealand and these so-called foreign banks is that they do rather more business in the Australian Colonies than in New Zealand. "Tragic humbug"! what could be more worthy of such a term than the speech of the honourable gentleman, from beginning to end? He went on to speak of the motives which, he said, instigated the attack to-night. Why, Sir, there is no stronger opposition to the borrowing policy than I am giving it; and can it be said that I have any business connection with the so-called foreign banks? His remarks are nothing but humbug of the most transparent character. The honourable gentleman could not defend the policy of this Bill upon the election speeches of members on that side, or by any statement of the Government throughout the country during the elections, and he has had to resort to side-winds of this sort, in order to cast reproaches upon honourable gentlemen on this side of the House. I regret very much to say this is not the only occasion on which we have heard similar imputations, simply because honourable gentlemen on this side of the House feel it their duty to condemn the policy of the Government.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why did you not do it on the Financial Statement?

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Because we wanted to do the honourable gentleman and ourselves justice, by having the actual policy Bills before we put our views before the country; and that is the policy we are following up now. Sir, the Minister of Labour told us that we attacked the policy of Mr. Ballance's Government while he was in office, and that now, when we accuse members of the present Government of departing from that policy, we still continue to attack them. Now, will the honourable gentleman state that we ever attacked the Ballance Government for refraining from borrowing? Who brought in the policy of economy and self-reliance but the late Atkinson Government?

An Hon. MEMBER.—You admit the Ballance Government did borrow?

Mr. BUCHANAN.—They borrowed on the sly, and the honourable gentleman knows it. Then, the honourable gentleman twits us as to the phrase of "galloping to a deficit." The honourable gentleman's Government and honourable members on that side of the House do not scorn to impute these words to Mr. Rolleston long after they know he never used them. These words happened to be on some notes of Mr. Rolleston's which were obtained by the Press Agency, but they were never used by him. Then, what a spectacle the Minister of Labour made of himself in trying to make the House believe that we were actually paying interest for the £40,000 deposited in the Post-Office Savings-Bank! The honourable gentleman said we were actually paying interest equal to what we should be paying if this £40,000 now lying idle were taken up under the present Bill.

Mr. REEVES.—Exactly the reverse.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Then, we had some unintelligible nonsense about the difference between raising money under this Bill and raising it in England for general purposes. What had that to do with the question now before the House? We have been trying to find out what the Government propose to do with the money raised under this Bill. We first got one story from the Colonial Treasurer, who should be an authority on this matter; then we had another version from the Premier; and we had a third version from the Minister of Education. Which version are we to take to be the true one? What are they going to do with the money? They wish to have it without any control whatever by this House. Then, we were told that raising money by this Bill was not increasing the indebtedness of the colony. To begin with, can it be said that England is not in debt by the amount of the Consols which form a part of her debt? And is it to be said that under this Bill we shall not be running the colony further into debt because some of the money—although not a large part of it—may be advanced by settlers in the colony? If this Bill passes, and if the money is raised, most of it will come from England, just as happened under similar circumstances in Victoria and New South Wales. About five years ago I happened to be in Sydney when the Victorian Government pretended to be raising certain sums of money locally. They were going to be self-reliant; they were going to borrow money in the colony, just as the present Government are going to do; but a well-known financial agent there told me that he himself,—and he also mentioned several other firms,—was putting in an application to invest large sums of English money in those Government securities,

Mr. Buchanan

—and yet it was supposed to be all borrowed locally; and what he said was this: "I should be glad to find money for the Victorian Government at 1 per cent. less in England if it were proposed to raise the loan there, but I am still more so to provide it for them here and to receive 1 per cent. more interest." So will it be here under the proposal to raise money locally at 4 per cent. while we could easily borrow in England at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Why, in ten or twenty years what will be the position? We shall be able—and it is not a wild expectation—to borrow our money then at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and at the same time we shall be paying 4 per cent. on the debentures under this Bill, with the prospect of doing it for a good many years afterwards. If the Government really require money for the purposes mentioned to-night, why do they not go in an honest and manly way to London and borrow at the lowest rate of interest? That is what the taxpayers of the colony have a right to expect, and that is what they ought to do, instead of following out their old policy of sly borrowing. Then, we have been told of money lying unused in old women's stockings, and I do not know how many other absurd hiding-places. Why, Sir, were ever such ridiculous stories told by men occupying the important positions those honourable gentlemen do! And if it be true that we have large amounts of money lying idle, who is to blame for it? Who is responsible for the want of enterprise but the present Government? Then, we had the statement made over and over again that money has been leaving the colony and going to the Australian Colonies. The Treasurer, the Premier, and the Minister of Education all harped upon this string. I have got an authoritative statement here, derived from a well-known financial paper published in this city, in which the imports of specie for the last four years are given at £1,007,099, and the exports at £596,896, leaving a balance in favour of imports of not less than £410,203. And, after all, these figures show nothing but what we have a right to expect, because the Bank of New Zealand is giving $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for twelve-months deposits, while the banks over in Australia are only giving $3\frac{1}{2}$ for twelve-months deposits: yet the Government wish us to believe that money is leaving this colony for Australia, where the rate of interest is 1 per cent. less. But if it be true, despite what I have stated, what a damaging statement it must be to the Government—that money, owing to the alarm produced by their legislation, is going over to the Australian Colonies to accept something like 1 per cent. less of interest! The members of the Government could not have realised the effect of their own statement or they would not have made such a damaging confession as that. Then, we have the statement that the Government is borrowing money to assist small farmers, who have hitherto been paying something like 8 and 10 per cent. And yet we are in the same breath told that the owners of small sums of money have no means of investment, and that this system of Consols should therefore be instituted to provide them with an investment providing interest at 3½ per cent. How is it that these owners of small sums of money cannot find investments with the farmers who are stated to be so badly in want of money? Is it to be said that these two classes are unable to do business without Government assistance? The fact of the matter is that the Colonial Treasurer does not understand the financial position, and that he and other members of the Government have floundered through all these financial Bills, until they have landed themselves in all sorts of contradictions. The Treasurer commenced his speech by saying that he wished to enlighten the honourable member for Wairarapa. It may be owing to the density of the honourable member for Wairarapa, but when the honourable gentleman left off I regret to say that I was pretty much where I was when he started. The honourable gentleman has been bringing in Bills on all sorts of subjects, and in nine cases out of ten he knows little about them, and is quite unable to explain their contents. I, like other honourable members in this House, was pledged at the last election to a non-borrowing policy, and I have therefore steadily voted against the financial proposals of the Government since they introduced their Financial Statement. Other members pledged to a similar policy, notably members on the Government side, have forgotten their pledges; but I warn them and other members of the House that a day of reckoning will come when they will have to meet their constituents.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The honourable member says "Hear, hear." I am glad indeed that the honourable gentleman recognises what he has to face, and I wish the honourable gentleman joy of the explanation he will then be able to make. The honourable gentleman has always been harping about the wickedness of borrowing and squandering borrowed money. He condemned the Stout-Vogel Government for continued borrowing when in office, and now he acts contrary to his election pledges, and is supporting the Government, who have departed from the policy laid down by the late Mr. Ballance, and are now entering on a plunging policy which will land the colony in the same disasters as when the Stout-Vogel Government were kicked out of office in 1897. I have nothing 12.30. further to say upon the Bill. I am very glad indeed the honourable member for Hawke's Bay has moved his amendment, because the country will now see which is the borrowing and squandering side of the House—which party are adhering to their election pledges. I hope honourable members will realise that we are, by the policy of the present Government, plunging the colony back into the same financial abyss out of which we were dragged by the heroic action of the Atkinson Government when they came into office in 1887.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Which you opposed.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—No.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—The honourable gentleman who has just sat down has taken upon himself the duty of warning members on this side of the House of the great responsibility that attaches to them, in view of the policy of the Government. It is not the first time this side of the House has this session been warned in this way by the other side, but I beg to repeat the remark I made at an earlier stage of the session, that we may be ourselves trusted to be the guardians of our own consciences, and left to face our own constituencies. It is a well-known fact that drowning men will catch at straws, and to-night we have a sample of that kind of thing in the amendment to this one of the policy Bills of the Government. The effort that has been made time after time during the present session on the part of the Opposition to detach a section of the Liberal party is again repeated, and will result in an exactly similar way to the previous attempts.

Mr. BELL.—We do not want them. The honourable gentleman is quite wrong.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—I am perfectly sure of this: the honourable gentleman does not want me in particular. I thank him very much for the compliment, and can assure him he is not going to get me.

Mr. BELL.—I did not mean the honourable gentleman in particular.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—Then, as I understand the position, the honourable gentlemen who constitute the Opposition are going solemnly to file into the lobby with the seventeen or eighteen of their party, and all the warnings that have been given to this side of the House by the honourable member for Wairarapa and other members on that side are not going to have the slightest effect as far as the votes on this side of the House are concerned. If that is the position, the members of the Opposition will be able to curtail their speeches throughout the remainder of the debate, for up to the present at least half the speeches on that side have been warnings to us as to what course we should follow in dealing with this measure. In connection with this matter a great deal has been said as to what the policy of the Liberal party was three years ago. I hold in my hand the Financial Statement of 1891, and in that Statement the policy which is in this Bill is clearly shadowed forth. Mr. Ballance said, in the Statement of 1891,—

"When the nature of our obligations will permit it, we are of opinion that relief should be given on the necessities of life now paying duties through the Customs; but we must be certain, while the great object is being reached, that we shall have sufficient revenue to meet the growing demands on the Consolidated Fund, arising through the cessation of borrowing large amounts of money in the English market. For, if we are to maintain our credit and financial independence, borrowing in that market must cease; while any local borrowing is likely to be confined to the absolute necessity of carrying on those essential works of colonisation, such as the settlement of the people on the land, on which depends so directly the prosperity of the community."

And again, on page 11 of that Statement, he said, "If borrowing in the English market is to be discontinued, the means will have to be provided for carrying off the work of settling the waste lands of the colony." Therefore I say that when honourable gentlemen on that side charge the Liberal party, as has been done to-night, with departing from the policy Mr. Ballance laid down, they are talking beside the mark, and seem entirely unaware of what the policy of the Liberal party was in 1891. I venture to say that the policy incorporated in the Bill, the policy of borrowing locally—for it is just as well to admit that it is borrowing—the policy of borrowing locally for the purpose of carrying on the great work of colonisation throughout the country is one that has been the main policy of the Liberal party since it came into power—that is, the policy of extending settlement, making roads and bridges, purchasing land for settlement; and as funds have to be provided for these works, so the Government have in this Bill provided machinery by which the money can be obtained locally, as well as by debentures on the English market if occasion should arise. The policy of the Liberal party has been one of progress and of development, and this is a portion of that policy which is now being brought before the country for the first time. The policy for years past has been to try to create a local fund, and to endeavour to wean the colony from what the late Mr. Ballance described as a servile dependence upon the London money-market. Honourable gentlemen on the other side desire that the Government should bring down a proposal for a two- or three-million loan, for they know that if the Government were to do that the effect would be disastrous so far as the present Administration is concerned. But they are not likely to be satisfied in that direction. The Government are determined cautiously and prudently to formulate their measures in connection with the finances of the country, feeling their way gradually, and moving step by step in the manner which prudence and statesmanship would dictate, always bearing in mind that the finance of a young country like this must be such that settlement is not retarded, and that funds are provided by which the great work of colonisation can be continued and carried on with success. Therefore we have in this Bill a policy under which the funds that are received are to be placed in the Consolidated Fund, and from that fund drawn out for the purpose of providing employment on co-operative works and on railways, for the purchase of lands for settlement and of Native lands, and for such other purposes as the general exigencies of finance may require. The Minister of Education clearly and forcibly stated the position when he put it in this way: If this Bill is not passed, will the general position of the finance of the colony be affected? And he pointed out clearly that, as this is merely a change of the channel through which the money was to come into the Consolidated Fund, whether the Bill was passed or rejected does not affect the general position so far as the finances of the colony are concerned. Some remarks have been made as to the interest being 4 per cent. The position in this case is this: that by borrowing money in the colony we should save the cost of brokerage, stamp duty, exchange, and commission. The whole of these costs and expenses are saved, as well as the cost of bringing the money out from London. The Bill before us will also provide another investment guaranteed by the State. I say decidedly that the Government finance does not depend upon the passing of this measure. Therefore, when the leader of the Opposition brings down an amendment which traverses the policy of the measure, the Government are justified in asking their party to stand by them; and, though there may be from time to time differences of opinion in the Liberal party as to the details of measures, yet I can assure honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House that, when it comes to a fair issue, such an issue as is now before us,—when an amendment is moved by the leader of the Opposition which traverses one of the policy Bills of our party,—we all know how to close our ranks and to present an unbroken front to the foe. That is the position; and therefore I should like to say this: that, while the Liberal party have been pledged, as I have just read from Mr. Ballance's Financial Statement of 1891, to abstain from wholesale borrowing in the London money-market, yet what the Opposition would like the Liberal party to do is to undertake such a policy as that. What they want is a policy of stagnation on the one hand, or of borrowing on the London market; and I think they are not likely to be satisfied on either hand. The Government, by measures such as this, are going to give the colony a policy of progress—the means of developing our lands, and the continuation of works to provide employment for the labourers of the colony. That policy will undoubtedly lead to the general progress of the country, and the Government are going to do this without doing what the honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House would wish—that is, being forced to go to the London market for the money. I say that the Bill now before the House is one which should command the support of the whole of the members of the Liberal party, because it is one which is carrying out the policy that was formulated by the party in 1891, and it is a policy which will result in general progress without going to the London market for the money.

Mr. BELL.—Sir, what is the use of the honourable gentleman and his friends trying to mislead the House in this way? He talks as if we were all children. This million is not to be used in substitution for the moneys mentioned in the other Bills before the House. The Minister of Education tried to mislead us in the same way. This is an additional million: what is the use of pretending that it is not? The honourable gentleman talks as if the Treasury bills were raised in London, with brokerage, and exchange, and so on. That is not the case. The honourable gentleman either does not understand it, or else he is trying to mislead us upon the question, which is really as simple as A B C. This Bill says—and the Minister of Education had to admit it—that they are to raise a million or to borrow a million. There is no difference in meaning between “raise” and “borrow,” and if honourable gentlemen will look at clause 7 of this Bill they will see that the money so raised is to go into the Consolidated Fund, and to be dealt with as the Treasurer may think fit. That is, it is loan-money to be treated as revenue, instead of passing as capital into the Public Works Fund. It is a means of borrowing money and using it, not for a specified purpose, but merely for the purpose of supplementing the ordinary revenue of the year. And the honourable gentleman tried to persuade us that it was not borrowing! As to this creation of Consols, the Minister of Education has told the House that the British Government provided Consols for investments for the people. Why, it makes one's hair stand on end to hear such things stated. Sir, do not Ministers know that the British Government is paying off Consols every year, by means of sinking fund, to the extent of seven millions? That process may have been stopped for a year or two, on account of provision being made for the navy. Do not the Government know that the debt of England is going down as fast as the English Government can manage to bring it down, and that there is a specified sum provided by permanent statute annually out of revenue for the gradual extinction of the debt?

Mr. WARD.—How much?

Mr. BELL.—Seven millions; but the honourable gentleman probably knows better than I do.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—The unfunded debt of 1892 was thirty-five millions.

Mr. BELL.—I am speaking of the gradual reduction of Consols, and the process by which the Mother-country reduces the public debt which consists of Consols. Does the honourable gentleman suppose that the Consols of England have a term of forty years? Does he suppose that that is the system of English Consols?

Mr. WARD.—I did not say so.

Mr. BELL.—No; but the Consols here have a deposit-period of forty years. That is not really a form of Consol. A Consol is a form under which the Government can pay off at any time, while the public creditor is not entitled to demand payment.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—It might be four hundred years.

Mr. BELL.—It is the period of time that the country chooses to pay it. Here you take the money and tie it up, and whatever the fall in interest may be the country is unable to take advantage of it. Call this Consols! The Colonial Treasurer knows better, and is only calling it Consols for the purpose of misleading the country. The honourable member for Riccarton does not understand it, nor did the Minister of Education. The Premier said that the foreign banks had got the money and were sending it away. Is it that the money has been sent away, or is it that the foreign banks have got the money and are not sending it away?

Mr. SEDDON.—I said some time ago they had large sums of money locked up.

Mr. BELL.—Then, if they have sent it away, it will not be here to invest in these Consols; and, if they have not sent it away, the country has it here available for use in ordinary business. But, as a matter of fact, the honourable gentleman is quite wrong, and is making a statement that he very soon will have to withdraw. The figures quoted by the honourable member for Wairarapa are quite correct.

Mr. SEDDON.—I can show from the banks' own statement that the sum of £364,000 has been withdrawn.

Mr. BELL.—The honourable gentleman will find that he is quite wrong, and I will only wait for him to make a specific statement. He has got into the wrong box, but I shall have my opportunity, no doubt, and I will then prove that he is wrong. The Minister expects to get the moneys which are in the old women's tea-pots; but I do not believe he will get the old women to invest, as I do not think this form of investment will be attractive, and I will tell the House why. The honourable gentleman talks of “repudiation”; he says such a word ought never to be used in this House. I agree with him, but I regret to say that he and his Government have been engaged in repudiation of the very worst kind, a repudiation of their liabilities to the poor class of investors—repudiation as gross as it is possible to be. I cannot use any language that will characterize it properly. I say he has been guilty of repudiation to this very class of investor, and I say that when the honourable gentleman comes to view the course of this legislation he will be heartily ashamed of what he has done in the Public Trust Office. Let me tell the honourable gentleman what has been done. There has been a Public Trust Office in this colony since 1872, when the office was created, and it was then provided that moneys should be received by the Government, bearing interest, which was payable to the persons who put their money there. The colony promised these persons, if they would invest their money in the Public Trust Office,—they were mostly people with small means,—that they would invest it for them, and give them the whole interest earned, less commission; but in the year 1891 the Government introduced as a policy measure and persuaded Parliament to pass an Act called “The Public Trust Office Act Amendment Act, 1891,” and in that Act they provided that, in lieu of paying the income to these people on their own money—first, they should not be allowed to take their money out of the office; and, secondly, the Government, instead of paying them the interest which their money was earning, would pay them on sums less than £3,000 5 per cent., and on sums over that amount 4 per cent., and they would seize the difference. This was nothing else but theft. I should have added that that Act gave the guarantee of the colony. It was inserted in that Act as if it were a new provision, but any honourable gentleman who will read the Act of 1872 will find that the guarantee was apparently given under that Act, though it is now pretended that it was not so given. They said, "We will give the guarantee of the colony, and in exchange we will seize the difference in the interest." But they would not allow the money to be taken out. The Government solicitors opposed the taking of the money out of the Public Trust Office, and they have opposed it successfully. These poor people have got their money there, and the Government have the use of their funds, and are paying them 5 per cent. and 4 per cent. But that is not all. Power was given to the Governor in Council to further reduce the rate of interest at any time to any amount he thinks fit.

Mr. SEDDON said the Treasury had not got money for the last twelve months from those funds.

Mr. BELL.—The honourable gentlemen are, apparently, ashamed of it themselves. I know the Colonial Treasurer too well not to know that he will be thoroughly ashamed of this transaction when he comes to review the legislation, when he leaves those benches. These are the honourable gentlemen whom I have previously described in this matter as being upon the highway with masks upon their faces before; but the masks have been removed this year. These people whom they have robbed of their full interest are of the very class who are supposed to be likely to invest their money in these Consols. There is not the slightest chance of it, however, if their friends know from them, as they are fast knowing, how they have been inveigled and entrapped, and then been deprived of the proper earnings of their money. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay was quite right when he said that the money which will find its way here for investment at 4 per cent. is not the money of the people of this colony. The honourable gentleman will get his money, I believe, but he will get no money from the people of the colony at 4 per cent.; he will get foreign money, and the interest will have to be remitted abroad. The money will not be "ear-marked" as in the other Acts; it will go into the Consolidated Fund, and the honourable gentleman will do what he likes with it. He will get forty-years money instead of Treasury bills. That is the difference. The honourable gentleman says, "If I do not get it in this way I shall have to raise it in Treasury bills." Does he mean to tell the House that this million, to be paid in in forty-years deposits, can be used as Treasury bills in anticipation of revenue? He knows better than that. These are not short-dated bills in anticipation of revenue. He cannot pay this back; he cannot redeem this money. He is to get this money on a forty-years deposit as a permanent loan to the colony, and it is nonsense to say there is any relation between this money and Treasury bills. And it is of no use attempting to deny that, nor, in fact, did the honourable gentleman attempt to deny it. A further sum of £1,000,000 is to be added to the permanent debt of the colony, and added in a way which makes it a far more permanent debt than our inscribed stock. It is to be added to the permanent debt of the colony to provide a million pounds more revenue for the Colonial Treasurer next year; it is in addition to and not in substitution for the £1,500,000 to be advanced to settlers; it is to be in addition to and not in substitution for the £1,250,000 for land-settlement; it is in addition to and not in substitution of the other £500,000 to be borrowed. It is not money to be raised in the colony for any one of these purposes, but it is money to be applied in aid of the revenue, and not for the purposes of capital. Now, is the House prepared for this? Of course the Government majority will defeat the present amendment; but is the House prepared to affirm the principle that we are to take capital in this way—to take the capital debt of the colony and apply it to the purposes of the year? Occasionally it has been found necessary to fund Treasury bills which have been raised in excess of the necessities of the year. But it is very bad finance to borrow for such a purpose. It is a wrong and improper thing, and only to be done in cases of great emergency. It has been done once or twice, and the House practically apologized to the country for doing it; but nothing of this magnitude has been proposed before—to deliberately raise a million and add it to the capital debt, and apply the money in aid of the revenue of the year. The Prodigal Son was not in the same country with us.

Mr. REEVES.—That is quite true.

Mr. BELL.—The Minister of Education says that what I say is quite true. Indeed, the honourable gentleman might have made that observation at the end of every sentence of my speech, because every sentence has been as true as that. I have confined myself to demonstrable facts. I have only to satisfy my own conscience; the consciences of honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House do not trouble me in the least. I have not said a single word of the kind referred to by the honourable member for Riccarton. I do not know what he said to his constituents, and I do not care. I know what pledges I gave to my constituents, and I do care for that; and I know, too, what those honourable gentlemen on the Government benches said. I know that they went to the country under false pretences. The money raised to purchase land will not

1.0. be of any use to the Treasurer; the money raised to road and purchase Native land will not be of any use to him; and the Colonial Treasurer was being left out of this scramble amongst members of the Government for borrowed money. The Minister of Education is to have his share, and every other member of the Government is to be provided with quantities of borrowed money, but the Colonial Treasurer was at first left out. This is an invention by which foreign money—not colonial money—is to be brought in for his use: and we are told we are following in the footsteps of the Mother-country in providing Consols for the investments of the people! The Mother-country has done nothing of the kind. If it provided Consols for this purpose it would increase, not decrease, the Consols. It has persistently regarded Consols, not as a method of investment for its people, but as a public debt hanging on the shoulders of the country, the weight of which was to be gradually diminished. We are day by day adding to the burdens of the people.

Mr. CROWTHER.—Sir, I cannot rise on the floor of the House at this time of the morning and say, as the last speaker has said, that I do not care. I think we owe a responsibility to one another as members of this House, and that we should care for our promises and our pledges to those who sent us here, and for our relation to one another. I feel to-night in a very serious mood. I, somehow, have got it into my mind that we are proposing to go too far. I cannot get that out of my mind. It seems to me to be only a few hours ago since we became security for two millions to a bank. Since then we have entered into a further engagement for the expenditure under the Land for Settlements Bill. We are now entering into another engagement; and, really, we are talking millions just the same as if we were a young country out of debt. When we consider unitedly our total indebtedness, and when we also consider the amount we are proposing to add this session, it seems to me that there is extreme necessity for being extremely careful and cautious. The Minister of Education was very jubilant about his debatable ability, but I am very desirous to see some one to follow who is possessed of extreme caution, who will look before he leaps, and that we should not enter into this very big project before we know exactly what the consequences will be. It seems to me, as far as I am able to follow this business, the matter is altogether too serious to talk about in this way. We hear statements about melodramatic habits and humbug. Gentlemen, this is not the time to talk in this strain. If we had treated this business on somewhat more cautious lines, as is done in connection with other businesses, and said that we would start the first year with a quarter of a million instead of a whole million, then we could have gone back to our constituents and said, "This is a start we are making, in a most cautious manner; we are desirous to feel our way as carefully as we can; if the first year we make a success, we can come to you with a full understanding that, having made a first quarter of a million a success, you are prepared to further trust us in our future parliamentary life." Some of the statements made in the House to-night are to a very great extent true. That we are adding extra burdens to the future generations is beyond all doubt; and, when it is very problematical how the money is to be spent, when we have no idea how it is to be spent, I think it is saying too much to say they have reason to believe the House will vote one million without any knowledge as to what purpose it is to be devoted to. I cannot help thinking, in all the circumstances, we are taking a responsibility that needs further consideration and more time to think out. The Treasurer was very short. He seemed to think it was not even necessary to explain what he proposed to do with the money. He seemed to me to say, "Throw it into our pockets; we will administer it according as circumstances may arise; you have no need to doubt but what we shall be successful." Those of us who have had any experience in this sort of business know very well that it is very much easier to spend money and to lend money than to find a profit on it at the end. There is no doubt whatever that lending money is very risky business, and especially when the money is lent upon the very uncertain lines indicated in this measure. If we could acquire any knowledge as to how this money was going to be spent with a view to its being reproductive, then we might explain it away to ourselves that there was every justification for entering into this very serious undertaking. So far as I am able to follow it, I am not able to satisfy myself that the whole of the surroundings justify us in undertaking such a large measure as this at one meal. As I have said before, if it had been half a million it would have shown that we were not going altogether too fast. As it is, it seems to me to be a measure that is brought forward having a large amount of responsibility and a very great amount of risk attached to it. Not knowing, myself, what that may be, or how we may come out of the risk, I again say that I feel the responsibility is more than we ought to be asked to vote upon to-night.

LAKE FORSYTH DRAINAGE BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said he had promised the day before to obtain information from the Surveyor-General as to the position of the land, and he had received the following memorandum from him:—

"The lands included within the schedule to 'The Lake Forsyth Drainage Act, 1894,' are Crown lands (see section 107, 'Land Act, 1892'), but any proceeds from them were, under the same clause, to be devoted—first, to administration; second, in payment of reclamation works; third, in payment of funds borrowed from the Little River to Lincoln Railway. The lands formed part of the lands set apart under the Second Schedule of 'The Ellesmere and Forsyth Reclamation and Akaroa Railway Trust Act, 1876,' one of the objects of that Act being the reclamation of Lakes Ellesmere and Forsyth, and the present Bill is carrying out that idea as far as Lake Forsyth is concerned. There is a similar Act of last session with respect to Lake Ellesmere—'The Halswell River Drainage District Act, 1893.'"

He might mention that last year, as he had said on the second reading of the Bill, a piece of land, amounting in area to two thousand and odd acres, was given for Lake Ellesmere, and it might be contended that that was for drainage purposes only. But he had explained that the County of Akaroa, which had very little at its disposal, had expended the sum of £60 last year in keeping this lake open. The very fact of the lake being kept open had saved the road and the railway to a great extent, and, as he understood, there was no other means of dealing with Banks Peninsula than what was intended to give them. The lake was kept open, and the road and railway would be preserved; and, inasmuch as Lake Ellesmere received two thousand acres with the original grant, the people in the neighbourhood of Lake Forsyth thought a thousand acres would not be too much, as the whole of the revenue to be derived from it would only amount to about £40 a year.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said the explanation which his honourable friend had obtained exactly bore out the statement which he (Mr. Stevens) had made to the Council on the second reading of the Bill, and as to which statement there was a considerable amount of doubt expressed by honourable members. The fact was now proved that this land was the source, practically, from which the colony was to seek repayment of the over-expenditure of £50,000 on the Akaroa-Lake Forsyth Railway. The sum over-expended was about £50,000, and all the lands within that area were the only means by which the Government could get restitution of the fund. Between 1887 and 1889, he thought, the late Government, in an Act called the Lake Ellesmere Reclamation Act, took power to expend a certain amount of money for the purpose of drying the land, which was quite unavailable; and the works were in the main successful, and a large quantity of land was thereby enabled to be sold. The last account he had seen of the state of the fund showed that there was a liability left to the Public Works Fund of £30,000 on their advance. But what he pointed out on the second reading of the Bill, and what he wished to point out now, was that all these acreages that were taken away formed, practically, an endowment to the railway in question. It was a clear loss to the colony, and it simply meant the giving-up of so much, which was the only means of recovering the money over-expended on this railway for the benefit of a particular locality. He thought it right to call the attention of the Council to these facts, and it was entirely for the Council to say whether it considered it advisable that these Bills should be almost annually brought forward for the purpose of absorbing the remainder of these lands. He did not wish to move any amendment, but he was rather surprised that no reference had been made to these points by the Select Committee. He thought the Council was now, however, in possession of all the facts. Bill read the third time.

HASTINGS BOROUGH LOAN VALIDATION AND EMPOWERING BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the third time, said its object was to validate a loan of the Borough of Hastings made in 1886. It appeared that it was proposed that a loan of £25,000 should be raised for drainage and other purposes, and the poll was in favour of the loan. Shortly after that the Borough Council obtained from the Bank of New South Wales a sum of £18,000 to carry out these works, and in 1892 he supposed they thought it necessary to make application in another quarter, and they applied to the Government Insurance Department for that amount to pay off the advance to the bank. He should have said that in the meantime they issued debentures for the total amount, and the bank advanced them the money on the debentures to the extent of £18,000. Shortly after this, an arrangement was made with the Government Insurance, on the assumption that the rate would extend to 1s. 6d. in the pound on the rateable value, and that that should be the basis on which the advance should be made. This was assumed both by the valuers acting for the Government Insurance and for the Borough of Hastings, under the Municipal Corporations Act of 1880, sections 46 and 189. He had no doubt whatever as to the validity of the loan on the basis of the shilling rate, but the understanding between them was that it should be on the basis of 1s. 6d. in the pound, and he and one or two of the lawyers to whom the matter was referred had grave doubts as to whether under the Municipal Corporations Act there was authority for that, although it looked at first sight as if there was such authority. Now, the Corporation of the Borough of Hastings, having in the first instance proposed a loan of £25,000, for the last twelve months had been pressed very hard to obtain the further loan, to enable them to carry on the works; but it had been held that they could not get further advances without legislation. He need scarcely say that this was one of the most important inland towns in New Zealand. Probably it would become a Chicago in time to come, and drainage there was essentially necessary.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS would like to know whether the Government Insurance Department had had any valuation of the property of the Borough of Hastings.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Yes.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS thought there ought to be some information placed before the Council. The funds of the Government Insurance Department ought to be most carefully managed, and not squandered as they had been in many instances in the past; because men took out policies for the benefit of their wives and families. He thought it would be as well for the Colonial Secretary to lay some information on the table to show that the loan was bond fide.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY would be glad to furnish all information to the Council when the Bill was in Committee.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS had no doubt it was all right. He did not know anything about the matter himself, but he had heard it spoken about by people outside.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR thought it would be more satisfactory if the honourable gentleman told the Council what he did know. So far as he knew, from statements made in another place, the loss in connection with loans by the Government Insurance Department had been merely nominal, if there had been any loss at all. This Bill was, he presumed, merely a validation of title. He did not think they should inquire into the values of properties: that should be left to the Government officials, who he was satisfied would act carefully.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI thought, if inquiries were made into the statement that the Insurance Department had lost money in connection with their loans, it would be found that the loss had been very small.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said it was only right that honourable gentlemen should be supplied with information, and he would supply the information required by the Hon. Mr. Reynolds when the Bill was in Committee.

Bill read the second time.

SHOPS AND SHOP-ASSISTANTS BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be committed,

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said they had lately heard a great deal about trusting the people for everything. He was one of those who liked to trust the people, and he thought a poll should be taken in each district so as to ascertain whether they really required the one half-holiday a week or not, and, if they did, to decide upon what day the half-holiday should be held. And when the poll had decided the question, he thought the minority would freely give way to the majority. He believed the Bill was not required by a large section of the community. Because a few shopkeepers and assistants wanted a half-holiday, they had no right to grant it in the face of those in whose interests it was that there should be no half-holiday at all. In San Francisco, where they had adopted a half-holiday, it resulted in the employés being paid by the hour instead of by the day, and the result was that, instead of being a benefit to the shop-assistants, they were the losers. Since then action had been taken to get the Act repealed. However, be that as it might, he thought they had no right to force upon the public any half-holiday—to prevent these people from using their own judgment as to whether they would take a half-holiday or not. He would certainly oppose the Bill right through unless the Colonial Secretary would consent to a poll being taken. There were other parts of the Bill which he objected to, but that was the principal objection which he had to it.

Bill committed.

ELECTORATES.

Mr. MILLS asked the Premier, If he will take steps at once, or bring in a measure early next session, to amend the present Representation Act of 1887, so that the absurd and ridiculous boundaries of the present electoralates shall not be perpetuated when new districts are allocated, but due consideration shall be given to community of interests, facilities for communication, and topographical features of such new electoralates? There was a great deal of dissatisfaction existing throughout the colony at the new boundaries last election, and very few people understood in what way they had been arrived at. They were more like a dog's hind-leg or a crooked fence than anything else: neither reason nor common-sense seemed to have been studied; and there were such difficulties in finding out the boundaries of the electoralates that the Commissioners ought to be made to go round and show them.

Hon. Mr. Reynolds

Mr. SEDDON said it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Representation Act Amendment Bill, and in it they proposed that a special Commission should be formed which should adjust all the electoral boundaries of the colony, and that that adjustment should stand until there was an increase in the population of the electoral districts of a certain percentage which they had not fixed yet. That was the law as it now obtained in other countries. He believed these frequent changes of boundaries after every census—and made by persons who had no local knowledge of the districts, and with little regard to community of interests, and so on, for these questions had not always been taken into consideration—had not been satisfactory. A Bill dealing with the question was necessary, he thought, and the Government would introduce it this session. Though he did not think they would be able to get it through during the present session, he hoped to have it passed before the next census was taken.

MRS. CLEMENTS AND ANOTHER.

Mr. WILSON asked the Native Minister, If he has made inquiry into the claim of Mrs. Clements and another, set forth in Petition No. 200, Session II., and reported on as follows by the Native Affairs Committee: "Petitioners allege that they have been wrongfully excluded from their share of the Ngarara Block. They pray that the law may be amended in order that their claim may be heard, and that compensation or other relief may be afforded them. It appears from the evidence of petitioners and other witnesses that they are left without any land whatever. The Committee is of opinion that the matter should be referred to Government for inquiry.—13th August, 1891"? If inquiry has been made, what was the result of such inquiry in relation to petitioners? This Mrs. Clements was the mother of a family, and resided on and had an interest in the Ngarara Block. He was informed that these people lived on the block, and yet, when it came to be adjudicated upon by the Native Land Court, they were shut out. A petition came before the Native Affairs Committee, and an inquiry was recommended by that Committee. He wanted to know whether an inquiry had been made by the Government.

Mr. SEDDON said the Government had decided that they could not, as a Government, do anything in this matter. There was now a Bill before the House, the Native Land Court Bill, and it was a matter for the House to deal with. The honourable gentleman might move that power should be given under that legislation to meet cases of this kind.

WAIKARI STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATE'S COURT.

Mr. MEREDITH asked the Minister of Justice, if he will make provision for a monthly sitting of the Resident Magistrate's Court at Waikari, as the present arrangements for hearing Court cases are both inconvenient and expensive to settlers in the Waikari and adjoining districts? He had been requested by the residents of Waikari and the neighbouring districts to bring the matter under the notice of the Minister of Justice. The Magistrate's Court sat once a fortnight at Amberley, sixteen miles south of Waikari, and at Culverden occasionally, twenty miles north of Waikari. All the cases from the river Hurunui south were heard at Amberley, and some residents were called upon to go a distance of from twenty to twenty-five miles to attend the Court. This was found to be very inconvenient and expensive. If occasional sittings of the Court could be arranged for at Waikari it would be a great convenience to the residents, and save a great deal of expense. These sittings could be held, he believed, at a very trifling cost.

Mr. REEVES said no application had been received on the subject. It was quite true, as the honourable member said, that Amberley was sixteen miles from Waikari, and that Waikari was twenty miles from Culverden; but there was railway-communication between these places. Inquiries would be made of the Stipendiary Magistrate, and he would see what could be done.

GUM INDUSTRY.

Mr. MASSEY asked the Government, if they have taken any steps to ascertain, through the Agent-General or the colony's representative at the Canadian Conference, the cause that has so disastrously affected the gum industry?

Mr. WARD might inform the honourable member that, so far as the Government had been able to obtain information, it appeared that the cause of the industry being affected was the financial upheaval that had taken place in the United States. The Commissioner sent to England had been requested to inquire into this matter amongst other things, and his report, on its receipt, would be made public.

PRIMARY-SCHOOL SCHOLARSHIPS.

Mr. MILLS asked the Minister of Education, if he will consider the present unsatisfactory system of primary-school scholarships, with a view to increasing the amount voted for that purpose, and to have one uniform system of examination, doing away with the present provincial system and opening all scholarships to all the pupils attending the elementary schools in New Zealand? A number of people recognised that the number of scholarships was not fairly proportioned throughout the various education districts, and they would like to know if more scholarships could not be offered, so that intelligent lads would be able to win their way in this arena, and prosecute their studies without expense to their parents. He would be very glad to get a favourable reply.

Mr. REEVES was understood to say that he proposed to deal with this question shortly in connection with the secondary schools.

RAILWAY WORKSHOPS EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. LAWRY asked the Minister for Public Works, if there is any immediate prospect of the men in the various railway workshops in the colony being employed full time? He had been induced to put this question in connection with the matter of the rolling-stock. He was informed that there was now work sufficient to give full employment to the men, who at present were only working five days a week.

Mr. SEDDON said the reply of the Commissioners was to the effect that, as already stated, the Commissioners did not expect to place the workshops on full time until the 15th October. That was the earliest date at which it could be done. He regretted that the occasion should have arisen for the Commissioners having to put the men on short time; but it was better to keep the whole staff on short time than to have to retire a number of the workmen. He was sure the Commissioners would be only too glad to put all the men on full work when there was work. They had, however, to deal with a falling revenue, and consequently there was less necessity for rolling-stock and less work. The 15th October was the date the Commissioners had named, and he hoped they would be able to do it then.

MEANEE FLOODS.

Mr. CARNELL asked the Minister of Lands, if he has received any report from the Engineers on the best way to adopt to protect the Meanee district from floods; if so, the nature of their report?

Mr. J. McKENZIE said he had not received any report, but he had received certain information in connection with the matter to the effect that the Engineer was taking levels and preparing a report. It would be ready shortly, and he would be glad to show it to the honourable member.

FENCING BILL.

Mr. WILSON asked the Minister of Lands, when he proposes to go on with the Fencing Bill, now referred to the Stock Committee?

Mr. J. McKENZIE said he hoped to put this Bill before the Committee not later than Monday; but a number of the members of that Committee were also members of another Committee which was sitting at the present time to inquire into another matter, and, of course, they could not be present at the meetings of both Committees at the one time. He hoped that by Monday he would be able to bring the Bill referred to before the Stock Committee.

BULLER COAL-MINES.

Mr. R. McKENZIE asked the Government, —(1.) Are they aware that 220 men have been dismissed from the Denniston coal-mines within the last few days? (2.) Are they aware that a population of from four to five hundred are on the verge of starvation at Mokihinui, owing to a dispute as to haulage rates on coal in that locality? (3.) Will they take immediate steps to relieve the distress existing amongst these coal-miners and their families by starting relief-works or otherwise? This was a very important matter, not only to the people in the district immediately concerned, but also to the colony generally. During the last few days 220 colliers had been dismissed from Denniston; and he had received information that at a public meeting held at Mokihinui the previous evening 150 men were stated to have been out of work for the past six or seven months in that locality. He hoped the Minister would see his way to make provision for these men to get employment, and that the Government would make some definite statement regarding the dispute that had been before the Select Committee of the House during the past six or eight weeks. It was time that something final and conclusive was done towards a settlement of that vexatious question, which was causing so much distress and misery in the locality concerned.

Mr. SEDDON said, in regard to the first part of the question, he had received the following reply from the Inspector of Mines, Westport:—

"Two hundred and twenty men are under notice to leave at Denniston, but, of these, about a hundred and thirty will be taken on again, leaving about ninety who will be thrown out. The reason for this is want of trade; for instance, last week only two shifts worked. Information from Mr. Jamieson states, regarding Mokihinui, that owing to intermittent work in the past the people are very necessitous, but probably three to four hundred was a more correct estimate."

Mr. R. McKENZIE said that a considerable number of men, he believed, had left the district owing to the dispute under discussion, and that unless it was soon settled it would be the means of depleting the district of its population.

Mr. SEDDON said that was the reply from the Inspector of the district. In regard to the Granity Creek Mine, the Westport Company had applied for some land upon which to put their buildings; but, as the law stood, this could not be granted to them as applied for. There was power given to them to obtain a lease of the land; but the non-erection of the appliances was the reason they gave for stopping work at the time. Now, the lease of that mine had been held for ten or twelve years, but the company had never put out a ton of coal. The question was, whether the State, having imposed conditions as to output upon coal-mine leases, should for any reason allow those leases to remain unworked. He thought the time had arrived when the Government must insist upon the output conditions being complied with. With the expenditure by the company upon this mine during the past two years they had now got the mine into working-order, and therefore his remarks would only apply to the time that they had had the mine before the last expenditure was made upon it. With regard to the Mokihinui Company, that company had been unfortunate; they had already lost a number of years, and very little coal had been won or put out from that mine. They had spent a large sum of money in constructing a railway, had purchased a steamer and erected a wharf, and all this expenditure was a direct loss to them. The colony had spent £36,000 in making a railway to the mine, and now that that railway was finished no coal was being put out. He believed the real reason was want of capital on the part of the company. But it was a fact that the output conditions under the lease had not been complied with by the company. With regard to the Mokihinui Company, he said the output conditions must be complied with, and notice would be given in terms of the lease to determine the same. The old Cardiff Company had held a lease for over twelve years, and had never put out any coal. They were always wanting communication with the railways, as they had no means of getting their coal away. A new company had been formed, but they had not put the mine in working-order owing to the disputes as to the price to be charged for the carriage of the coal on the section of the railway belonging to the Mokihinui Company. The Mokihinui Company stated that they were prepared to allow coal to be carried over the line, and whatever the final adjustment was as to the price they would be prepared to accept it. The new Cardiff Company had refused to go on putting out coal or to send it over the line, and the Select Committee had reported upon the matter. The Railway Commissioners had made an agreement for a year, and they could not see their way clear to make a new agreement. Therefore a dead-lock had occurred, and in the meantime the men were thrown out of employment, and their families had been reduced to the verge of starvation.

An Hon. MEMBER.—When does the lease expire?

Mr. SEDDON said the agreement between the Railway Commissioners and the Mokihinui Coal Company would expire next June. The question was, Were they to allow the output conditions of the leases to be ignored, or should the Government insist on compliance? It was not the business of the Government to interfere in disputes. The company had undertaken to put out coal, and they had simply adopted a dog-in-the-manger policy, to the detriment of the community. Under these circumstances, he wished it to be clearly understood that notice would be given by the Government to each of these companies that they must comply with the output conditions of the leases, and, if they did not comply with them, then it was the duty of the Government to cancel those leases, and allow some one else to work the mines. As regarded temporary relief being given to the unfortunate people out of work, the Minister of Lands had been making a road in the locality, and he was at present inquiring as to whether further expenditure would be wanted in connection with that road. If further expenditure were required, now would be the proper time to make it, in order to relieve the necessities of the people. The Government had always laid it down as a rule not to make work simply for the purpose of finding work, but he hoped the Minister of Lands would be able to give relief in this case.

WAIHAO AND WAITAKI NATIVES.

Mr. PARATA asked the Native Minister, Whether steps have been taken to make inquiry as to the advisableness of appointing a medical doctor for the Maori people of Waihao and Waitaki?

Mr. SEDDON said that, from inquiries made, he believed there were places where medical assistance to the Natives was desirable, and it was intended to recommend that Dr. Garland, of Oamaru, and Dr. Barclay, of Waimate, be offered £25 a year each to attend to the Natives at Waihao and Waitaki.

NEW ZEALAND CONSOLS BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

30. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Sir, I was considerably interested by the heading of a paragraph in the Financial Statement which refers to "the thrift of the people," and by the statement in the paragraph that—

"It has been felt for years, and is further proved by our periodical bank returns, that if further conveniences were afforded to the people for the investment of their savings under the guarantee of the State a large number would be only too glad to avail themselves of the opportunity."

Now, Sir, I am not an authority, and I do not know how far there is a demand for investments of this kind, but I presume the Colonial Treasurer knows; and I take it, when he says there is a demand for investments in the nature of savings-bank investments, that is so, and I give him all credit for desiring to provide some means of investing moneys in a way similar to the Post-Office Savings-Bank. He has told us that a large number of people would like to invest their money in the Post-Office Savings-Bank, but the limit of £500 is too small to enable them to do so, and that trust funds are not easily invested; that, in fact, it would be desirable to adopt some other method which shall run hand-in-hand with the Post-Office Savings-Bank, and be a completely safe and secure means of investment. I think when he made this statement he had in his mind, perhaps, the French system, under which the peasants and other people of that country largely invest in Government securities; and there is no doubt that such securities are considered a safe means of investment for their money. The fact of a large part of the public loans of France being taken up by the people in the country is, I think, a very satisfactory thing. It leads to a very healthy state of the country's finances, because when every one is interested in the safety of that finance every one will take means to criticize the country's finance, and see that it is on a perfectly safe and sure footing. The Colonial Treasurer naturally, in looking round for a system, desired to make the system as attractive as possible: and I must admit he has made it a very attractive one. The system of issuing bonds or Consols in small amounts, which pass from hand to hand in the form of Consol certificates, would be a very attractive form of investment, and, I think, would be used a great deal by the people of this country. Now, when there is so much banking agitation, when we do not know what will happen next day, when the unexpected is happening so often, with such disastrous effect on such a large scale, there are many people who would prefer to hold these securities rather than intrust their money to banks. I think it would meet with the approval of the people to a large extent, and be adopted by them as a safe means of investment. But we read in the Financial Statement, with regard to the objects of the Bill, that "A Bill will be introduced for the consideration of the House, embodying what the Government believe and hope will contain only simple machinery to enable the thrift of the people to be safely secured." Anybody reading that will see that there is a slight ambiguity in it, but the main point in that paragraph is that the Bill is to contain "only simple machinery to enable the thrift of the people to be safely secured." That is what we understood the Bill to be brought down would be—that it would be one only containing simple machinery to enable the thrift of the people to be safely secured, and for nothing else. And further on in the Financial Statement we read, "The Government will be able to use these funds most advantageously in promoting the development of the country." How this will be done has never been explained by the Colonial Treasurer. Naturally, there was a good deal of expectation as to what the Bill would be like when it was brought down, and I, with others, took an early opportunity of seeing what it was. I must say I was very much disappointed with the Bill. I had hoped it would be a Bill of another kind. There are clauses in the Bill which certainly do not meet with my approval, nor, I believe, with the approval of the House at large. There is, first, clause 7, which provides that "All such deposits . . . shall be paid into the Public Account, and shall form part of the Consolidated Fund of the colony." If we look up the Public Revenues Act of 1867 we shall find under the heading "Consolidated Fund" that all revenue now or hereafter to be payable is to form part of the Consolidated Fund. And it subsequently says, "All produce of such revenue shall be deemed and taken to be Her Majesty's consolidated revenue of the Colony of New Zealand, subject to be appropriated to the public uses thereof." If we read that clause in the Act we find that the money from these Consols is to be paid into the Consolidated Fund, which is subject to be appropriated for the public uses of the colony. That there can be no doubt about, and, that being the case, this is purely a loan proposal.

Mr. WARD.—What Act are you referring to?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. — "The Public Revenues Act, 1867."

Mr. WARD.—That Act is repealed.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I am aware it is, by the Act of 1891, which I shall read presently; but the meaning of "Consolidated Fund" has not been altered. But this is a pure loan Bill, and it is not what it was intended to be when mentioned in the Financial Statement. The question as to what would be done with the money has never been answered to my satisfaction. The Colonial Treasurer said it would be useful for Treasury bills.

Sir R. STOUT.—Paying off Treasury bills.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. — I quite admit it would be useful for raising money on Treasury bills, in the same way as the Post Office funds and the Public Trust Office funds may be used. And I have no objection to its being used for that purpose so long as the deposits are not paid into the Consolidated Fund. But under the present Bill, if we used it for Treasury bills, it might lead to this: that a large sum would be thus invested in Treasury bills, and sooner or later, under this Treasurer or some future Treasurer, the result would be that either these Treasury bills would be converted into funded stock, or the time of their currency would be so enlarged that they would become eventually part of the funded debt. There is no proposal in this Bill for that, it is true, but it would be a great temptation for future Treasurers to adopt that plan; and I hope that, before the Bill leaves the House, the Bill will be so altered that such a thing could not possibly be done. Then, there are objections with regard to clause 25; but I am not going to refer at length to that, because I do not think the clause will be insisted upon. But I hope there will be amendments introduced in this Bill, altering it to a very considerable extent. It is now a loan Bill, and I hope that before it leaves the House it will come out as a proposal on the same lines as the Post-Office Savings-Bank, and it can be made equally safe. The Post-Office Savings-Bank deposits go through a regular routine, and they are not in the hands of the Colonial Treasurer; and this scheme should be framed upon similar lines. I will read from the Public Revenues Act of 1891 what is done with these moneys in the Post-Office Savings-Bank. This is clause 74 of the Public Revenues Act of 1891: "Moneys received for deposit in the Post-Office Savings-Bank . . . shall be kept in a separate account"—they are not paid into the Consolidated Fund Account; and it says, further, in subsection (5), that—

"At the end of each calendar year the Postmaster-General shall prepare an account showing the total profit accrued on the Post Office Account during each year, and shall, on or before the end of the then financial year, pay over the balance, after making full provision for all liabilities to depositors or otherwise thereon, to the Consolidated Fund."

This provides for accounts being furnished of all this money; and in clause 77 we have,—

"It shall be lawful to invest any part of the balances in any of the accounts mentioned in this Part of this Act in any securities which shall be declared by the Governor, by Order in Council, to be securities in which such balances may be invested."

That is what happens with regard to deposits under the Post Office Account; and is there any reason whatever why we should not make these clauses apply equally to the proposal with regard to Consols? That would make the Bill a safe Bill, and one that I should be prepared to support throughout. It would provide a means of investing money, and it could not be in any sense a charge on the taxpayers of the colony. We could have the money shown in a separate account every year. I have here, for instance, Return B.-11, the Post Office Account, in which is given a complete return of the moneys connected with the Post Office. We can all see it and criticize it, and we can all know what has been done. I have, further, a return of investments in the Post Office and other accounts. There is a list of them here; and a number of them are Government securities—such as those under the Land for Settlements Act and loans to local bodies—and amongst them I see £338,000 invested in Treasury bills. If we tie up this money in the way that I suggest there can be no objection whatever to the Treasurer's proposal to utilise the account for the purpose of Treasury bills. But, at the same time, the money should be tied up in such a manner that all would know it is safe, and that it could not possibly become any charge on the taxpayers of the colony; and a return should be prepared at the end of every year. I suggest these proposals because I was returned, as I believe most members on this side of the House were returned, to support this Government, and to support them in a non-borrowing policy. I was returned on that principle, and to that principle I intend to stick. This can be made a Bill which is not a borrowing Bill, but simply on the principle of the Post-Office Savings-Bank Act, and if it is made on that principle, and the money is tied up as I suggest, I shall be very glad to support the second reading. I shall listen with great interest to what the Colonial Treasurer says in his reply, and if he agrees to the amendments I suggest I shall support the second reading, but, if the Bill is not amended in Committee, I shall vote against the third reading. I hope the Treasurer will not receive these proposals in any hostile manner. I am simply fulfilling my pledges on the election platform, and I have no desire to kill the Bill, but simply to make it a safe Bill. I feel, in introducing such safeguards as would absolutely tie up the money in some such way as

I suggest, it will satisfy those of us who were returned on a non-borrowing policy, and would make the Bill a safe and useful measure—one that would be acceptable both to the House and the country.

Mr. HALL-JONES.—I look on this as one of the most important Bills we have had before us this session, and I must confess that I do not look on it with any approbation. It is called a Bill for the encouragement of thrift, and is said to be for the benefit of the people. Who are the people it is supposed to benefit? Who comprise the largest portion of our population? Why, Sir, the workers; and will this Bill benefit the working-people? I do not think so. Their requirements are met by another institution. If we refer to the Budget, the Treasurer there speaks of the Post-Office Savings-Bank, where he says,—

“The Post-Office Savings-Bank, it is recognised, presents a thoroughly safe, and in the large majority of cases a singularly acceptable, channel for depositing the surplus moneys of our wage-earning and trading classes. But it has been felt for years, and is further proved by our periodical bank returns, that, if further conveniences were afforded to the people for the investment of their savings under the guarantee of the State, a large number would be only too glad to avail themselves of the opportunity. It must be borne in mind that the Post-Office Savings-Bank only pays interest on a limited aggregate sum deposited individually, and requires, in the interests of the depositor, many forms and ceremonies to be gone through before money can be put in or drawn out.”

Now, it has been suggested by the last speaker that the money raised under this Bill should be placed on a similar footing to that deposited in the Post-Office Savings-Bank Account. If this is done, where is the need for this Bill? If the maximum amount allowed to be deposited in the Post-Office Savings-Bank is too low, why not raise it from £500 to any larger sum? And, if the Government do not care to pay 3½ per cent. on the sums over £500, let them pay a lower rate—say, 3 per cent. or 2½ per cent. as the amount increases. I do not think that 1 per cent. of the working-men of the colony have so much money under their control after providing for the necessities of life as £500, and who desire to lock up their savings, which they may require to use at any time, in Consols, when the Post-Office Savings-Bank gives them every facility they require. I think, if the suggestion of the last speaker is intended to be carried out, there is no need at all for this Bill. I look upon the Bill as purely a loan Bill. Either it is a loan Bill or it is not. If it is a loan Bill, I would rather see the Government come down and boldly say so: then we should have to look upon this question in another light. I have nothing to say against a loan being raised in the colony when money is urgently required; but we must consider those who have to pay the interest on our loans. If we are going to raise money for the purpose of carrying on public works, which this Bill indicates that the money is to be raised for, why should we pay 4 per cent. for it, when we were told only a few hours ago that money for another purpose could be raised at 3 per cent.? Why should we increase the burden borne by the whole of the taxpayers of the colony by raising money at 4 per cent. with 1 per cent. for all time, when we are told that it can be raised at 3 per cent.? A great cry has been made that the money-lender in the colony demands extravagant rates of interest, and that was given as one reason why we should have the cheap-money Bill. Judging from the proposals in this Bill, there are some persons in the colony who do not demand a high rate of interest for moneys they lend, so long as they have good securities for the money advanced. This must be the case, or how are they going to take the Consols at 4 per cent. interest? It is a most unwise policy to pursue, when people are willing to advance money at as low an interest as 4 per cent., for the Government to try to mop up the whole of that money, instead of leaving it to go into the ordinary trade-channels, such as making advances to settlers and the promotion of the industries of the colony. I think it would be very much better if the Government allowed this money which the money-lenders would lend at a low rate of interest to be utilised in the way I suggest, instead of taking it into their own hands. If we want more capital in the colony, is it right for the Government to absorb into their own hands all the capital within the colony that can be obtained at a low rate of interest? I maintain this proposal will not benefit the people one bit. It will rather do harm than good. If the Government want to borrow money, let them raise it in the cheapest way. We have had no definite information from the Colonial Treasurer or the Premier as to what the money raised under these proposals will be used for. I can only conclude that it is going to be used for the purpose of carrying on public works, as previous loans have been used; therefore I shall have to vote against the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. HOGG.—Sir, the first question in connection with this Bill is this: Is it a borrowing measure? Is it the intention of the Government to add to the existing liabilities of the colony? Well, it is, and it is not, a measure for borrowing. In one sense, undoubtedly, the intention is to add to the permanent liabilities of the country, but in another sense it is borrowing by a method entirely new to that which the colony has been accustomed to, and in this respect it possesses the charm of novelty. We are not borrowing under this measure from abroad, but we are borrowing at home; and I should like to ask honourable members this: What is imperilling New Zealand now, and what has imperilled it in the past? Has it not been our system of contracting foreign loans without reference to the fact that we never take steps to ascertain whether the capital exists in the colony or whether there were not capitalists amongst us able to come forward to the assistance of the Government and the country.

We are at the present time paying a large amount of interest every year to foreign bondholders. We have been told during this debate that the amount paid for private and public indebtedness is in round numbers about three millions annually, or about one-third of the value of the colony's exports. This is a very serious matter. It is admitted, to quote a familiar illustration, that the Chinese are undesirable colonists; and what is the reason? The reason is simply that the profits of their trade and their enterprise, whatever those profits may be, are not again distributed in New Zealand but are carried off to China. Well, Sir, in the same way foreign companies are injurious. The banks that have carried on business in this colony, as well as some of our public companies, insurance companies, and so forth, have been, on the whole, exceedingly injurious to New Zealand, because the profits of their enterprise, instead of being circulated in the country, have been carried off into foreign channels. New Zealand has simply been utilised as a milch-cow for the benefit of other parts of the world. Money invested here has been continually taken away to foreign places, and now New Zealand is in the position of being further impoverished if, instead of endeavouring to borrow from amongst their own population and conserving a spirit of patriotism amongst our own colonists, we resume borrowing from foreign sources. Then the question arises, Is borrowing a necessity? If we take the theory of the Opposition, surely we must admit it is a necessity. Ever since the present Government came into office we have been told by that great authority on financial matters that borrowing is indispensable; that, do what we like, we must borrow. And I think they ought to compliment us on the fact that we are realising the truth of their assertion. I, for one, never denied that borrowing is a necessity, especially in the case of a new country. I do not know whether I differ from other members on this side of the House. As far as I am concerned, I stand unpledged with regard to the judiciousness of borrowing, if we find it to be necessary to borrow for reproductive works: and that is the essence of the whole question. We see at the present time that settlers, as well as the Corporations in the colony, find that borrowing is a necessity. Borrowing has never ceased. We find borrowing on the part of private individuals, borrowing on the part of public companies which are carrying on various enterprises, and we have borrowing on the part of large public corporations; and the question is this: Are the Government of the day going to have their hands tied, now that they are endeavouring, in a way that has never been tried before, to develop the resources of the colony—now that they are endeavouring not to contract our public works, but rather to expand them—now that they are endeavouring to facilitate settlement in all parts of the country, in places that a few years ago would certainly not have been looked upon as a field for settlement at all? I ask, Sir, the Government having entered upon a policy of enterprise, are they to have their hands tied, chained up, or restricted? It is quite true that I stand, like, I dare say, many other honourable members in this House, pledged not to endeavour to assist the Government to borrow from without—that is, to contract foreign loans. But the question of borrowing from within is an entirely different question from that; and I hope honourable members will mark the great difference that exists between raising foreign loans in the London market and endeavouring to utilise the capital that is lying dormant in the country itself. Because, after all, what is capital? It signifies our commercial lifeblood. Our veins have been tapped hitherto for the benefit of outsiders. But the question is this: Are we not warranted in making use of the capital that is now lying dormant? And we are told that a very large amount of capital is lying dormant in our own financial institutions. Well, Sir, I think the arguments which have been used by the opponents of this measure to a great extent answer themselves. We have been told that this money cannot be raised—that our Consols will not be taken up. We have also been told that the operation of this Bill will be to ruin the banks; that it will deplete the Government Savings-Bank; that it will weaken our financial institutions; that the people will wring their hands; that, in short, we shall have a financial famine. Well, Sir, after all, this method of raising money is not novel. Are we not following the example of the greatest commercial country in the whole universe? Are we not following, in this Bill, the example of Great Britain, the country that is able to lend to the whole world, the country that is recognised as the most financially sound in the whole universe? Do we not know that that country, as the Colonial Treasurer has stated, has not less than £575,000,000 invested in British Consols? And I would like to ask the prophets of evil we have in this House, have those investments in British Consols ruined the Bank of England? Have those investments injured the financial institutions of England? Have they burst up the savings-banks of that country? Have they interfered with the commercial lifeblood of that country? Is it not circulating now as freely as, or more freely than, before the British Consols were inaugurated? Then, Sir, if those predictions are correct that we cannot raise the money, are we going to injure our banks by passing this Bill? I should like to ask, what do these predictions come to? There is not the slightest doubt that in the past the moneyed interest in New Zealand has controlled the Government, and to a great extent has controlled the policy of the representatives of the people. It has controlled Parliament. Of this there is not the slightest doubt. The banks have been running the colony. But now we find the position has changed. Under a Liberal Administration, instead of the banks running the Parliament of New Zealand, the Parliament of New Zealand has the banks coming to it in a suppliant attitude. The banks are compelled to come to the House before they can amalgamate or move one step in the direction in which they are travelling. I ask, through the medium of the Consols what are the people asked to do? Are they asked to lend to foreign bondholders? Not for a moment. They are asked to lend to a corporation controlled by themselves. We know very well that commercial constitutionalists and commercial constitutionalism offer the best possible guarantee that the money will be paid. What, after all, are the people doing? They are asked simply to lend to their own institutions—to lend to the Government of the country, for the benefit of the country. And I say no true national policy could be inaugurated of a financial character that is more calculated to develop the resources of a young country than the policy contained in this Bill. Sir, to follow an apt illustration, the sun in former ages produced our coalfields; those coalfields have been developed and the coal brought to the surface by human labour, and we know, on the other hand, that those coalfields are simply fructifying—they are developing the fields of our enterprise; they are assisting our very atmosphere, and, instead of that coal being lost, it is going again to replenish the earth—it is going back to fructify the soil in which it was originally produced. In the same way we are going to use the produce of capital. Capital produces interest; but so long as we keep the interest in our own hands, and borrow from our own people, who will receive the benefit? How can it impoverish the country if the money is expended in work that will furnish employment for labour in developing the resources of the colony? Capital is the food on which industry thrives. It is absolutely essential not only to public works, but it is essential to those who are endeavouring to cultivate the industries on which New Zealand must be built up, and which will eventually make her that great nation which I hope she will be. New Zealand is being drained through the medium of the heavy interest she has to pay to those who have been advancing money to her in the past. And what do we find? We find this: that our merchants, that our tradespeople, that our artisans, our settlers, our local bodies, are all clamouring and crying out to the Government, "Give, give; we want more money; we cannot get on without it." We have natural resources and splendid machinery in this country; it offers a splendid field for development. We have a thrifty and hard-working population; but our settlers are in the position of an engine trying to revolve without the natural oil that is essential to keep it in good operation, and to preserve it. The machinery is grinding itself to pieces in the absence of sufficient capital, and that capital we must have. Well, Sir, why is it that there is so little capital circulating in the country? I say this: that the Government have been doing a noble work during the last few years. Since their party came into power they have been prosecuting public works, doing their very best to assist the settlers, and responding to the demands of members of this House and the demands, for instance, of my own district; they have been endeavouring to find money for roads and bridges, and they have been doing much for the unemployed of the country. They have been endeavouring to solve the question of social distress, to promote comfort amongst families, to prevent such a thing as privation. But, although they have been exerting themselves heroically in this direction, it is quite evident, unless we are going to inflict further taxation, that more food must be found in order to replenish the empty Treasury. In what position does the Treasury stand? We know there has been a very heavy drain upon it. I have applied time and again on behalf of my own district to get works undertaken in that district; and in every part of the colony the settlers have demanded works—works which are necessary for the preservation of life, such works as bridges over dangerous rivers; and, while I have been endeavouring to get works of this description undertaken as quickly as possible, the reply which has been given by the Minister of Lands and the heads of the departments has been, "We should be only too glad to give you all the works the settlers desire, but where is the money to come from?" I maintain that the money must be found. If the feeding-bottle is empty it must be filled. I say, why should it not be filled? If we have the milk in the country that milk must be drawn. We are not going to get a foreign stimulant. That is what we have been getting in the past from the banks and from the financial institutions that the senior member for Wellington City is weeping over because this Bill is going to hurt them. Never mind though it does weaken them if it strengthens the State, and I say that the strength of the Government of this country lies in the efforts they are making to help the settlers of New Zealand. We know what these foreign financial institutions have been doing. Have they not year after year, during the last twenty years, entirely through this foreign borrowing policy, been distributing such dividends as 10, 12, and 15 per cent.? And amongst whom? Amongst the population of New Zealand? No; but amongst their shareholders in all parts of the world. That is where the money of New Zealand has been going. That is the reason why these institutions are afraid to lend at the present time, because there is no borrowing from abroad as there was before. And we are not going to allow them to drain their 10- and 15-percentages from the unfortunate settlers of New Zealand, who have to contend with falling markets and great disabilities. I say we have no right to go out of our way to assist those institutions if at the same time we neglect to cultivate a national policy and help ourselves; and the way to help ourselves is by giving to the capitalists of New Zealand, who have made their money here through their thrift and enterprise, a safe investment; and that is what the Bill is doing. The greatest authorities tell us that money is the vital principle of the body politic. The Treasury of a country is the heart of that country, and if we can control the Treasury we shall control our own public affairs. The objection is made to this measure for raising money that the loan is not earmarked; that the money need not necessarily be applied to works of a reproductive character; that the money that is raised by means of these Consols need not be used for the purpose of making advances to settlers, or for making roads and bridges and other public works. I think the honourable member who spoke last—the honourable member for Timaru—alluded to these roads and public works as not being of a reproductive character. Well, Sir, I take a very different view of the matter, because I maintain this: that no works could possibly be of a more reproductive character than public works in a young country. It is quite true I do not like the idea of heavy interest being paid annually on account of increasing loans, but, on the other hand, I should like to ask this question: Are the people of New Zealand prepared to be taxed—to have an additional load of taxation placed upon them? What would be thought of a working-man, who has ploughed his way from the commencement, working hard and earnestly from morning to night, and making a perfect slave of himself in order that his children may go well clothed, do without work, and live upon his hard earnings? I say a man who adopts a policy of that kind is not only adopting a policy that is cruel to himself, but one that is merciless to his children, who should be taught to work the same way as he has done. And what are we doing in New Zealand—in this young country? Are we not laying the foundations of the colony—foundations for all time? That being the case, are we to bear the whole of the burden? Sir, the public works we are making, the railways we are constructing, are for all time—they are works upon which our future institutions will depend. Our settlers are not merely doing work for themselves, but for all time; and, if the Government come forward and say, "We are going to borrow through the medium of these Consols for the purpose of relending so as to develop the resources of the country," I say the Government have a right to be supported in carrying out a policy of that character. It is, in my opinion, a patriotic policy. The money under this Bill is not going to be invested badly. It has been invested badly in the past, when we had foreign loans, but as long as the money is raised in the colony the owners of the money who are in the colony, and able to vote, will see that it is properly spent. They will have full control over the investments. It is simply one class of the people who have money lending that money for the assistance of those who require it, and lending it with a patriotic desire to see New Zealand and its public works go ahead. And I do not see why they should not. Sir, step by step I believe we are approaching the inevitable. There is not the least doubt of it that our financial institutions are becoming weaker. And why? Because they are in the hands of private corporations; and, as these institutions become weaker, I believe we are approaching nearer and nearer to what in the opinion of many is inevitable, and that is, a State bank. There is no getting away from the fact that not only in New Zealand, but in the other colonies, that is the thing which is standing in front of the banks and menacing them now. We are withdrawing, possibly, the means of their support. But why are we doing this? We are doing it because we are opposing what we might term—and though some people may regard it as hurtful, I think the consequences will not be so unpleasant—we are opposing State socialism to the reign of individualism which we have suffered from in the past. Nearly the whole of the institutions that are springing up are in that direction. We have railways, the Post and Telegraph Office, the public schools, and I could mention hundreds of different institutions, and there is also our labour legislation: the whole of these institutions are of one character. In them the State is doing the work of the people; and, if the State is going to carry on that work, unless we are going to have stagnation you must strengthen the hands of the State, and the only way of doing that is by bringing capital into play, because capital signifies the lifeblood. It is not right that this should be allowed to lie dormant. What has happened in the other colonies? Look at the banks bursting there day after day, and people who had money deposited in these banks awaking next morning to find that they were without a shilling. There is a universal feeling of distrust because of that, and that is the reason why money is kept hoarded, and is not circulated. New Zealand is suffering from depression because people feel that their money would be insecure in the financial institutions. I believe that, instead of the population refusing to respond, they will very heartily respond to the offer that is contained in this Bill, and that the Consols will be freely taken up by people who want a better security than is offered now through the medium of our banks. I believe the Bill is capable, however, of being greatly improved, and I should like to see clause 35, if possible, struck out. I do not think there is any necessity for that clause. If certain safeguards are needed in the Bill, I think I can say that the Government and the Ministry of the day will accept any safeguards that may be advisable. I consider the object of the Government is thoroughly patriotic, and that money that is dormant, and capital that is now unused, or that otherwise might leave New Zealand, will by this measure be brought into active use. I believe the Bill will promote the development of the country districts, and that it is essential for the general prosperity of the people.

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—I do not propose to occupy very much time in connection with this Bill, but I feel that it is of such an important character that it would not be wise for me to allow the opportunity to go past without making a few remarks upon it. The honourable gentleman who has just sat down has called the attention of the House to the fact that there is a great deal of difference between loans contracted in the London market and loans contracted in the colony. With that I agree to a very large extent. But, Sir, whether loans are contracted in the London market or in the colony, the result is the same so far as the payment of interest is concerned, and the additional debt and burden placed upon the people of the colony. Then, the honourable gentleman spoke about foreign institutions and the pressure they put upon the colony; but I have read this Bill, and I can see nothing in it to prevent the foreign capitalist from holding these Consols, and continuing the pressure upon the colony and upon the people of the colony. Now, I read the Bill again, and I find that both the Financial Statement and the Bill speak of encouraging the thrift of the people. But the honourable gentleman who has just sat down said the object of the Bill was to provide New Zealand capitalists with an outlet for their money. Sir, I did not know that it was the duty of the Legislature to provide investments for the capitalists of New Zealand. I thought that the duty of the Legislature, composed as it is of representatives of the democracy of New Zealand, was more, and ought to be more, in the direction of easing the burdens at present on the shoulders of the people, and giving them a chance to raise their position. Sir, the financial proposals of the Government during this session have been startling in the extreme. It may be that I am new to handling, or to witnessing the handling, of such large amounts as we have been dealing with, but I confess that from time to time I have been somewhat staggered at the ease with which the Colonial Treasurer and many members of this House have spoken of millions, and half-millions. I confess that I have been somewhat aghast; but I consider that, of all the proposals we have had before the House this session, this is the most startling. As I read the Bill, Sir, it is a Bill which proposes to borrow one million sterling from the people of the colony if it can be got; and this million of money is not borrowed for reproductive works, it is not earmarked for advances for settlers, nor is it to be applied in the purchase of lands for settlement, or in the opening-up of Native lands or for the construction of roads and bridges. The only clause that deals with the question provides that it shall be placed to the credit of the Consolidated Fund, and shall be dealt with in accordance with the charges that are made from time to time upon that fund. Now, if the true object of the Bill had been to encourage thrift, and to provide an outlet for the savings of the people, I should have thought the Bill would have had some provision authorising the application of the money raised in some direction such as I have indicated. But there is no provision in the Bill at all stating how the money is to be dealt with after it gets into the Consolidated Fund. If once it gets into that Fund it seems to me that we shall be adding an additional million to our present indebtedness, and that will be a very serious matter. What will be the result if this Bill passes? It means that small sums may be withdrawn from building societies, the Post-Office Savings-Bank, and private savings-banks, and invested in Consols. Money that is at present deposited in the banks at call may, possibly, be withdrawn and invested in Consols; and this will simply mean that there will be a restriction on trade, the floating capital will be reduced, and the people of the colony will suffer by it. Now, Sir, the Financial Statement speaks of the savings of the people being locked up. I contend that if these small sums are invested in Consols they will still be locked up as if they were on deposit for a short period, because if the holder of Consols wishes to realise he will have to submit to a discount. It is all very well to say the Consols can be passed from hand to hand, and are transferable by delivery, but if an individual wishes to get cash for one of these Consols he will not get par for it—he will have to submit to a discount.

Mr. MORRISON.—Question.

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—It is a matter of opinion, and the honourable member for Caversham is entitled to his; and I am sure he will allow me to have mine. Now, we have been talking from time to time of revising the tariff. It is desired that we should be enabled to take the duties off the necessities of life, and so relieve the working-people of the colony; but this proposal simply means an additional £35,000 or £40,000 interest per annum, and that means extra-taxation to provide for it. In view of these facts, it seems to me that any proposal for the revision of the tariff must be a long way in the distance. The Bill itself provides, as I have said before, that the Governor may authorise the Colonial Treasurer to receive, by way of deposit, one million sterling, bearing interest not exceeding 4 per cent per annum. These deposits may be continued for a period of forty years. That would mean that for forty years we are to have an additional million of debt, supposing these Consols are taken up. Then, section 7 provides that the deposits shall be paid into the Public Account, and form part of the Consolidated Fund of the colony. But, to my mind, the worst feature of the whole Bill is section 35, which provides that all these Consols may be converted into stock by order of the Governor in Council. That means that after this House has authorised the issue of the Consols, after the money has been paid into the Consolidated Fund, the Governor in Council may calmly add it to the debt of the colony and increase the debt by a million. Now, I say, if it is necessary in the best interests of the colony that we should go in for a loan of a million, it would be far better for the Colonial Treasurer to say so to the House, and let us vote the money with our eyes open. I for one do not approve of the proposals of this Bill. The Colonial Treasurer, in introducing the Bill, said that the amount raised under the Bill was to be judiciously applied in reducing the amount of the Treasury bills.

Mr. WARD.—No, I did not.

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—Well, that might be. I am aware I did not take the exact words of the Treasurer down at the time; but what he meant was that they were to be applied in redeeming Treasury bills in some way or other.

Mr. WARD.—No.

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—My memory may be incorrect, but I am fairly near the mark. When the Minister of Education came to speak he told us that the money was to be spent on reproductive works. Now, I say, if it is the intention of the Government to spend this money on reproductive works, or on any of the Bills that have been passed this session, that ought to have been stated in the Bill, and I believe the Bill would then receive very much more support when it comes to its second reading. If the money is to be applied in reducing the amount of Treasury bills, or in dealing with Treasury bills in any way, I expected the Colonial Treasurer would have said that he proposed to reduce the authority given him for the issue of Treasury bills by a proportionate amount; but I did not hear him say anything of the kind, and I am forced to the conclusion that this is simply a proposal to put this amount to the credit of the Consolidated Fund, and to treat it as other sums are treated that are placed there—that is, that it should be paid out in any way the Ministry may for the time being think necessary. Now, it seems to me that this has become a very serious matter. Supposing that the amounts we have authorised are continued for the next five years. We have for land for settlement a quarter of a million a year—that is a million and a quarter. We have the advances to settlers, which may mean a million and a half a year, making seven and a half millions.

4.0. Then, there are the Native lands and roads—half a million for five years, which is equal to two and a half millions; and to this has to be added the Consols—a million under the present Bill. That gives a total of twelve millions and a quarter in five years; and, if we take interest on this amount at even 3½ per cent., it means an annual charge of £428,750 over our present amount. We have also a contingent liability of two millions Bank of New Zealand guarantee, so that our indebtedness in five years, if we continue at the present proposed rate, will be increased by fourteen and a quarter millions. I do not think I have given any specific pledge against borrowing, but the proposals of the Government are so startling, and of such a serious nature—and I believe will tend to the injury of the colony—that I felt it necessary to vote against the Bill last night. I did so because I believed it to be in the best interests of the colony. The Minister of Education, in speaking on this Bill, talked about fidelity and loyalty; but I conceive that the first duty of members of this House is to be faithful and loyal to the trust that has been reposed in them; that our first consideration is to be faithful to the trust that our constituents have reposed in us; and after we have discharged our duty in the best interests of the colony, then we should study the honourable gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches. First of all, I consider that our duty is to the colony, and, believing, as I do, that this Bill will work injury to the colony, and is not in the interests of the colony, I shall vote against the second reading.

Mr. THOMPSON.—I would not have risen to say a word on this Bill if it had not been that I consider my duty to those who sent me here requires that I should not give a silent vote upon it. It is useless to take up the time of the House in debating the question as to whether this is a borrowing Bill or not. It is a borrowing Bill, and one of the worst description, in so far as it is not borrowing for any specific purpose. I do not object to the Government raising money in the colony in Consols if the Government make proposals in the Bill that the money shall be used for some specific purpose. I do not object to the mode of raising the money; but what I do object to is that the Government should call upon members of this House to give their authority to raise a million of money without telling us what that money is being raised for. So far as I am personally concerned, I am not going to discuss the merits of the Bill, as it has been very well discussed already; but I wish to tell the House and the Government the position I intend to take up in giving my vote upon it. I object entirely to clause 7 and clause 35; but I shall wait and hear what statement the Colonial Treasurer will make in reply as to what alterations he intends to propose in those clauses in Committee. If his explanation is satisfactory to me, then I shall vote accordingly; and I shall certainly not give my support to a measure of this kind, or to any other similar measure, unless I know distinctly how the money is to be used. This policy, to my mind, looks something very like the plunging policy of a reckless gambler who has lost all sense of responsibility, and who is prepared to plunge headlong in some direction or another, knowing not where he is going to bring up. The last speaker observed very truly that the first duty of every member of this House is to those who sent him here, and to the colony generally; and I do feel certain that in dealing with a measure like this our first duty is to consider the effect of this policy on the well-being of the colony, before we decide on giving our votes. That is the first consideration by which we should be influenced. I am not pledged in any way either for borrowing or against it. My constituents sent me here to vote as I think best in the interest of the colony, and I am allowed the free use of my own judgment on each question that comes before the House. I have no desire to do anything to place the Government in an embarrassing position, but the Ministry must understand distinctly that I have come here to do my duty so far as I am able to those who sent me here, and to the colony, and, if the Government bring down measures that I believe are likely to lead to disaster or ruin, then they must expect my opposition to those measures. However, I shall reserve my right to decide how I shall vote on the second reading until I have heard if the Colonial Treasurer intends to make any satisfactory reply in reference to the clauses I have mentioned; and, if he is able to tell the House that he will, when the Bill goes into Committee, bring down a clause dealing with moneys proposed to be raised, and their control and management, so far as I am concerned I shall not oppose the Bill, but unless that is done the honourable gentleman cannot expect my support.

Mr. WILSON.—I should not have risen to say a word on this Bill had it not been for the extraordinary spectacle presented to the House of three Ministers making three different statements as to what was to be done with this money when it was received. Such an extraordinary spectacle used not to take place, and I confess it would have been considered an extraordinary thing in the past if it had been thought possible for the members of a Ministry to come down to the House and give us views not similar to those of each other on such an important subject. First of all, we had the Colonial Treasurer telling us in a very jaunty style that honourable members would like to know what he was going to do with the money. I for one listened very carefully to hear what was going to be done with it; and he said honourable members would not be averse to the Government taking up Treasury bills. That was the sort of answer we got. We thought that was only one answer to the Bill, and I expected a number of others, but nothing more was given as to what he was going to do with it. After the Colonial Treasurer came the Premier, whose speech was no doubt drawn by the senior member for Wellington City. The Premier said, on the other hand, that it was not at all necessary to invest this money in Treasury bills. Then, we had some more curious statements from the Minister of Education after the eleven-o'clock adjournment the other night. No doubt the Government had had considerable warning from their supporters; and the Minister of Education said—I will give his own words: "Honourable members know perfectly well that the Government require this money for other measures which we are bringing down." And, so far, this was the very first intimation we had of what the Government were going to do with this money in relation to the other financial measures they are bringing in. I suppose during the half-hour's adjournment the Government found that their supporters were not such fools as they had taken them for, and no doubt the Premier intimated to the Minister of Education that he must get up and tell the House a little more of what the Government were going to do with the money. I expect what will probably be done will be that a member of the House, such as the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Pinkerton), will be put up to move some amendment, giving one the idea that the Government have had nothing to do with it. The Government will then say that they have considered the matter, and will accept the amendment, and we shall have the whole Bill completely altered in the direction that the Government supporters have indicated. The policy of the Government is not infrequently changed in this way. We have had two what might be called "wild-cat" proposals. I do not quite understand the meaning of the term; but I know what kite-flying is, and I would suggest that their proposals are more like kite-flying proposals. It seems to me, in fact, that the Minister is always flying some kite or another in order to get money out of the people, forgetting that we shall have to pay for it in the shape of increased taxation. I expect we shall find that when the Colonial Treasurer replies he will say that he proposes to alter this Bill considerably, and that he will tell us how he proposes to utilise the Consols, and that he will give us more definite information than the Minister of Education gave us. Probably he will tell us that this money will be used for the settlement of land, for the purchase of Native land, and for roading; and, if we had got that information in the first instance, probably some of us would not have objected so much to the Bill, because it might be advisable to borrow money judiciously for this purpose. As it was, the Bill came down with absolutely no information as to what necessity there was for the borrowing proposed. Those who are opposed to borrowing generally, except for specific purposes, cannot give that support to this proposal which probably the Treasurer expects. The other evening a question was asked by the honourable member for Timaru as to the stock quotations in London. Our 4-per-cents are quoted in London at 109, and yet the Treasurer proposes to float this stock in the colony at par. What does that mean? It simply means that we shall lose very considerably by it, and if we went to London we should perhaps get about 8 per cent. premium on the loan. In that case we should gain a premium of something like £30,000; but if the loan is floated in this colony we shall practically lose by that transaction £30,000. My own advice to the Government, which, of course, they will not take, is that it would be very much better for them to retire these wonderful Bills, every one of which shows such evidence of great want of care in their preparation. It is somewhat curious that the Premier adopts the old tactics that used to be pursued by the late Sir Harry Atkinson. When that honourable gentleman was at the head of affairs in this country it was usual for him to delay bringing down his most important measures until late in the session, believing that then he would be able practically to carry anything through the House. The present Premier has delayed bringing these Bills down, in the expectation that he will be able to carry them out just as he would like; but exactly the reverse of what was expected has happened. If he had brought down Bills earlier in the session his followers would have been new to the work, and would have given them unconditional support. Now they have found their feet, and the Government side has generally become disorganized, and the measures have not that hearty support which Government expect. Under the circumstances, it would be much better that the Government should take them back and read them during the recess. It is evident to me that they have not even read them. During the recess they can read them, and properly digest them, and bring them before the House next session prepared in a state that will be manifest to the House. Probably after what took place last night the Government have made some arrangement with members of their own party, and smoothed them over in regard to this Bill. I am certain, however, that the majority of the House are against it. It would be very much better if the Bill were not pressed forward, and if its consideration were delayed till next session.

Mr. COLLINS.—As one becomes more and more accustomed to the methods of parliamentary debate one ceases to experience that surprise which one felt in the earlier days of the session. One gets accustomed to the methods and to the tactics used by the Opposition—I do not mean by the organized Opposition, but by those who choose at any time to oppose any particular measure before the House. In this debate we have had a considerable amount of simulated sincerity upon the question and a great deal of assumed earnestness on the part of some members of this House. All this has been played off with some little effect—I do not say dramatic effect: the effect has not been very dramatic. In the early part of the debate we were supposed to be in accord with the policy enunciated in this Bill. We were told in vehement terms that we were prepared to violate one by one our election pledges—as a matter of fact I do not think our speeches were deemed of sufficient importance to send all through the country—but when we speak we are, at any rate, charged with attempting to evade, and even violate, distinct pledges made in our election speeches. I for one deny that upon any occasion this session I have in any way whatever come within a measurable distance of violating an election pledge. It may be, however, that in an election speech one spoke, and spoke strongly, against the policy pursued in the first place of carrying on public works by means of borrowed money, and in the second place of applying that money to public works of a speculative character. That policy has been condemned, and I undertake to say that policy will continue to be condemned. I deny, in spite of the undignified laughter of the senior member for Wellington City, that this comes within measurable distance of a loan; I mean, within measurable distance of a loan on the foreign market for purposes of public works. We are getting used to that laughter, that sneer which covers so much; but it will have less effect the more of it we hear. I for one am quite convinced of this: that sneering laugh does not come with very good grace from one who has had such a long experience of political life, and one who is supposed to possess very great ability, and to be the embodiment of all the political virtues which this House possesses. I think he would be thought a great deal more of if he refrained from laughter of that kind when a younger member of this House rose in his place to address this Assembly. This Bill appears to me to be what it is assumed to be by those who have introduced it—namely, a Bill calculated to encourage colonial thrift, a Bill in every sense calculated to encourage the development of colonial thrift. If the Government of this country requires money—and money it must have—I quite conceive that it can obtain that money from no better quarter than from the people of this country; and I will maintain that, being the first time a Colonial Consols Bill has been introduced into this House, it is the inauguration of a splendid departure from past policy. It is the inauguration of a new era—that when in the future moneys are required for public purposes they should be obtained from the people of this country. What does it mean? We have heard over and over again that we are paying annually to the foreign holders of our bonds some three millions of money. Let the members of this House conceive what it would mean if these moneys were disseminated among the bondholders of this colony. Let them but fancy three millions of money added to the amount circulating within the colony! What would it mean? It would mean freer finances, encouraged commerce, such as would insure remarkable prosperity; and I say we shall not know the country as we know it now if we once inaugurate such a condition of affairs. It has been said over and over again that this means of raising money is really tantamount to a foreign loan. We have been told by the Opposition themselves that this money will really be subscribed in the London market. What does that mean? A few weeks ago it was repeatedly affirmed that money was being drained from this country; it was said that we could not get people to invest their money in this country; and now, because we offer a loan at 4 per cent., we are told that we are to get the money from the very quarter and from the very people that had so distinctly declined to invest their moneys with us. Then, Sir, for a moment I must refer to observations made by the middle member for Christchurch City. He said he had never thought it was the duty of the Government to find for capitalists an outlet for their money; but if the Government of this country can find capitalists—large and small capitalists—an outlet within this country, surely it is better that they should have that investment in the colony itself than that they should have to look for investment elsewhere. But I conceive it is essentially the duty of this Government to, if it is possible, find an outlet and fair means of investment for all moneys within this colony, and if this Bill comes within measurable distance of accomplishing that effect it will afford a lasting benefit to this colony. The honourable member said it would mean an increased liability of £40,000 per annum, which he said would have to be met by increased taxation.

Not necessarily so. If the utilisation of this money can be made to enhance our commercial prosperity, to enhance the financial condition of this country, then, it appears to me, the very increase of our commercial prosperity may render it totally unnecessary that that amount shall have to be raised by additional taxation. But all the opposition to this measure is really levelled at the present Administration, and the Opposition hope that they may weaken the present Government by luring some members from this side, and, if they cannot lure them, then that they may bluster them into opposing the present measure. Now, I believe that all these suggestions that have been thrown out, and which the Opposition has so vehemently put forth, really spring from more than a half-suspicion that the policy enunciated by the Government is likely to be pre-eminently successful, and they are afraid of that success. They see the Government formulating a policy which is destined to insure the progress of this country to such an extent as to give them, I will not say a renewed lease of political life, but an unlimited lease of political life. The Opposition see the time when they shall gain accession to those benches fading further and further into the dim distances of political futurity, and they are afraid these measures will mean solidarity, that they will mean prosperity, and that they will mean substantial progress; and that is the reason why they are so earnest in their denunciation, and so desirous of luring members from this side of the House to their own.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—The honourable gentleman who has just sat down commenced by speaking of the tactics of the Opposition, and said their assumed earnestness was almost dramatic. That is where the difference between the Opposition and the honourable gentleman comes in, for his earnestness, whether it is assumed or genuine, is simply comic. Sir, he went on to say that as it is not a loan from the foreign market it is not borrowing.

Mr. COLLINS.—I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—What did you say?

Mr. COLLINS.—You did not pay attention.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—Under the circumstances I shall stand by my statement. When an honourable member is accused of misquoting another, and is only twitted in reply when requesting to be supplied with the correct statement, under such circumstances he has a right to stand by his statement. This assertion was not only made by the honourable gentleman, but it has been implied by a great number of members who have spoken on this question, both directly and indirectly. The honourable member for New Plymouth says, "It is true." That is an evidence of the correctness of my statement. Well, Sir, I deny it. I say, no matter where or how the Government raise money, that is a loan. It may be better to raise it in the colony than in England, or it may not,—that is a question of opinion,—but the fact remains that, from whatever source the Government get moneys that have to be repaid, that is a loan. It has to be paid back, no matter where the money is obtained; and there are only two sources from which the State gets revenue—land-sales and taxation. Now, Sir, from that point of view, whether it is a good thing or not, whether it is a necessity or not for the Government to raise this loan, I shall oppose it. I only regret that the other night I did not feel well enough to stay in the House for a division on the cheap-money scheme, or I should have forced it to a division. I left my pair against the Government.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It would have made no difference.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—No; it would have made no difference. I have yet to learn, however, that right is always on the side of numbers. In fact, the history of our Anglo-Saxon race has been that all that has been right has sprung first from the minority; and, though the Government may, by whipping their members, and by one process or another, get them to swallow their hustings speeches and their hustings pledges, and get overwhelming majorities in their favour, it does not at all follow that the Government or those honourable members are right, or that the constituencies will justify them for the votes they have given in this House. The honourable member for Christchurch City also said that this is a Bill calculated to encourage thrift on the part of the people. He ought to encourage thrift on the part of the Government. I do not think the Bill will do so. The more one gets into debt the worse one is. Then, take the question of thrift as applied to the working-

4.30. classes. At the present time the working-classes can get 4 per cent. on their investments in the Post Office up to a reasonable sum—£200, I think it is, and 3½ per cent. to £500. And this, I say, guards the working-man to a very fair extent for what may be termed household thrift—that is, thrift from wages. When he gets beyond that point it is better for him, and for the colony, that he should invest his surplus moneys over that in advancing the industries of the country, and trade of one class or another. Therefore, from the working-man's point of view, I fail to see where the encouragement of thrift comes in. Then, he said it was a good thing for the Government to find cash for the working-men of this colony as well as for settlers. I think it is good, too, that the Government should always so carry out the enactment and administration of the law that it should be to the advantage not only of the working-classes, but of those embarked in trade or industry: if they do that it will be a good thing. But to argue that it is a good thing for the Government to put up a million of colonial Consols simply that the capitalists of New Zealand may keep their money bringing in interest—simply to absorb their money—is not a wise thing on the part of the Government. It would be far better to keep it free, so that they may be forced to the position of more rapidly using their money; because, if they can get 4 per cent. interest upon dormant capital, and which will only require $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. loss to melt down into cash, there is no doubt they will keep their money back longer from what may be termed the precarious industries than they do at present. I have only one other remark to make about the honourable gentleman, and then I have done. He says all this opposition is levelled at the present Administration. I deny it. There were members of the Government party—I do not speak of myself, because I suppose they do not look upon me as a Government supporter; and I am bound to say, in face of the financial policy proposals put before us, I do not regard myself as a supporter of the present Government. I wish to say that outright, so that there may be no misunderstanding. I shall be able to make my position clear when I meet my constituents, but I do not wish to be further misunderstood in the House, and I say, now the Government's financial proposals are before the House, I differ from them in toto; therefore I am not a supporter of the present Government. I believe a man should always have the courage of his convictions, and neither for party purposes nor for his own purposes should he refuse to give full and fair expression to the views he holds. As to the remarks made about Liberals, there went into the "Noes" lobby last night just as sound supporters of the present Administration as went into the other lobby. I need not refer to names. What is more than that, men voted against this measure who have been as great Liberals, and have done as much for the Liberal cause in New Zealand, as any man that voted for the Bill. So that, as to the question of attacking the Liberal party, this is no such thing; it is a question of whether we are again to go in for a borrowing policy, or to carry out in the main that which was the central plank of the Liberal policy in 1890, when we came into this House led by the late Mr. Ballance—that we should be a self-reliant, non-borrowing party. It was on this cry that we won, and at the elections of 1890 the bulk of the members returned to the House were pledged to a non-borrowing policy. Now, such is the demoralisation of this House that it comes within the compass of the Colonial Treasurer to get up and, in his few remarks on the policy of borrowing a million, state coolly his idea that half an hour is quite ample to discuss and deal with this measure. I will quote from the Government organ, so that the honourable gentleman will see I am not misrepresenting him: "The Bill would not occupy more than half an hour." There was a time in New Zealand when the borrowing of millions was carried on on a large scale, but I do not think any one who reads the past history of warfare in this House over the public-works proposals of Sir Julius Vogel, and the raising of money from time to time, will find that there has ever been a Parliament that dealt in so lax a manner with the raising of millions, and the pledging of millions more that will have to be raised, as the present Liberal party, and the Government who lead them. We appear to be enacting a sort of comedy. The Colonial Treasurer gets up and proposes this measure; he is replied to from the Opposition side, when the leader of the Opposition moves an amendment. After that we have the Minister of Education getting up and taking that as a want-of-confidence motion. They carried it, as they have done several times during the session, upon issues that conflicted, in my opinion, with the consciences of members, and with the pledges given to their constituents. They have on several occasions under this cry, and led by the party Whip, gone into the lobby when they knew very well they should have opposed the Government. And on this occasion so much have the minds of a large number of the supporters of the Government been disturbed over these proposals that a large deputation has waited upon the Colonial Treasurer, and a sort of caucus has been held, with the result that the Treasurer has had to give way, and the Government are going to climb down on this measure, and shift from the grounds on which they brought in the Bill. I hope, if this is not correct, the Treasurer will distinctly deal with this position when he comes to reply. The Minister of Education, in speaking, did not do justice to himself; it appeared to me to be one of the poorest speeches he ever made. He made one or two very curious statements, and as I will read from the Government organ he will see my statement is correct: "If this Bill were not passed it would not make the least difference in the amount of money to be raised." If this is true, why did the Government make it a question of no confidence? If the finance of the Government is not going to be jeopardized, if this is not going to upset the finances at all, why treat it as a question of no confidence? The reply is obvious: that so much are this measure and the whole policy of the finance of the Government distasteful to members, and not in accordance with their views, that Ministers were afraid to go to the straight issue on the second reading, whether it was to be thrown back on their hands or not, and were only too glad to take up the position of making it a no-confidence question, so that they could whip their supporters into the lobby to support the second reading. The honourable gentleman went on to say, "The raising of money to spend on reproductive works within the colony was a good thing." I do not know that the question of expending has anything at all to do with the question of raising. Whether it is advisable to raise money to spend on reproductive works is one thing; but when it is said the raising of money by Consols to spend on reproductive works is a good way of raising the money, I fail to see where the logic comes in. However, no doubt this measure will, of course, in one way or another, be carried, to satisfy the Government. This is simply one phase of the whole new departure of the Government since we came to this House. There was not a member of this House who, when he came here in June, had any conception of the policy that has been unfolded day by day to us: and if the Government had found that, after scooping up all the sinking funds and conversions, they had come to the end of their tether, when they met us this session in this House they should have told us the position and unfolded their policy measures. But the members of the House should then have been sent back for a recess to meet their constituents and to explain the true financial position, to see whether they approved of these measures or not. There is not a member in the House who can really and truly say his constituency is in favour of these measures. And I am not going to be unfaithful to my pledges to my constituents—I am not going to plunge my constituency into such large borrowing proposals, till I have unfolded to them what I conceive these proposals to be, and got their opinion as to whether they are good for them or the country. If they tell me in unmistakable terms that they wish for the policy, it will be for me to consider whether I am prepared to support the proposals or retire from the arena. But until I have met my constituents and placed before them these measures I absolutely refuse to allow myself to be tied up to these proposals enunciated by the Government. What are the proposals? Let us look at some of them. What are the proposals for this year? A million and a half for loans to settlers, £250,000 lands for settlement, £250,000 for Native-land purchase, £250,000 for roads and bridges, a million for Consols: that makes £3,250,000; and then there come contingencies that we cannot ignore. Honourable members have all had placed in their pigeon-holes the report of the Midland Railway Committee, and have seen how the Premier is leading proposals that the sum of £618,000 shall be paid by the House to the Midland Railway Company to complete the line. Then, there is a contingent liability of two millions to the bank. And that business is not settled yet, and when we have done with the bank we shall find four millions of Government money in it. I regret that, instead of making this a contingent liability, the Government did not determine to put three millions cash into the bank, and have full participation in it, and not simply a contingent interest. This policy is not one that can stop at the end of the year. If the present Government remain on those benches till the end of our term—and there is every indication they will do so—they will carry this on for three years; and, even if they lose the confidence of the country and are ousted, no succeeding Government could at once shut down on these proposals. It would take at least two years for any other occupants of those Treasury benches to taper off and end the course entered into by these plungers. With all their boldness and pressure upon members the present position so frightens them that they dare not do what it is in their hearts to do—make the roads, the bridges, and Native-land-purchase proposals for the same term as the Land for Settlements loan policy—

a five-year currency also. But this will follow as a necessity. If you take these Bills for five years and the loans to settlers for five years you come up to a matter of £16,250,000 for five years' proposals. A million and a half for five years for advances to settlers is £7,500,000; £250,000 for five years for lands for settlement, £1,250,000; £500,000 for five years for Native lands and roads and bridges, £2,500,000. A million of Consols,—and, as this is really meant to wipe the slate of all Treasury bills, and powers still remain to recontract or issue fresh Treasury bills, we may put to this an additional million during the term of this Parliament. That makes £13,250,000. If you add to that £618,000 which, if the Premier can drag his forces into the lobby, he proposes to give to the Midland Railway, it makes £13,868,000. The Premier means to disavow the Nelson District from the main contract. In order to control the Canterbury vote the Government are determined to put their proposal through at all hazards. Then you have got the £2,000,000 contingent liability, which makes £15,868,000 of actual and contingent liabilities. We have got to explain our action in regard to this matter to our constituents. I say I absolutely decline to have anything to do with such proposals. I have had the honour to be returned twice to this House as a representative of labour—as a working-man. If I leave this House I go back to the same ranks I came from. My reading of history on this question shows me that every loan policy in the case of every nation has been disastrous to the working-men. I do not care whether you go to the war countries of Europe, or whether you go to England, or to the newer country of America, the same thing comes out—namely, just as you build up the national indebtedness, so must you necessarily have taxation imposed, and such taxation must come out of the bone and sinew—the working-men, the producers—of the country. Because I hold these views, I cannot support these proposals of the Government. I absolutely refuse to have anything more to do with them on these grounds—on their borrowing proposals. I say that their proposals put to the blush the proposals of Sir Julius Vogel. There is not an Anglo-Saxon country to-day which is plunging in the manner in which the present Government are plunging here. Who put them there? Was it not the working-man's vote of New Zealand? Is this the return for the trust reposed in them? Is this following out the proposals of the late John Ballance and the last Parliament? I say now, as I said at the time of his decease, that it was a national calamity to the working-men that that man died. I think so still. I have no faith, I have no trust, I do not believe in the honour of the men on those benches to stand by the interests of the working-men of New Zealand; and, because I hold these views, I shall oppose their proposals up to the hilt.

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—I am surprised at the statement made by the honourable gentleman who last addressed the House. He denounced the Government because they are endeavouring to raise money in the colony for colonial purposes. Why, the honourable gentleman himself, since this Parliament assembled, has brought forward, and if he could he would carry, proposals for Dunedin and Otago which would require a loan of half a million. The honourable gentleman is one of the advocates for the completion of the Otago Central line. An honourable gentleman asks, "What has that to do with it?"

Sir R. STOUT.—I did not say that.

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—Well, he was making such a noise and rattle behind me I thought that was what he said. The honourable gentleman considers that work the most important in the colony. I ask him, if he has the brain-power which he ought to have, to say how that line can be constructed, or other public works of that magnitude be made, unless the Government raise moneys by loan or otherwise? So far as this particular Bill is concerned, I am going to support it, and to support the Government in carrying out their proposal. Because, first, it is a policy Bill, and next because—why should not New Zealand issue Consols such as they have in other countries? In those countries Consols are issued in which people can invest their money. There are hundreds and thousands of people in the world who would make use of such a system for investing their money. There is many a man who, wishing to provide for his children, desires to make a safe investment, to place his money beyond the risk or responsibility in connection with banks or building societies, or the dishonesty of a private trustee, or bad judgment in making investments. Now, this proposal opens up an avenue for such investments, and I believe, if this Bill is carried, the Government will have no difficulty in raising a million of money in the colony in order to carry this proposal out to its completion. A great deal has been said about the Government proposals,—about their going in for twelve, fifteen, or even twenty millions of money. I say the Government, in a country like New Zealand, will be called upon in the next few years not only to go in for a million or fifteen millions, but to go in for thirty or forty millions.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—Yes, thirty or forty millions, if they are to carry out all that is asked of them by members of this House. Deputations from Auckland and Dunedin and all parts of the colony have asked, for instance, for the consolidation of our local loans. I for one have been urging upon the colony to go in for the consolidation of local loans. I was one of those who appealed to the Government to take up the important question of consolidating our harbour loans. How can the Government make roads and railways, and open up the country, purchase Native land, and do other public works unless they have money? And how can the Government get money unless they raise the money, in this way? A large number of Government supporters objected to these proposals because the money was to be paid into the Consolidated Fund. What they want is for the Government to define how they are going to use the money. A large number of honourable gentlemen have asked the Government to take a portion of the consolidated revenue for hospitals and charitable aid. If there are no funds going into the Consolidated Fund, only the Customs and ordinary revenue, how can the Government carry out their policy? The great drawback of democracy is this: We speak on the floor of this House of the triumph of the democracy, of the grand triumph of labour being represented here; but the democracy has failed in one point, because it is afraid to trust the democracy; it is afraid to trust the Government which has been elected by the people. It is a weak point in the links of the chain when we find men who have been returned to this House as the direct representatives of labour denouncing the Government and the Government policy, and denouncing everything which would be in the interests of the settler. I know hundreds of men who are on small sections of land, on fifty, a hundred, or two hundred acres of land—sober, industrious, hard-working men, men who get up at dawn of day and who work till dark: these men are worthy of some consideration, and it is by these policy Bills that the Government will be able to extend a helping hand to these men. It has been said in this debate that the Liberal party proclaimed from the public platforms that they were going in for a non-borrowing policy. And they have kept their pledge faithfully. They stated that they would carry out that policy until they had placed the finances of the colony on a sound footing. I maintain that the Government have placed the finances of the colony on a sound footing. We have come down ever since we have been in power with a surplus. We have been able to convert our national debt, and I unhesitatingly say that, if a direct loan was placed on the English market of ten millions at the present time, it would be doubly and trebly subscribed. That would be a fair test of how we stand in the Home market. The quarter of a million for the purchase of Native land in the North Island will easily be expended. I know Natives who have been waiting for years for the Government to purchase their land. We should have in Taranaki an officer of the Land Purchase Department under the control of the Land Board; and I hope the Minister will make provision before the closing of this session for the carrying-out of my suggestion. That officer would be able to purchase thousands of acres of land from the Natives during the next twelve months, and splendid land too, where there are roads and rivers. Then we shall have such progress as we ought to have. I think the Consols will be largely taken up by trustees and others who wish perfectly safe investments. When the Colonial Treasurer is replying I am sure he will convince and satisfy the House with reference to what he is going to do with the money. It is on these lines that I shall support the Government, believing as I do that from 1890 every Bill which they have brought in has been in the interests of the country—not in the interests of the classes, but in the interests of the masses. No Government has done so much for the industrial classes, no Government has done so much for the working-men of New Zealand, and no Government has endeavoured to do so much for them. Since I landed in this colony thirty-five years ago I have watched the progress of New Zealand. I have studied its politics. I know what was done by the Continuous Ministry, and by the remnants of that party who are now represented in such small numbers on the Opposition benches.

50. I know we have none of those large land jobs which we used to have. We have now the national estate cut up into small and reasonable areas, and where before one person had the chance of getting land, three hundred or five hundred people have the chance now. A man with very little cash is now afforded the opportunity of taking up land equally with the man who has great resources in the bank and could get large overdrafts; and, Sir, when I study and carefully weigh over what is being done, to find out how the colony is progressing from year to year, how the land is being settled, how roads are being opened up, and how peaceably the people are going on, I say it is, for me, an object-lesson and a guiding star not to desert the Government, but to freely lend them all the support I can with a view to keeping them in power. And I say this: They have a right to get this support from their party when those honourable gentlemen upon the other side are trying to destroy and detract from the merits of the Government, and when they are trying to depreciate the policy Bills of the Government in order that they may destroy the Government. What is the great object and aim of the Opposition, both of the past and present? It is a part of their functions to try and show that the Government is doing that which is wicked and which will destroy the interests of the people of the colony. What for? Is it because they think that if they were able to change from that side of the House to this side to-morrow they would be in a position to bring down more sound policy Bills, or Bills that would be more in the interest of what should be national progress? Not at all. It is a question with them of the ins and the outs; it is not a question of what are the wants of the community. Now, what I do maintain is this: that, in spite of the weaknesses or defects in the Government proposals, there has not been one measure brought into the House in which has not been displayed an anxious desire on the part of the Government to do the best they can for all classes of the community, and especially the industrial class, especially the settlers who are going on the land. And while I know that, and while I am watching them very carefully, and while I see they are prepared to amend clauses in their Bills where necessary, and are prepared to be guided by their supporters in amending clauses in order to strengthen this measure, in order to make it secure, in order to give proper safeguards to the people of the colony,—when, Sir, I feel that the Government are acting in that manner, and are willing to meet us in that way, I say it is our bounden duty to surround them, to rally round them, and keep the small minority of an Opposition from out-flanking them, from getting a snatch vote in order that they may be able to say, “The Government is defeated by a majority in the House.” Sir, I say I look upon these Government policy Bills, as I have said over and over again, as being in the interests of the people; and I am sorry to hear honourable gentlemen who claim to be Liberals saying they will not support the Government, and that they are prepared to go back to their constituents to-morrow. I only wish they had the opportunity of going back to their constituents to-morrow. I prophesied at the last election where some of those honourable gentlemen would be, and my prophecy came true. I prophesy now, concerning some of those gentlemen, that if a dissolution took place to-morrow, and they went back to their constituents, this would happen: that some of them would not return again. When we contested the election in the interests of the working-men in 1890 we said we were going to support the Liberal Government—that we were going to support them because they were endeavouring to do the very best they could for the working-classes; and this is the only Government that has ever legislated in the interests of the working-men; and, Sir, when at the last election they were going on the same lines that they have since taken, and which they had advocated before, it was the working-men who put them in. Now we are asked to go back to these working-men and ask whether they are going to be finoodled. They would find they are not, and would find themselves relegated to an outside ticket. There is no doubt of it. Let the experiment be tried, and we shall find some other honourable gentlemen sitting in those seats instead of my honourable friends. This is now the 20th of September, and there is still a large amount of business to get through, and I shall therefore make my remarks very brief. But I do ask the Liberal party to remember it was returned at the last general election to support the Government, to carefully watch the Opposition, to carefully watch their tactics, and not, in a weak moment, to allow the Government to be defeated by these side-issues. If the Opposition want to prove the strength of the Government, why did they not come down with a bold no-confidence motion in the early part of the session? No, they would not do that. They had not pluck enough to do that, because they knew it would be like the fly trying to attack the elephant, which would flick it away and say, “Get away to destruction.” That would have been the effect. What they do is to bring in amendments which are really an indirect way of seeking to pass a vote of censure on the Government. Well, they have sought to get a vote of no confidence in the Government passed; and what do they find was the result? They found out last night when the division was taken. What was the result? Thirty-eight to sixteen. That was the result; and I think that is a good indication of the position which the Government holds in this House. Sir, I feel convinced that it is a great grievance with the Opposition, and the reason why they are so infernally wild is that they are sorry the Government is going in for this great policy; because they know that, if the Government can only purchase two hundred and fifty thousand pounds' worth of land in the North Island, if the Government spend money on the purchase of Native lands, if they spend £250,000 on roads and bridges, and keep on placing the people on the land, they are safe and sound, as far as the taxpayers of this colony are concerned, for the next twenty years,—and that is where the wrath comes in. Why, I heard a prominent member of the Opposition—he is now in another place—talking the other day, and I overheard him say, "If the Government can only get this policy affirmed they will be safe for the next twenty years." That is what they believe; there is no doubt about it. We are going on splendidly, and if we only go in the way we are going now we shall have what this great country wants—peace, progress, and prosperity; and in order to attain that, and to bring it about, I am going to support the Government in this Bill.

Mr. MORRISON.—Sir, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House very long in discussing the measure before us. I am going to support it, although I shall try to have it amended in certain directions in Committee—with regard to this clause 35, and perhaps one or two others. But, still, I think this Bill will commend itself to the country, and acting on that belief I rise here for the purpose of explaining to the House in a few words the reason why I support it. Of my own personal knowledge I know there is a considerable amount of money in this country that is awaiting development, that is awaiting investment, but that in the meantime is locked up, for the people who own it will not invest in financial institutions: they will not invest in banks; and I am sure we can scarcely blame them. And, knowing that, what, then, these people have to be provided with is a good investment for their money. I am well pleased to see this Government is attempting, by introducing this Consols Bill, to afford an outlet for these people's money. Of course, although this Bill gives authority to raise a million in Consols, it does not necessarily follow that a million of Consols is to be subscribed in the colony at once,—that this million is going to be raised in a few months, or the next year or two. In fact, my own individual opinion is that if this Government manages to get a matter of £250,000, or at the most £500,000, of New Zealand money invested in Consols within the next twelve months it will have done very good work. Now, I am inclined to object to one or two remarks that fell from some of the speakers this afternoon, and in the first place I should like just to give a running commentary on some of the statements that fell from the honourable member for the City of Dunedin (Mr. Earnshaw). The honourable gentleman introduced himself in a very happy manner, and taunted the honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Collins) with introducing what may be termed the comedy element. And, of course, seeing that he taunted the honourable gentleman with introducing the comedy element, it necessarily follows that the honourable members who may criticize him must be introducing what may be termed the dramatic element. Now, I know that earnestness, or tragedy, is not a characteristic of the honourable gentleman who was criticizing the honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. Collins). I know perfectly well that this principle that we are now discussing is not a large one, but from the very moment this session opened the honourable member (Mr. Earnshaw) has simply been posing not only before the eyes of the House, but also before the eyes of his constituents, with regard to the position he has taken up on this measure, and in various other directions. So I think it comes with very bad grace from him to taunt other honourable gentlemen in this House with enacting a part in light comedy or in any other form. Another statement the honourable gentleman made was that this measure would satisfy the Government. In my opinion, Sir, it will satisfy the people as well; it will satisfy the people of this colony; and so convinced am I of this that, if this Consols Bill were placed before the country at the present time, and an election taken upon it, I am perfectly certain that the people of the colony would indorse the measures the Government have brought down during the present session, and send them back reinforced—at least, would send back their old supporters. Some of the honourable gentlemen who are consistently and persistently opposing the Government measures have certainly not been actuated in all cases by a sense of what their constituents required. I think there is a large amount of what may be termed the personal element introduced into these matters, and, if I may be allowed to use a phrase which was used the other evening, I would say that some men are Liberals for what they can get out of Liberalism; and I am inclined to think a large number of the criticisms which we have heard here in this House have simply emanated from those who may be termed opportunist politicians. I am no opportunist politician who merely sticks to Liberalism for what he can get out of it. I have never denied nor disputed the fact that I am a worker, and that I have come out of the ranks of the workers, and I can go back to their ranks to-morrow if necessary. When I was returned at the last general election I told the electors that I had several planks in my platform, which I enumerated, and I said to them, "If you do not like them, do not vote for me." But there are other members who have been trying to sit between two stools, and then, once they are returned, they define the stool they are going to sit upon. The honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw) also said that might is not right, and that it did not necessarily follow the measures they brought down were right simply because the Government had a majority at their back. I wonder what would have been thought of the honourable gentleman if he had stood up in Dunedin a month before the election and talked in this manner; and, if he had made statements of this description, what chance would he have had of election? Was not might right there? The people, by a majority, returned the larger proportion of members of this House pledged to support the Liberal Government. They were the majority, and by the majority they were certainly right. Now we find the very honourable gentlemen who are returned by majorities—by the law of majority—turning round and saying that the majority is not right. Well, it does not necessarily follow that majorities are always right. I do not think the majority was right when they returned the honourable gentleman who made that remark. Now, there is another statement that has been made, and this statement emanated from the Opposition side of the House—that the three Ministers who spoke here last night differed in telling the same story. Well, I did not pay very particular attention to the account the Ministers were giving, because I think the Ministers can take very good care of themselves; but I am going to pay particular attention to some of the stories that have been told by honourable gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House, and by some of the honourable gentlemen who should be sitting along with them. Now, no two of them agree with regard to their interpretation of the effect of these measures. The honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. G. J. Smith) stated that the Government measures submitted and those they were going to bring down—the measures referred to in the Budget—were going to pledge this colony to borrow to the extent of upwards of £14,000,000. We had also a statement from the representative of Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw) to the effect that it was upwards of £18,000,000, and that honourable gentleman had carefully prepared tables, and I have no doubt he took great care to compile them, and to see that his figures were properly placed before he read them out; so that there is only a difference of £4,000,000 between the figures of what I may term the right and left wings of the middle party, though I dare say their sources of information were the same, if traced to the fountain-head. It seems to me, therefore, that, if we can make mistakes on this side of the House,—which I do not admit,—the members of the Opposition, and those who have criticized this measure, cannot say that they do not play the same tune. Now, with regard to this £18,000,000 and £14,000,000,—I am not going to attempt to dispute the figures, for I think it would be absurd to take them in earnest and to discuss them,—but those gentlemen who have between them a difference of four millions have not said a single word about the assets the colony is going to acquire by the expenditure of the money. There is a million and a half a year to be lent to settlers of the colony on freehold and leasehold property, and they say that will amount in five years to seven and a half millions; and yet we are not, according to what has been said, to have one shilling's worth of property to represent that seven and a half millions invested in mortgages in the colony! If there are mortgages there must be assets; and yet you are to have no assets! I think it is the height of absurdity to try to follow those honourable gentlemen, owing to the illogical position they take up. There was also a very flattering remark made by an honourable gentleman on the Opposition side of the House: in fact, when he made it I felt amused, for the first time during the course of the debate. I refer to the remark of the honourable member for Otaki. He said that the Ministers were taking a leaf out of the late Sir Harry Atkinson's book, and that Sir Harry Atkinson, as a rule, kept back his policy measures to the last week, or to the end, of the session, and then drove them through the House with the iron heel of his majority. Now, the honourable gentleman who said that belongs to the party who have lauded Sir Harry Atkinson to the skies, and who was a consistent supporter of Sir Harry Atkinson. I think it says very little for the honourable gentleman to try to traduce the memory of his late leader by using an argument of that description. I can assure the honourable gentleman that, if that was Sir Harry Atkinson's style, it is not, so far as I know, the style of the honourable gentlemen who now preside over these benches: at least, it is not, so far as anything that has yet come to my knowledge. They have not driven us, or used the iron heel of a majority: in fact, though I have heard a good deal about being driven into the lobby by the Whips, there has been nothing of the kind. If there has been anything approaching it, it has been the counting of noses by the other side of the House to see how many members they were likely to carry away from this disorganized right wing—how many have broken away.

MR. MORRISON.—Left or right is immaterial, it is not of much account; it is in the centre where the pressure comes. I can assure the House there has been no pressure brought to bear on this side of the House. I only wish further to impress upon members the necessity of carefully considering the proposals that have been submitted by Ministers. Although they may not agree with them entirely, they must remember this: that a large number of the objections that have been raised during the course of the debate are simply Committee objections, and those objections can be met in Committee, as I have no doubt they will be, for I have never known the Colonial Treasurer or any of the Ministers take up an antagonistic position in Committee and say that they would not allow their Bills to be amended. To say, as has been said, that the Ministry is going in entirely for a borrowing policy is certainly incorrect and misleading, because, as I have said before, this certainly is not borrowing. I said that in the course of my remarks in the financial debate, and I do not want to go over the same ground again. I say that the money that is invested in land, and the money that is lent out to settlers, is not borrowing; it is simply that the Government is guaranteeing to the money-lender that his interest will be paid, in order that money may be provided for the settlers at a greatly-reduced rate of interest. And why should we not? I know that our settlers, in the past, have paid 10 and 12 per cent. and upwards, and that the last drop has been taken out of them. I know a man who made an application to a financial institution in Dunedin within the last few years, and a valuer was sent out to value the property, and for that valuation £5 5s. was charged, although the train-fare would not be more than half a sovereign, and the valuer could go to the farm, value it, and return to town the same afternoon. Then, any one who has been in the lawyers' hands knows what a serious item the solicitors' expenses are, and if you take that item, and the valuers' fees, you will find that the borrower always has to pay 10 or 12 per cent., or more. Under the new system a settler will receive his money at 5 per cent., and the expenses of lodging the application and procuring the necessary mortgage-bonds are very small; and on that account alone the measure, I think, should commend itself to any business-man, or to any man with a practical knowledge of the subject. I will not detain the House longer, but will simply say that I intend to support the Bill.

Mr. MASSEY.—This Bill is so important that I hardly care about giving a silent vote upon its second reading. I shall occupy the House only a very few minutes in expressing my opinion upon the principle which it contains. I think, Sir, it has been generally admitted that this is a Bill to enable the Government to borrow a million within the colony at 4 per cent. per annum. There is no doubt about that. According to the Bill, this money will be paid into the Consolidated Fund whenever it is received; but it does not tell us what is the object for which this money is to be borrowed. Now, I feel that, as members of this House and representatives of the people, we have a right to know in what direction this money is going to be used. I for one must most emphatically protest against a Ministry being given a million of money to do what they like with. The whole policy of the Government seems to be one of borrow, borrow—continual borrowing. The Colonial Treasurer is evidently of opinion that the only way to make the colony prosperous is to borrow as much as ever he can, and as often as ever he can. Whatever may be said to the contrary, there is not the slightest doubt that the public debt of the colony will be increased by the amount of money which we are able to raise in the way of Consols, and that there will be another £40,000 or £50,000 a year to be screwed out of the taxpayer on account of interest. Sir, when the history of this colony comes to be written the great Liberal party, of which we have heard so much this afternoon—the Great Liberal Party, written in large capitals—will be known as the great borrowing party, the party who are liberal with other people's money. Sir, the Premier told us last night, in speaking to the Bill—and he told us it in that benevolent way which suits him so nicely and which we all know so well he assumes whenever he has a bad cause to defend—that the colony was poor because the people had no safe investments for their money. Sir, does he forget that we have banks guaranteed by the colony, numerous private savings-banks, and the Post-Office Saving-Bank, with branches in all directions? Sir, the fact is, the Government have made up their minds to have this money, and the Premier thinks a bad excuse is better than none. Then, he went on to tell us that the Government were not short of funds, and he went over a list of sums of money which he said they had in hand. But only two months ago, as every member of this House knows, he came down and told us that the exigencies of the Treasury required that the land-tax should be collected four months in advance. Sir, he forgets that members of this House, and the people of this colony, are able to draw their own conclusions from these facts. In common with many other members, I was returned to oppose a borrowing policy in every possible form, and I intend doing so, and consequently I intend to vote against the second reading of this Bill.

7.30. Mr. MILLAR.—Sir, I may say that I was rather surprised at the attitude taken up by the Opposition in regard to this matter. We were told by the Colonial Treasurer, in his opening remarks, that the money which is proposed to be borrowed here would be used for the purpose of reducing the number of Treasury bills. I have heard it stated on several occasions—and, in fact, I have heard the Colonial Treasurer condemned because of the fact—that he has depleted the Government Insurance Department and the Public Trust Office of their moneys for the purpose of Treasury bills. Now, under this scheme, it appears to me that the Treasurer proposes to go direct to the public and borrow money from them, for the purpose of enabling the Public Trust Office and Post Office to keep their moneys to invest in legitimate enterprises. Therefore, I say, it is inconsistent on the part of the Opposition to condemn the Colonial Treasurer for this proposal. I do not, personally, object very strongly to the Bill itself, but I do object to the time it is brought forward. At the present time, when we are, in my opinion, in the middle of a financial crisis, and when we know that in a day or two we shall be dealing with one of the most important matters we have ever had before this House, it is rather unfair, I think, for the Minister to ask us to pledge ourselves to a million of money for no particular purpose at all. I think the Government will study the interests of themselves and their supporters if they will allow these Bills to stand over until such time as we have dealt with the other matters. We have an unknown liability to face; and, when one comes to consider what we have done this session, I say it should cause us to pause and consider whether we ought to go on with any other proposals to incur further liabilities until we know exactly our position in regard to finance. What I want to know is, where do we stand at the present time? I, for one, confess I cannot see. I do not know how we are to come out of it all. I feel strongly on this matter, as I do not care about pledging myself to any measure which is going to increase the liabilities of the colony until I know where we are in regard to this most important question. Sir, the honourable member for Caversham, in his remarks, made a very wild assertion, which I feel myself called upon to repudiate. He stated that he was the only man who had had the pluck to stand up and say a certain thing and then come to the House and stick to it. I do not know what he particularly claims to have stuck to. I know that I laid my views before my constituents very clearly, and I have not yet been called to account for any action I have taken in this House; but I think the honourable member himself has. I can read plain English, and I have seen by some of the newspapers in the South that he has been severely condemned and called to account for certain action of his, in regard to breaches of pledges he had made. I do not know whether it is altogether plucky to do that sort of thing, and I, for one, am not going to do anything of that kind. I have pledged myself to a constituency against borrowing in the London market, and I intend to stick by that on all occasions. Although this is not directly borrowing in the London market, it is, to my mind, distinctly borrowing. But we are borrowing at the present time, and have authority under the Public Revenues Act to borrow, one million per annum for Treasury bills. I may be mistaken, but, according to the Colonial Treasurer's statement, he is going to use this money for the purpose of reducing or redeeming Treasury bills, as the case may be. I say most emphatically that when this Bill comes into Committee I shall, for one, endeavour to amend it so that the money may be tied down for some specified purpose. If it is to be for Treasury bills, I am quite prepared to support that, or if it is to be for any fixed and proper purpose I shall support it; but I do object to the money going into consolidated revenue for any use the Colonial Treasurer may desire. Another point I object to in regard to these loan measures is that power is taken to inscribe the loans. I have objected to that before, and I object to it again now. It is a fact that there is no security left when a man has redeemed his mortgage, and then the colony is pledged to a certain amount. When we have borrowed money for a specific purpose, and it has been paid back to us, we have no right to use it as ordinary revenue, but we should, as honest men, redeem the debentures that we have issued for this specific purpose. The honourable member for New Plymouth, in his remarks, said he believed we should be doing a good thing if we went in for a thirty- or forty-million loan; but, as we always take the honourable member's remarks on most matters with a grain of salt, I think we can take them in that way now. He should know that the borrowing of money means the payment of interest, and the payment of interest means the increase of taxation, and the working-man will have to pay it, as he has had to do in the past. Therefore I, for one, will strongly oppose any borrowing proposals that will result in an increase of taxation. I am free to admit that the Ministry would have done better if they had told us in plain English that we have come to that stage when we must either increase taxation or go in for more borrowing. I believe, myself, that we have come to that stage, and I am quite prepared to tell my constituents that that is the case, and I should like to have an opportunity of doing so before pledging myself to anything of this sort, on which they have had no opportunity of being consulted. The honourable member for New Plymouth went on to talk about the consolidation of Harbour Board loans, and the honourable member for Caversham indorsed what he said; and I think it would be one of the most statesman-like proposals that has ever been brought forward if all those loans were consolidated and taken over by the State. The benefit would be that, instead of paying 5 or 6 or 7 per cent., as the local bodies are doing now, they would only have to pay $4\frac{1}{2}$ or 5 per cent. This would be a direct saving to the colony, and would keep a large amount of money in the colony which at present goes out of it. Any one who condemns a proposal such as that is not, I maintain, working in the interests of the colony or in the interests of the taxpayers. I believe that in Committee this Bill will be amended very considerably, and I myself think it ought to be. The principle the Colonial Treasurer advances is a good one—namely, that there ought to be securities for people who have money to invest. It has been the existence of such a measure as this which has largely led to the welfare and prosperity of France. And, if we intend to prevent this money being mopped up by the syndicates which have been so strongly reflected upon by some honourable members, then, I think, we shall be doing well by adopting the French system of allocating these funds. In France, under such a system as this, the loan is advertised, and people send in applications for it on a certain day mentioned, and the Administration then proceed to allot those debentures to the persons who have applied for them, satisfying all the small men first—those who have applied for one or two or three. Then they give the balance of the loan to those who have applied for large sums. If such a system as this was adopted here I believe what the Colonial Treasurer has in view would be attained—namely, the creation of a large class of national bondholders. This has proved very beneficial where it has been tried, and I believe it would prove beneficial here now. It would have this effect, which some honourable members would be sorry to see at the present time: It would enable a person to take a five-pound note and buy these debentures. He could then, being a national creditor, claim to have a stake in the country, and that is what some honourable members condemn the absence of at the present time. I hope that when the Bill gets to Committee honourable members will deal with it as seriously as it deserves, because there is no doubt that it is highly important that we should consider what we are doing with all the money that is being asked for now by the Colonial Treasurer. I myself am perfectly prepared, if the Colonial Treasurer states that it is absolutely necessary that we should borrow money, to give this proposal my support; but I certainly desire to allow those who returned me here under a distinct pledge not to borrow to say whether, under the exceptional circumstances of the colony, we are justified in going in for a borrowing policy. I trust that, after the second reading of the Bill, if it is agreed to, the Treasurer will not carry it through Committee until such time as we have dealt with the proposals which the Government intend to bring forward in regard to banks, because, as far as I can see, we have up to the present pledged ourselves to the extent of two millions of money, and before we get out of this we may have to pledge ourselves to two or three millions more. If we are to take over the whole of the Assets Company, as, according to Mr. Murray, we seem to be going to do, who knows where we shall be? And I ask the Colonial Treasurer if he will, in his reply, state how we stand, and what is likely to be the outcome of this scheme. It is absolutely necessary, before the final consideration of this measure, that the Treasurer should say how the colony will stand with regard to its action in connection with the banks.

Mr. MORRISON.—I wish to make a personal explanation. The honourable member for Chalmers stated that some of my constituents had pulled me up with regard to certain pledges which, he says, I did not keep. I have to state that not one single elector in my district has made any objection or complaint to me in connection with any action I have taken in this House.

Mr. McLACHLAN.—I intend to support the second reading of this Bill, though I shall not confine myself to the Bill as drafted. I suppose this Bill is capable of amendment in Committee, as some honourable members say it deserves to be amended, just in the same way as other Bills have to be amended. There are many reasons why I support this Bill. It is to create a fund in which people having money to leave to their children can invest it safely. In England it is a fact that these sources of investment are filled up by people having money to leave in trust, and, although the rate of interest may be small, the investment is a certainty for all time. For this reason, I am prepared to support the creation of these Consols. I know that there are a great number of embryo Colonial Treasurers in this House who are prepared to teach the Colonial Treasurer a good deal more than he already knows about the finances of this country and the management of finance. I came here practically unpledged as to borrowing or no borrowing. I came here at the instance of my constituents to support the Government and their policy, and this is one of the principal planks in that policy; at any rate, I understand it to be so. I have a great deal more faith in the honourable gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches than in those who have seceded from the party and gone into opposition. Those who cavil at the Government pretend that the operations of the Post Office and other institutions are different from what is proposed under these Consols. But I do not think there can be much difference, further than that the field of operations is larger. I do not think that there is any more security in regard to the savings of the people in the Savings-Bank than under the Consols scheme. All I can do is to repeat to-night what has been said by a great many honourable members, who have repeated the speeches made on the Financial Statement. Therefore I do not intend to take up any more time, except to say that I shall support the second reading of the Bill, and do what I can to make any necessary amendments in it.

Mr. DUTHIE.—This subject has been so thoroughly debated by several able speakers that I shall make only a few remarks upon the Bill. The Bill is very important, in so far as it marks a distinctly fresh departure in borrowing, and I do not think I should be doing justice to myself if I did not give reasons for the vote I am about to record against the second reading. In the first place, in listening to the debate on the subject I was very much struck by one feature of the various speeches. It seems to me that honourable members are dealing with millions with the lightest hearts imaginable. We in this House are, as a body, poor men. I do not think there is any one in this House who can be considered wealthy, and many of us are more familiar with the value of shillings and even pence than of larger sums. But in the course of this debate honourable members have revelled in millions—in the contemplated expenditure of borrowed millions; but I think it would be well if they would cast their minds back and consider the true bearings of this financial proposal on the colony. I was not in the House when the Colonial Treasurer introduced the Bill, but I am informed that on that occasion he afforded but a very brief explanation as to the purposes for which this million of money is to be borrowed. Hitherto, when any Government have thought such a step as borrowing so large an amount as a million necessary, they have previously submitted a scheme of works, and placed fully before the House and the country the objects it was wanted for, in order that the House might be made acquainted with the intention, and express an opinion as to the proposed works, and decide whether the scheme was in the best interests of the colony. But here we have a proposal to borrow a million, and no object at all is stated to the House. It is simply borrowing at the sweet will of the Ministry of the day. Under these proposals larger sums of money are to be borrowed than this House would ever consent to in order to carry out any scheme of railways, because we know that further railways are not now wanted and, if built, would never pay; but, if the money is once borrowed and available, it will be found impossible to prevent useless works: there will be little restraint as to its expenditure. I repeat that the House ought to be very careful about this matter, and that the object of the loan should be put clearly before the House. Another feature that strikes me is this: Four years ago we made a great departure by extending the franchise to the "one man one vote," and under that extended franchise we had returned to this House a number of labour members to specially represent the labour interest. So far as New Zealand is concerned, she was, through this, an object of interest in the eyes of the world, if we may judge by the criticisms in the English and American Press. It was pointed out as one of the great features of this movement that the labour members of this Parliament, despite the depression, and despite the opportunities for employment a loan policy would afford, had firmly refused to plunge the country into debt. But the aspiration for self-reliance has been thrown overboard, and this departure is the beginning of unlimited borrowing. Strengthened as the labour party now is, it will be interesting to watch whether they will adhere to high principles, and will still abstain from plunging the country into debt. It has been pointed out by several speakers in the course of this debate that there has been nothing to justify the departure in the direction of this proposal. Prudence seems to have been thrown overboard, and we are now afflicted with an unlimited-borrowing mania. By the various Government proposals we are asked to agree to borrow twelve and a half millions. Never before has such a wild proposal been made; and I hope honourable members will look at the loss of proper control, withdrawn from the House by these proposals. I do not know whether it has struck honourable members what the full effect will be. We are already forty millions in debt. We have in this country but a very small population, and we have to send two millions out of it annually by way of interest on that borrowed money; and, if we are going to add the annual charge for interest arising on borrowing these enormous sums, amounting to something like half a million more, the country cannot bear it. True, part of these loans is to be invested on mortgage; but, if we are going to mortgage all our land to the British bondholder, and send away every half-year the rents as interest upon mortgages, it is practically sending away the lifeblood of the country, and the result will be that misery and distress will be the lot of our people. If we look back to four years ago, when the Atkinson Government restored the finances of the country, we find that they had to put on fresh taxation to the amount of some £120,000, and we know what disturbance that caused throughout the whole country; and, if we agree to these proposals and plunge further into debt, with attendant extra interest, it will result disastrously to this colony. The colony cannot afford further taxation without deep and lasting depression. All our products are falling in price, and the future is not bright. True, we can see some little hope of a small advance in the price of wool; but that is the exception, and I say this is not the time to plunge the country into fresh liabilities, and to put fresh taxation upon us. At the beginning of this session in all parts of the country men were unemployed, arising, for one cause, from the fact that, for the first time during the winter months, very little bushfelling is going on, to which people in this province have been before accustomed; and if we impose further taxation on these landowners and farmers—for, as has been pointed out, they are the people who have to find the money—there will be further depression, and the working-classes will suffer, and this will still further add to the distress in the country. I also object to this proposal in the Bill to convert this loan into a permanent debt of the country. I find that we added to our debt last year, apart from and beyond the result of conversion, the sum of £618,000 in London. In this insidious system of short-dated loans and conversions we have adopted a very expensive system. As I said yesterday, it costs $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to convert our loans; but the Treasurer is regardless of cost, so long as he can borrow and avoid doing so openly. In so far as this scheme will succeed in getting the money within the colony, I think it is likely to be a very great disadvantage. In all civilised communities industrial pursuits are largely assisted by the banks of a country, and it is the very essence of business that banks are able to act as a medium between the borrower and the lender; and if the colony interferes and diverts this money from the banks we shall not have money available for the assistance of industry, and those people who have only small capital will have a great deal of difficulty in borrowing to carry on their enterprises. It seems to me the Government are mopping up all the money they can get, like a great octopus stretching out its tentacles in all directions. I should like to refer to the remarks of the honourable member for Chalmers in regard to conversions. This is a matter which one always hears talked about, as if by some legerdemain great financial benefits might be secured; but if the honourable gentleman will refer to the correspondence with Sir Dillon Bell he will find that all these conversions are comparatively unprofitable transactions. English money-lenders are quite able to calculate, and are not likely to convert to their own loss. The market value for the stock to be converted, or given in exchange, is ascertained and agreed upon. Then the currency of the bond and the rates of interest on both sides are calculated. The correspondence in several cases gives the actuarial calculations, and on this the Agent-General tells us we pay 1 per cent. premium to induce the bondholder to consent to convert. If to this be added the ever-attendant cost of conversion for commissions, stamps, et cetera, amounting at the least to $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., we thus add $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to our debt, and the only benefit is a temporary reduction of interest at the cost of later years. If the honourable gentleman will take the trouble to peruse those papers, he will find that there is not so very much advantage in any conversion scheme that has as yet been effected.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—Mr. Speaker, I do not remember ever listening to a debate in this House in which the remarks made by the supporters of the Government were so extremely uncharitable as they have been on this occasion. Sir, the sixteen members who had the audacity to vote against the Government last night have been referred to by several speakers, and notably by the junior member for Christchurch City, as selfish individuals who prefer to vote against what they believe to be highly advantageous to the country so that the present Government might not have the great credit that would result from their wonderfully able proposal. Now, Sir, this is not the first time I have heard a loan referred to as a wonderful proof of ability, and a certain road to the gratitude of a nation. I remember that, when Mr. Domett brought in his Three-million Loan, that was said to be the greatest proof of ability that a man could exhibit in this House. We all know what that meant, and what was the result of that great ability. We are not allowed in this House to call each other liars or thieves or robbers, but I say no man could be referred to in more ruthless or more cruelly-wicked terms than to say of him that he was prepared, for some party purpose, or for some advantage to himself, to vote against a proposal which he believed would be the salvation of this country; and that is what the accusation of the junior member for Christchurch City amounts to. Now, that gentleman has not the excuse that he is a young member. Although he is young to this House he is not young as a public speaker; and words of that kind, deliberately used in this House, are, I think, exceedingly discreditable.

Mr. COLLINS.—I never made use of any assertion capable of such an interpretation.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have no doubt the honourable member for Selwyn will accept a denial so distinctly made.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—Sir, my ears are not very good, but they are so good that I cannot have made any mistake as to the statement made by the honourable member that we were opposing this Bill for party purposes; and there can be no more cruel charge than to say that we fear the prosperity of our own country.

Mr. COLLINS.—I repeat that I made no assertion capable of such an interpretation.

Mr. Duthie

Mr. SAUNDERS.—Well, Sir, we must let it drop. I distinctly heard the words, and that was the impression they left on my mind. Then, the honourable member went on to say, "How do you know what our promises were at the hustings? How can you accuse us of having promised not to support a borrowing policy?" I do not think the honourable member will deny that he very distinctly promised to support the policy announced by the Ballance Government; perhaps he will not deny that?

Mr. COLLINS.—I promised to support the policy of this Government.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—Very well. I was going to read Mr. Ballance's policy, but I will take this Government's policy announced at that time, which is precisely the same. I cannot take their present policy, because that was not made known until more than seven months after the honourable member was elected. Their policy prior to the election is thus declared by Mr. Ward in his Financial Statement made four or five months before the election:—

"To borrow, or not to borrow, that is the question. I am of opinion that the best interests of the colony are being better consulted by our steadfastly adhering to the policy of self-denial, and by maintaining the strong financial position which we now hold, than by adopting a borrowing policy."

You supported that.

Mr. COLLINS.—That is why I support this Bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—Then the honourable member must attach a different meaning to words from what I do. But Mr. Ward goes on to say, "The Government believe that borrowing is not necessary, and have decided to conduct the business of the country without having recourse to it." That is the policy, Sir, which the honourable gentleman promised to support. That is the policy which most young members promised to support. That is the policy I came here to support, and, such being so, I am not prepared to turn round and support a policy the very opposite of that, and the most voracious borrowing policy ever proposed to this House, or ever adopted in any English-speaking community. Sir, I see that the Minister of Labour is now in his place, and, as he made a very remarkable speech to us last night, I should like to make a few remarks upon that speech. It was what you may call an after-dinner speech. It was really an after-supper speech. I do not allude to any alcoholic feature about it; the honourable gentleman is above any suspicion of that kind, and he will therefore not object to a joke in that direction: but the speech was bristling with the peculiarities which we expect to find in an after-dinner speech—the speech was so very inaccurate, so very injudicious, and was calculated to do exactly the reverse of what he intended. In the first place, he told us very distinctly, and without any beating about the bush, that the ability—the brains of this House was the term he used—would be found on this side of the House, and they only got over on that side now and then when a black sheep forsook the fold and went over there.

Mr. REEVES.—I did not say that.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—No, you did not say "black sheep." At the very same time that the Minister of Education was telling us that all the brains were on his side of the House—

Mr. REEVES.—I did not say that.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—At the very moment that the Minister was telling us that the great preponderance of brains was on his side of the House the Premier was holding up his finger very vigorously to his friends with these good brains as a warning to say nothing; so that I suppose we must come to the conclusion that, whilst all the brains are on this side of the House, they are concentrated in one individual, and that individual was the one chosen to express the opinions of this side of the House, whilst the rest were cautioned to say nothing, lest they should prove unequal to the very difficult task of defending this new policy. But the most remarkable illustration that the Minister of Labour was not quite in his usual form was that he vehemently accused the honourable member for Hawke's Bay of inconsistency because he had opposed the Government when they did not borrow, and he now opposed them when they did borrow, or propose to borrow.

Mr. REEVES.—No; I did not do that.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—Well, Sir, I think the honourable member for Hawke's Bay will bear me out: and it was the first practical admission from the Government that this policy was exactly the reverse of what they professed a year ago. It does not seem to have occurred to the honourable gentleman when he made that remark that, if the honourable member for Hawke's Bay was so very inconsistent in opposing the Government when they did not borrow, and also when they did borrow, the accusation of inconsistency applied with infinitely more force to those young members who, after being elected on the Ballance policy, and after the announcement of the Colonial Treasurer that there was to be no borrowing, are now ready to follow the Government into the lobby and to support any amount of borrowing the Government may think proper to propose. That seems to me to have been a mistake on the part of the honourable member. Then, the honourable member was unwise enough to attempt a comparison between the financial policy of Great Britain and the financial policy that is now proposed in this country. Now, Sir, when we attempt to compare the two countries we should bear distinctly in mind that the population of Great Britain is some fifty-seven times greater than ours. If we reckon that we have some seven hundred thousand inhabitants, Great Britain has forty millions; and if you divide the one by the other you find that there is fifty-seven and one-seventh times as much population in England as there is here. I will say nothing about the immense wealth that is pouring into England, about the one hundred and fifty millions she receives for interest of money, and the many circumstances that would justify a loan in Great Britain which would be highly imprudent here; and if you multiply by fifty-seven the loans we are proposing at the present time, and just fancy the English community going in for loans at that rate, you will see something very different from what England has ever done, even in the wildest days. The wildest days of borrowing that have occurred in Great Britain were the days of George III. In that reign there were no less than six hundred millions of money borrowed in sixty years. That means an average rate of ten millions a year, which is only equal to an annual borrowing of £175,428 by our population, which we should talk of in this place as if it were a thing of no consequence at all; and yet it brought Great Britain to financial disgrace, and her bonds to something less than £60 per £100. Now, one million to us is equal to fifty-seven millions in England. And yet we think nothing of borrowing five millions in one year, although equal, in proportion to our population, to two hundred and eighty-five millions for Great Britain.

Mr. WARD.—What was the population of Great Britain in the time of George III.?

Mr. SAUNDERS.—It was twenty-three millions.

Mr. WARD.—About fifteen millions.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—You are taking the beginning of the reign; I am taking the end of it. But you may take which you like, or you may halve it, and halve it again, and still the enormous folly of our reckless borrowing will stand out beyond all comparison with the wildest days of England's wildest administration. But I do not want to go back a hundred years. It was the Minister of Labour who led to that date, and I think it was very unfair to go back a hundred years to compare the policy of England with our policy. England has committed many follies, like most other countries, in connection with war. But England, as I said before, in her very wildest days never borrowed, in proportion to her population, a fiftieth part of what this Government proposes to borrow this year. Now, Sir, let us compare the fifty years during which we have been borrowing. What is the result? During the last fifty years Great Britain has paid off £120,000,000 of her national debt. And what have we been doing? Incurring a debt equal on her population to £2,286,000,000. If you multiply our debt by fifty-seven, to make up the difference between our population and that of England, we have increased our debt to that extent. Now, it is true, as the Minister of Education said, our debt is not for war. If there were anything that would justify borrowing it is war. I do not say that it would be easy to justify war; very few wars that I ever remembered could be justified; but, if you have to go to war, then I say there is nothing that would justify borrowing so much as war, because there is no doubt the nation that can command at once the largest resources, and attack vigorously and more economically, stands the chance to do it more successfully than the nation that dribbles on, and is constantly defeated. Every one will admit it is never wise to go to war unless you make such arrangements as to insure success. We are told this is not for war. But I am not sure that it is for anything better than war. If this House consents to such a loan on such conditions I am not at all sure that it would not be more injurious to the country than if it were borrowed for war. I look upon it as a great constitutional wrong to this country to propose that a million of money—equal to fifty-seven millions in England—shall be borrowed and placed in the hands of the Colonial Treasurer to do what he likes with. Just fancy even such able men as Gladstone, or Goschen, or any of our great statesmen—Sir Robert Peel, for instance—coming to the British Parliament and proposing that they should be allowed to collect from the people of Great Britain fifty-seven millions in one year, and spend it how they pleased! What would be the position of a statesman in England who proposed anything of the kind? He would never be heard of as a statesman in England again; and I say this is as bad, if not worse, when we propose to collect a million, as in this Bill, and place it in the hands of the Colonial Treasurer without any control on the part of the people's representatives as to the manner in which the money is to be disposed of. All that I said the other night with regard to the objections I had to the cheap-money Bill I have in still greater force to this Bill. I shall go into the lobby against it and vote against it, and I shall be quite satisfied in my own conscience that I am doing the right thing. As to the motives that may be attributed to any of us in opposing this Bill, I may say that during a long—very long—political life I do not remember to have been accused but once before of using my political position for any private interest or purpose of my own. I will take advantage, while you, Sir, are in the chair, of saying that you will remember that I had not been in the House six weeks before I was offered by Mr. Fox in your presence the position of Colonial Treasurer. You will also remember that in 1879 I took a very active part in protesting against the Grey Government, for the reason for which I protest against this Government—because, after great professions of economy, they had gone into gross extravagance and reckless borrowing; and I took a very active part in dislodging that Government, and was placed in a position in which I could not have been refused a portfolio had I claimed it, but declined to do so in favour of Mr. Rolleston. Now, you will remember, I am sure, in the following year I had occasion to oppose the Crown and Native Lands Rating Bill, and that I was successful so far that the Government considered themselves defeated; but, rather than remove that Government at that time, I consented, at the request of the Premier, and on condition that the Bill should never be heard of again, to vote against my own conscience and in favour of the Bill that I had condemned, rather than dislodge that Government at the time when they were actively engaged in reducing the expenditure of the country. And Mr. Swanson, Mr. Colbeck, and Mr. Hurst did the same, and by that means kept ourselves out and kept the Hall Government in. I think all these things are enough to satisfy you, Sir, knowing all the circumstances as you do, that I have never been an office-seeker in this House. During the whole time I have never sought office in any Government, and have constantly taken the attitude of refusing office. That being the case, I am hardly a proper subject to be charged by members who have just entered this House with any evil motive of that kind, even though I do not and will not support the present Government so long as I consider their policy erroneous and dangerous to the country. I always have been, and still am, willing to support them in what I believe to be prudent and right.

Mr. FRASER.—The Colonial Treasurer, in introducing this Bill, termed it a very simple measure. He was quite right. It is a simple measure, so simple that "he who runs may read"—so simple that any one can understand it. It means this: that, so far as the million referred to is concerned, the Bill proposes to take away from the House one of its most cherished privileges, the control of the purse—the right to say how loan-money is to be spent. That is what the Bill means, there is no doubt about it. I desire to compliment the Treasurer for the consistent manner in which he has behaved during this session in regard to the Bills he has introduced. I have listened very carefully to him, and I cannot recollect one occasion on which, in introducing a Bill, he has thoroughly explained the full purport of it; he has always left something—indeed, a good deal—to say in reply. He has fenced most ingeniously all the questions put to him during the various debates, and then when exercising his right of reply he has glanced at or ignored the arguments used against the measure, and employed the whole power of his oratory to refute statements which were never made. That has occurred very frequently. No doubt these are very clever tactics, and, although they seem to have amused his followers considerably, I am not quite so sure that they will commend themselves so much to the country. So far as the Bill itself is concerned, what is it, stripped of all the sophistry about the desire to encourage thrift? It is a loan Bill, and, I venture to say, a loan Bill such as has never before been placed before Parliament. All loan Bills have been brought down with a schedule of works attached. Where is the schedule attached to this Bill? There is none whatever. It is proposed to borrow a million in Consols, and there is not the slightest indication as to how the money is to be spent—not a word. It is true this may be done yet. Hints have been given this afternoon by various speakers that the Government are prepared to accept amendments in the Bill. In fact, about mid-day I watched with amusement a troop of the faithful coming into the lobby from chambers occupied by Ministers. I presume there had been a caucus, and I suppose the result of that caucus may be that the Treasurer, in replying, may produce from his pocket the schedule I say this Bill requires. I do not know about that. However, we have now to deal with the Bill as it is before us: The Treasurer informed us that the money obtained by the sale of these Consols could be applied to redeem Treasury bills.

Mr. SEDDON.—No.

Mr. FRASER.—To redeem existing Treasury bills.

Mr. SEDDON.—No; certainly not.

Mr. WARD.—I made no such statement.

Mr. FRASER.—The honourable gentleman said it might be so applied.

Mr. WARD.—No.

Mr. FRASER.—Will the honourable gentleman repeat what he did say?

Mr. WARD.—I said it was quite possible to use the money raised in this way in lieu of Treasury bills.

Mr. FRASER.—I must accept the honourable gentleman's statement, but I took his words down "to redeem existing Treasury bills." But even taking the honourable gentleman's own words, what do they mean? They mean that they may be applied to that purpose—he will not deny that. Why, I always understood that Treasury bills were short-dated promissory notes issued in anticipation of revenue, and to be redeemed and taken up at maturity as the revenue came in. But what do we find now? The revenue is not to be used to redeem the bills, but loan-money is to do it. I say this is an extraordinary proposal to put before the House, and I am sure it will not commend itself to this House, and certainly it will not to the country. There is no doubt that, whatever words the Treasurer did use, what we were led to infer was that Treasury bills were going to absorb a certain amount of this money, if not the whole of it. Subsequent speakers from the Treasury benches used the same argument. I say it is entirely wrong that Treasury bills should be redeemed in this manner; it simply means the money is to be spent in a way the House has no knowledge of. I maintain there is no indication whatever of the manner in which the money proposed to be borrowed under this Bill is to be applied or spent, and that is a thing which I cannot conceive this House agreeing to.

830. I trust, if the Bill passes its second reading, that in Committee the mischievous parts of the Bill will be eliminated from it. Did the Treasurer expect the House to take him seriously when he stated that these Consols are to be created on the lines of English Consols? Because, if he does, he is condemned out of his own mouth. English Consols were not created for the purpose of providing investments for people residing in that country. They were created in consequence of the severe straits for money in which that country found itself at various periods. Therefore, if there is anything in his argument at all, it logically follows that the necessity for these Consols is that the Government also are in sore straits for money. I do not say that it is so, but I say that the argument of the Colonial Treasurer clearly indicates that. I hope it is not so; but the honourable gentleman must not blame us because of the logical conclusion we have come to from his own statement. Then, the Premier in the course of his speech said that we must trust the Treasurer. Does the House not trust the Treasurer—does the House not always trust every Treasurer? But it trusts him within the limits of an Act called the Public Revenues Act. Here, however, he goes beyond the provisions of that Act. I certainly cannot support the Bill as it stands now. It is a mischievous measure, to my mind. I maintain that the demands which the honourable gentleman is making upon this House are unprecedented. I suppose we shall be told by-and-by, as we have been told in various other debates, that there has been obstruction on this side of the House because we have criticized this measure. I hold that those honourable members on this side of the House, and those other honourable gentlemen who have had the independence to criticize these proposals, and who have spoken and voted fearlessly in regard to them, deserve the thanks of the country for their action. I trust, if the Bill does pass the second reading, that if it goes into Committee it will come out so altered that its own father will not know it.

Mr. MCGUIRE.—I rise to oppose this Bill. I do not care to give a silent vote on the matter, as I feel very strongly that this is a very mischievous measure. It is not a measure which is in the true interests of the country. Under it the Treasurer will have a million of money placed in the Consolidated Fund which he can use according to his own sweet will. If the Treasurer had shown that this money was required, and was absolutely necessary in the true interests of the country, and for the purpose of developing the country's resources, the Government should propose to raise a loan in the proper way in the financial market at Home. Instead of that, we find a Bill of this description, in which the honourable gentleman will get a million of money in the most insidious way, and he will have the power of spending it as he thinks proper, as the Bill has no schedule and is not ear-marked. Some time ago, when the taxation proposals were introduced, the Colonial Treasurer assured us that he had a surplus of over £290,000. Notwithstanding that alleged surplus, the unfortunate settlers of the country have had to pay the land-tax twice in one year. Surely it was not necessary for the Government to insist on that, in view of what they had previously stated. The Government told us that they were a non-borrowing Government; but honourable gentlemen can judge of the value of that statement by their own proposals. They have already gone in for the two millions to bolster up the Bank of New Zealand, and they have gone in for a million and a half for the purpose of lending money to settlers. That is a very dangerous measure, in my opinion, and it should be carefully guarded, in the interests of the taxpayers. I think the farmers should have cheap money: still, I also think it is a very dangerous measure, and the Government and the House will have to be very careful indeed, or very large sums of money will be lost, and the taxpayers of the country will have to make such losses good. Then, there is a proposal to get money from foreign insurance companies—to make those companies which are doing business in New Zealand pay large sums of money into the Treasury. What is this for? Simply in order that the Treasurer may use that money.

Mr. SPEAKER.—You are anticipating another order of the day.

Mr. McGUIRE.—I thought in discussing this question we could discuss the financial proposals of the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Yes; but honourable members cannot discuss Bills which are set down for consideration later on.

Mr. McGUIRE.—I submit, Sir, most cheerfully to your ruling. This non-borrowing Government have been in power for the last three years, and they have added to the debt of the colony nearly £3,000,000 already, and even under the transactions of last year they have added to the debt a sum of £750,000. The country was never before in such a state as it is in at present. We are giving employment to more people who would otherwise be unemployed than has been the case for many years past; and I can never remember a time when so many persons were out of employment. The Government tell us they have a surplus of something like £300,000. They received from this House £700,000 for the purpose of constructing public works, such as railways, roads, and bridges, and opening up the country generally. But what sums have they expended? They have expended a little over £400,000. Therefore on that vote alone they have saved something like £300,000. This is how they make up the surplus. Then, again, from the conversion operations they got something like £250,000. Had they not succeeded in getting that money from the conversion operations, and had they expended the money which had been voted by this House, we should have had a deficit this year of half a million, together with an increase of our national debt of £750,000—going to the bad at the rate of £1,250,000. I am, as I have said, going to oppose this Bill. I will not take up the time of the House further at present. I, however, trust that honourable members who have the true interests of the country at heart will be found voting against this Bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS.—May I be allowed to correct one statement which I made in my speech? I am told that I said that even during the extravagant and ruinous borrowing of George the Third's reign, Great Britain never borrowed more than ten millions in one year. That is not correct. What I intended to say, and what would have been correct, is that even during that reign of reckless borrowing Great Britain did not average more than ten millions a year.

Mr. McGuire

Mr. BUICK.—Two or three minutes will be sufficient for all I have to say upon this question. I do not like to give a silent vote on such an important measure as this. I can honestly say that I have never felt so great a difficulty during all the time I have been in Parliament in coming to a decision upon a question as I do at the present moment. I have every desire to support the Government in every reasonable proposal, but I must confess that the proposals which I understand they introduce in this Bill are rather much for me. This is to all intents and purposes a borrowing measure. If the English language means anything at all, that is the purpose of the Bill. I may state that my position is this: I was elected to this House opposed strongly to borrowing. I was opposed to borrowing in every sense of the term, and, if possible, more especially to borrowing for no specially-defined purpose. As I have already stated, this is a borrowing Bill. It is, I believe, a Bill borrowing for the purpose of constructing public works, and it is further a Bill for borrowing for no specially-defined public works. That is the main objection which I have to the Bill. It seems to me that the position of the Government is this: They are at the present moment facing an empty Treasury. They do not wish to tell the public so. They want to borrow one million under this Bill, but they do not wish the public to know it. And they will not let the public know it if they can prevent it. That is precisely the position they are in to-day. I do not blame them for being in that position; but what I say is this: They ought honestly to face that position and tell us so. That is the attitude I take up. I for one would think none the less of them if they came down and stated openly, "We want to borrow £1,000,000 for public works," although I would not support it; but under the provisions of this Bill we simply have a sly way of getting a large sum of money into the Treasury. It is simply money going into the big pot, and the Government are going to ladle it out as they like. Now, the primary purpose of this Bill is a very admirable one indeed—that is, to provide a safe means of investment for people who have saved small sums of money, and who at the present time are afraid to invest them in the ordinary channels of investment. But, I say, if that is really the intention of the Bill, there is no need for the Bill, because the position of these people can be met by the opportunities that are offered for investment in the Post-Office Savings-Bank. All that working-men can save can be absorbed in that office with very great safety and ease. I know that, as far as I am concerned, I am a working-man, and the Post-Office Savings-Bank can accommodate all that I can save. Thousands in this colony are in exactly the same position; therefore, so far as that class of people are concerned, this Bill is really not required. I agree with the Colonial Treasurer that larger deposits than £500 in the Post-Office Savings-Bank would not be convenient to the Government, because, if they were suddenly called upon to find large sums of money at a moment's notice, it would, in some instances, place them in a difficulty, and the honourable gentleman is quite right in limiting the amount of deposit in the Post-Office Savings-Bank to £500. But I think that difficulty could be got over, and the purpose of the Government be easily met, by devising some means of having a system of fixed deposit in the Savings-Bank for sums over £500 for a term of five or ten years. If that were done, I think the whole purpose and intention of this Bill could be met, and then there would be no fear, as there is at the present time in the minds of honourable members, that this is purely a borrowing Bill. Now, as the Bill stands, I must vote against the second reading. I should like to see amendments made in it in Committee, but I am afraid that these amendments are so drastic that the Treasurer himself would not be prepared to accept them. I will give the House an indication of what I should like to see, so as to make this Bill as safe as possible if we are going to pass it. In the first place, I think an amount of one million is too great a sum to attempt to raise in this way. If it is meant to meet the surplus money in this colony—that is, the money that is put away in the stockings and teapots—then, I say, £100,000 would be quite sufficient to meet that. If the amount were reduced to that, then this would be a safer measure. I should also like to see the 7th clause struck out of this Bill, because as it stands at the present time the money raised under this measure will simply go into the Consolidated Fund, and may be used for any purpose the Government choose to apply it to. Clause 35 is also an objectionable one, because it means that at some future time the Colonial Treasurer may convert the whole of this borrowed money, and then it would simply be made a permanent addition to the national debt, which would probably cost us £40,000 a year in the way of interest. Then, I should also like to see the purposes for which the money is to be used clearly defined in the Bill. During the financial debate I spoke in favour of the principle of Consols on a modified scale, but I was then under the impression that the Government were going to use this money for the purpose of acquiring private land for settlement, and, if I was satisfied the money was going to be used for that purpose, I should certainly not have so great an objection to the measure, but, as it is, I cannot conscientiously vote for a measure which is so directly in contravention of the pledges which I have given to my constituents. I prefer very much to have an opportunity of explaining the whole measure to my constituents before committing myself to the details laid down in this Bill.

Mr. TANNER.—I agree with the last speaker that the matter before us this evening is a matter of too grave import for any honourable member to remain silent on it. I shall put into half a dozen sentences what I have to say. We know the position. The Government know the position, and we know it. I was not returned absolutely pledged against borrowing under any conditions. Any candidate who stood before the electors and gave pledges of that kind would be an extremely foolish man. I have always been against increasing the indebtedness of the colony; for the public debt is already our heaviest national burden. I shall not enter upon an elaborate train of reasoning in order to prove that this is not a borrowing proposal, or that the letterpress of the Bill means exactly contrary to the impression conveyed on reading it. If there is any meaning in words, it is a Bill authorising the raising of a loan of a million, without any need for it to be explained to the House. In these circumstances, my duty is clear, and I am fully prepared to accept the responsibility which that duty entails in voting against the second reading.

Major STEWARD.—I intended to take no part in this debate, but I feel bound to say a few words on the subject of the Bill before the House, under the circumstances which have taken place. No one this session has more loyally supported the Government in their policy than I have done; but, Sir, I am not prepared to give to any Government or to any Treasurer an open credit for a million of money to be dealt with as they please. This appears to be the gist of the Bill now before us. I object in toto to section 35, which gives power to the Governor in Council to declare all or any of the Consols created or certificates issued under this Act to be convertible into stock created or issued under "The Consolidated Stock Act, 1877," and "The Consolidated Stock Act, 1884." I object also to section 7, which places the whole of this money in the Consolidated Fund. If the Colonial Treasurer, in his reply, is willing to assure us that in this Bill he will introduce a clause to the effect that the money raised under the Bill shall be applied, and applied only, to the purposes which have been sanctioned by this House—as, for example, the quarter of a million to be devoted to roading in the North Island, to the purchase of Native land in the North Island, and the further quarter of a million to be devoted to the purchase of private land in the South Island,—then I am perfectly willing to vote for the Bill and allow the money to be applied to the purposes which the House has sanctioned. But if this Bill is to mean, as it seems to me to mean, that authority is given for raising a million of money without any appropriation being made, then I absolutely cannot vote for it. The explanation of the Treasurer, as I understood it—I may have understood it wrongly, I admit, and, if so, the honourable gentleman will be able to explain when he replies—was to this effect: that the money to be raised under this Bill—of course it is not to be assumed that the whole million will be obtained in the first year, but, perhaps, a quarter of a million or half a million, as the case may be—that this money was to be devoted to the purpose of retiring Treasury bills. Well, Sir, it is perfectly clear that, if you retire Treasury bills which are issued in anticipation of revenue, then there is so much more revenue placed at the Colonial Treasurer's disposal; so that the thing is as broad as it is long. For the expenditure of the money to be raised under the Bill there is no appropriation whatever, and no direction from this House. It is not possible to ask any member of the House, however loyal he may be, however strongly Liberal he may be, however strongly he may believe in the present Government, as I do believe in them—and there is no man in whom I believe more thoroughly and with greater confidence than in the Colonial Treasurer—I say it is utterly impossible for him to give the Government an open credit. I say I am not so prepared. I hope, therefore, the honourable gentleman, in his reply, will be able to say to the House that this clause 35 shall be struck out; further, that clause 7 shall be struck out; and, moreover, that a clause will be put in to the effect that the money to be raised under the Bill shall be devoted to purposes already sanctioned by this House, or, if he pleases, that the Public Trustee shall be put in the position of investing it in such securities as he thinks best. If this is done, the Bill shall have my hearty support, but I feel that I cannot, under any circumstances, vote for the Bill unless I have these assurances.

Mr. LANG.—I did not intend to speak this evening, nor do I now intend to take up for more than a few minutes the time of the House; but so many members have spoken on this very important question that I do not care to give a silent vote on the matter. I may say that I was very much surprised at the manner in which Ministers have made their speeches upon this question. It appeared as if they knew very little about the Bill. At any rate, they gave us very little information, and what little information they gave us was certainly very contradictory. In fact, there seemed to be only one point upon which they agreed at all, and that is that they wanted a million of money. I was also very much surprised to see so many of the Government supporters getting up in their places and condemning the Bill in the strongest possible terms, and then finishing up their speeches by saying they were going to vote for the second reading. I can only account for it by assuming they wished to excuse themselves to their constituents; but I think that the electors of the country look more at the way in which their members vote than at the way in which they speak. I may say it seems to me to be very extraordinary that we should be asked to support a Bill giving the Government a million of money without their telling us in any way how that money is to be used. I shall vote against the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. WARD.—I think, Sir, that the House has heard offered here on more than one occasion such statements as the honourable gentleman has just made. There seems to be a great desire on the part of some honourable members to tell us what the consequences of our actions will be so far as the electors are concerned. Now, I would point out that the same story was told to honourable members on this side of the House all through last session. We were told then that when we went before our constituents we should see how they would treat us. That was then the continuous theme of several honourable members. Well, we had the decision of our constituents, and we are satisfied. This session several honourable members have taken up the same rôle. My honourable friend the member for Wakatipu, I think, is one.

Mr. FRASER.—No.

Mr. WARD.—At any rate, several honourable gentlemen on that side of the House are for ever warning honourable members on this side to beware of the possibility of a heavy reckoning when they go before their constituents. Now, I say that every member of the House has a right, and properly so, to carefully weigh every matter that comes up for consideration, not only as to the effect it may have on his own constituents, but as to its effect upon the whole colony. But to me it becomes almost nauseous, as it must be to other members of the House, to see some of the honourable members who are supporting the measures of the Government pointed at by certain honourable members on that side of the House, who say, in effect, "Be careful, gentlemen, how you vote. Remember you have to go to your constituents." I say it is almost insulting to give expression to such utterances as that, which come so frequently from some of the leading members on the other side of the House. I propose to briefly touch upon some of the points which have been raised during this discussion. First of all, let me point out what was the position in connection with this matter a very short time ago. Have honourable members forgotten the circumstances that existed in the country prior to the last election? Do they forget that from one end of New Zealand to the other there was an almost unanimous expression of opinion that, owing to the disturbed state of trade, caused by the pulling-in of money on the part of our financial institutions here, and sending it out to Australia and elsewhere, it was desirable that the Government should do something to stop the great outflow of money. Honourable members made statements of that sort here, and when speaking on the public platform they pointed out the position into which matters were drifting, and expressed the opinion that something in the direction now proposed should be brought down in Parliament. I am really surprised at the action of the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) in this matter, because, to my own knowledge, he entertained the same opinion—that the outflow of capital was injurious to the colony, and that legislation was necessary in order to prevent it. I say that several honourable members who are now twisting the proposals of the Government, as indicated in this Bill, into a proposal to go in for a loan have entirely forgotten what then took place, and what the pledges of the

Major Steward

Government were. They also entirely overlook the requirements of the colony, and the necessity that has called for this legislation. There may be a diversity of opinion as to the right way to meet the case. What the Government have got to endeavour to prevent, however, is the sending of an excess of the people's capital out of the colony; and that is the object of this Bill. Those honourable members say it is a borrowing proposal. If they had been in the House when it was proposed to establish the Post-Office Savings-Bank, what would they have then done? They would, upon their arguments,—fallacious ones, I contend,—have voted in the direction they now indicate, and in my opinion there would probably have been no Post-Office Savings-Bank established in this colony at all.

Mr. BELL.—Money at call.

Mr. WARD.—That is the position of deposits. If during the current year the people of New Zealand increased these deposits to, say, five millions of money, upon which interest would be payable, in the Post-Office Savings-Bank, the colony would have to take them under the postal system. So, if the Government give effect to the proposal contained in this Bill, and the people elect to take advantage of this system of investing their money under it, there will, in my opinion, be some shrinkage in the deposits made in the Post-Office Savings-Bank. Honourable members

9.0. whom we hear talking about this being a proposal for a loan are not viewing it impartially, and they evidently do not know what the proposal really is. The question as to the disposition of the moneys is an entirely different matter, and I am prepared to consider that later on. But I wish now to reiterate that this proposal for issuing a million Consols in the colony was not made by the Government for the purpose of obtaining a million of money for public works or for anything of the kind. The talk about obtaining moneys in this way for railways, such as that of the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie), is quite out of place. Does that honourable gentleman mean to tell this House that he is so ignorant of our mode of business in Parliament that he does not know that an appropriation would have to be taken first—that before anything of the sort could be done it would have to come under the review of honourable members? But my honourable friend was in a most sympathetic and pathetic mood. In quite a touching way he was appealing to the labour members, and pointing out to them the course they should follow. Surely he must have forgotten, and if he did forget I would remind him of the fact, that almost every proposal that has been made in this House or elsewhere in the direction of assisting the labourer of this country has met with his most fierce denunciation. He has for years been constantly opposed to labour and to labour interests, and yet he now makes an ad captandum appeal to the labour members as to what they should do. Let me suggest to my honourable friend that he should allow the labour members to exercise their intelligence, and to vote without dictation or suggestion from one who has been so consistently opposed to the interest they represent. Then, the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs has again accused us of flying kites. That honourable gentleman went back to William III.: and it is a somewhat remarkable fact that, while he went back to William III., my honourable and esteemed friend the member for Selwyn went back to George III. Those honourable gentlemen gave us ancient history; but we do not want ancient history. Let me bring the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs back to modern history, and remind him that, though he is now opposed to the million of Consols as proposed, before the House met he was willing to go in for two millions of borrowed money, one million of which was to be used in carrying on public works, and the other million for his favourite North Island Trunk Railway. That was the proposal of my honourable friend; and yet he comes here and takes exception to the proposal in this Bill to enable minors—and every one in the House should, I think, wish to see it—given an opportunity of obtaining suitable investments for their money. The honourable member comes here and jokes, and absolutely ridicules the proposal to confer this benefit on minors by holding out an inducement to them to exercise habits of thrift. I can only express my very great surprise at my honourable friend. Then, again, the honourable gentleman indulged in some remarks about the difference between the statement I had made as to the number of Consols which were existing in England at a particular time and the English national debt, and said he thought I should have known a little more about it. Now, the honourable gentleman will pardon me for saying that he did not arrive at a right conclusion. I was referring to a specific amount of Consols: but, as the honourable member does not appear to know what the national debt of England is, I will tell him. On the 31st of December, 1893, it was £671,000,000.

Dr. NEWMAN.—You have looked it up since.

Mr. WARD.—I had it lying on my table here at the time, and the particular point which I referred to was the £525,000,000 of Consols—a particular item selected from the Imperial balance-sheet. Now, the honourable the senior member for Wellington City says that this is a proposal to convert Consols into a permanent debt. I say I disagree entirely with the honourable gentleman. We do not seek to convert the Consols into a permanent debt. It is all very well for honourable members to take a particular clause of the Bill, and to take the maximum limit of the proposed currency, and to say that we are going to issue these for forty years, and to convert them into a permanent debt. I think it is only fair to say that it is any period “up to forty years”; and it may be a very, very much shorter period. Under circumstances that are suitable, there is nothing to prevent the issue being for a very short time indeed. Then, I would, for a moment, point out to my honourable friend the member for Wairarapa the position in which he is. That honourable gentleman said he was prepared to vote for a million if it was straight borrowing, and then he went on to explain what he meant by a system of straight borrowing, and, by way of illustration, said he was prepared to agree that the Savings-Bank should receive deposits for a fixed period, and that the limit of £500 should be removed. Since he would agree to that, I would point out that he should be a supporter of this system of Consols which he expresses himself as opposed to. If he is going to fix a time during which deposits may be made with the Savings-Bank, and during which the depositors' money shall not be withdrawn, would he not thus place the money absolutely in the hands of the Government of the colony through the Post-Office Savings-Bank? I say certainly he would. The honourable gentleman favours a million of money being paid into one of the Government institutions; he favours the extension of the Savings-Bank system so as to allow of a large sum of money being lent in that way; and yet he draws the line at the proposal we are making in this Bill, for the reason probably that it is not his own idea. Now I must return for a moment to the honourable member for Hawke's Bay. The honourable gentleman expressed the opinion some time ago that at some time or other I was going to be crucified.

Captain RUSSELL.—I said I hoped you would not be.

Mr. WARD.—Well, I think the honourable gentleman expressed the opinion that very probably I should be crucified, and that people would not want my blood, but that what they would do would be to eject me from office. When the honourable gentleman was discussing this matter it occurred to me that, while he referred to the possibility and even stated that the time was arriving when the term "repudiation" might be applied to this colony, his own memory so far as his own actions were concerned must have again become very defective. If under this proposed system repudiation is probable, what must the position have been had his proposals made in his green and salad days been given effect to? Those proposals were that the colony should commit itself to an expenditure of twenty millions to lend to private individuals—at a time, too, when its indebtedness under mortgage was less than six millions, and when the ordinary revenue of the colony was a little more than half of what it is at the present time. Yet that honourable gentleman now talks about repudiation. What must have been his ideas of repudiation in those days? He must have believed that we were absolutely on the verge of something that was a great deal worse than repudiation. Now, for the purpose of trying to do something against the Government, or for the purpose of putting the Government in a wrong position, he uses this word with a lightness that is inexcusable. Those honourable gentlemen sometimes accuse me of levity because I do not look sour enough; and yet some of them get up and, in the most frivolous manner, use terms that are likely to be cabled to England, as being used by leading members of this House, to the effect that this colony is about to repudiate. I have never before heard of responsible men in any Assembly making suggestions of this kind. I say that every lover of his country should scorn the idea of the possibility of such a thing as repudiation in this country. I am indeed very much surprised at honourable members; but it is quite in keeping with the policy of those who are opposing the present Government, and not only of those opposing the Government in this colony, but of those who are opposing it out of the colony. If you take the scathing financial articles that have appeared from time to time since this Government took office—and which, notwithstanding the great anxiety of the honourable member for Patea, has had the effect of sending our stocks up—if you take those scathing articles in connection with our finance, what do you find? You find that the main sentiment animating those articles is the hope that financial trouble may come over this colony; and I would ask, for what purpose is this desired? It is in order to cast out those at present in office, and to allow those honourable gentlemen who are now in opposition to come in. That is the plain English of it. Now, the honourable member for Patea has delivered a financial statement upon this occasion. The honourable gentleman, I am sorry to say, is somewhat reckless in his statements in connection with financial matters. He has a happy knack of accusing other people of being reckless, but he really does, himself, make statements in the House upon finance which will not stand very much discussion. There is, for instance, the honourable gentleman's argument with reference to the falling of £38,000 in the revenue during the quarter, and of the expenses having gone up £20,000. Why, does the honourable gentleman not know, do not all honourable members know, and does the country not know that the June quarter is always one of the worst for the revenue of the colony? In addition to that, does the honourable member not know that during the winter months the ordinary expenditure is higher than usual? Why is this? It is usually higher, and it is so higher for the purpose of keeping people who, unfortunately, are unable during the winter months to get work in the ordinary way, from one end of the colony to the other. The honourable gentleman very consistently selects the very worst features in connection with the finance of the colony, and then comes down to the House and asks honourable members to accept his statements as an index of what the real position is. All I can say is that, if the honourable gentleman wants the reputation of being an accurate forecaster of finance, he will do himself more credit by taking the average than by selecting a month or two in order to suit his own purposes. Then, again, the honourable gentleman expressed the hope that I would not drop my noughts upon this occasion as I had done upon a former occasion. Now, I would remind the honourable gentleman that, if I did make a slip on the occasion referred to, he himself made a much more serious one, for he converted £15,000 into £150,000. To say the least of it, I think that honourable members who live in glass houses should not throw stones. I hope he will do as I have done, leave his extra nought in Hansard. Again, the honourable gentleman talked about a deficiency in the estimates. Now, I do not want to take up time by reading the Financial Statement, but if honourable members will look there they will see, on page 6, that, in forecasting the estimated revenue, I specially referred to the fact that the Customs revenue had fallen somewhat during the first three months, but expressed the opinion that it was not likely to continue falling. When the honourable member comments on the fact that the Customs revenue is falling and the railway revenue is falling, I think it would be only fair on his part to see that in the general estimates of the Financial Statement I have provided for a reduced revenue of nearly £135,000 below what it was for the preceding year. This being so, I say that, when he and other honourable gentlemen select the worst months of the year, and endeavour to create the impression that the colony is "going to the dogs," they are not doing what is fair to the Government or to the country. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) says the colony is already repudiating, that what it is doing is the worst kind of repudiation, and that it is theft of the worst kind. I only wish to say that the honourable gentleman refers to the operations of a particular department, and that he is wrong in his assumption that the present Government is responsible for the legislation to which he refers. I am not saying that legislation was not right, but I wish to repeat that the legislation referred to was not the work of the present Government. That being so, I may say—

Mr. BELL.—It was the Act of 1891.

Mr. WARD.—I hold, at any rate, that we are not responsible, and I say that when the matter which the honourable gentleman refers to comes before the House I will show that such is the case. When discussing a proposal for the initiation of a system for the establishment of Consols in the colony, it is, I think, quite unusual to draw in extraneous matters in connection with the system in a particular department—and which in the ordinary course will come up for debate—and apply it to the whole colony. Now, just let me reply to the honourable member for Marsden for a minute or two. That honourable gentleman this afternoon delivered a speech to the House, and in that speech he gave us some information of a very valuable kind. I was pleased to hear the honourable member say that his people did not send him here with a rope round his neck, and when the honourable gentleman goes back to his constituents I hope they will not find it necessary to put a rope round his neck; I trust that when he comes back next session they will again send him without a rope. I may say that the honourable gentleman, in criticizing the proposal, at times made statements which in his calmer moments he will, I think, realise were a little ill-advised and not very complimentary. I am prepared to give him credit for doing his very best in the interests of his constituency and of the country, and I think he should credit other people with being just as anxious to do what is proper, and, while claiming to act from good motives himself, he should, I think, give credit to others for being animated by similar motives. No good result can be gained by making remarks which are somewhat offensive in their tone. I can assure the honourable gentleman that, while his criticism is accepted in good part, other people can indulge in the same kind of criticism if they find it necessary to do so. Now, Sir, just one word about the remarks of the honourable member for Otaki. That honourable gentleman stated that three Ministers had made three different statements, and the honourable member for Hawke's Bay stated that there was nothing extraordinary in that. All I can say is that the honourable gentleman could not have been listening very carefully to the speeches of Ministers in the House. At any rate, I heard no such diversity of opinions expressed by Ministers. If the honourable member assumed they were going to get up one after the other and, like parrots, reiterate word for word what had already been said, then all that I can say is that he will not get the present Ministry to act in such a manner. We are in the habit of expressing our opinions to the best of our ability, but there is no attempt to copy. It has been customary for honourable members on that side of the House to twit me with getting up in a jaunt style and indulging in criticisms with regard to their actions. If I do that, Sir, it is because I do not wish to make people feel unhappy, and I hope I do not look unhappy myself. But, notwithstanding the serious responsibility resting on my shoulders, I hope I am not expected to make my life miserable to please the honourable gentleman. I do not act in a jaunt manner. If, however, I act as stated, what can be said of the honourable gentleman himself? Why, when he got up to speak to-day he was beaming all over his face, and during his speech looked to be in anything but earnest. I would tell honourable members that, while the policy of members on the other side of the House is to accuse honourable members on this side who usually support the Government of acting in contradiction to their pledges, they are giving them a very excellent character indeed. It must be very reassuring to that side of the House to know, on such good authority, that instead of the Government wagging the tail, the tail is, according to certain honourable gentlemen, wagging the Government on this occasion. How can any honourable member say that, under these circumstances, the party is being driven by the Government? I hope they will accept the assurance of the honourable gentleman that this is not so, though it was probably his desire to create an opposite impression. There are several other things that I wish to clear up in connection with this Bill. It has been said several times during this debate that the policy of the present Government is a great departure from that of the Ballance Government. Sir, do honourable members who make these statements mean to tell me that they have read the Financial Statement of the late Colonial Treasurer delivered in 1891? If they have not read that Statement I would advise them to do so, for in it they will find a clear indication given of the strong possibility of a loan being necessary in this colony. If honourable members want now to know the exact words, I will give them. They are these:—

"... while any local borrowing is likely to be confined to the absolute necessity of carrying on those essential works of colonisation, such as the settlement of the people on the land, on which so directly depend the prosperity of the community."

Then, again, in 1892 the following words appear in the late Mr. Ballance's Statement, in referring to borrowing proposals:—

"The same objection, however, that applies to foreign loans does not apply to borrowing within the colony, and I believe it possible to place a moderate loan at a reasonable rate of interest, extending over some time, without any difficulty."

And then he goes on to say, —

"It may be said the securities would find their way to England, or that the absorption of so much money would tend to make it dear in the colony."

And so on. Now, I tell this House that every member of the present Government knows that the opinion of the late Treasurer in 1891 was that we should, in all probability, have to borrow the following year. And it is not divulging any Cabinet secret to tell the House that it is an absolute fact that in 1892 he had made up his mind that borrowing could not be done without in that year, and, had it not been for the success of the conversion operations, the then Treasurer of this colony would have come down with a proposal to borrow money; and I ask honourable members if they would have been prepared to carry out the late Premier's policy. I am not trading upon what has occurred in the slightest possible degree, but I say that the late Treasurer knew that the time was bound to come when we should have to raise money to carry on the government of the country. It is all very well for the honourable member for Selwyn and other honourable members to contend that we do not require money in order to carry on. I say that the operations of the colony cannot be carried on without money.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Then you are borrowing it?

Mr. WARD.—I say money is the first essential for the carrying-on of the business of the country. My honourable friends say that the proposals contained in this Bill are for the purpose of raising a million of money to carry on the public works of the colony. This I deny absolutely. I say that was not intended under the proposals contained in this Bill, and if we did intend to borrow money we should not do so unless the House gave its assent in the ordinary way. Now, Sir, let me deal with several other points raised by honourable members. Some honourable members seem to think that, because clause 35 refers to the Consolidated Stock Acts, it is the intention of the Government to use the money in some way other than that intended, or in some way other than that in which we would have the House believe it is to be used. Now, I am prepared to do what I think will absolutely remove the scruples of any member of this House who really desires to give the people of the colony a system under which they can invest their earnings in such a way as will insure their getting a reasonable return on their money. I am prepared to have the same method made applicable to the proposals in this Bill that is now applied to the funds in the Post-Office Savings-Bank of the colony. There can then be no misunderstanding about the matter, and no such thing as the Government collaring the money to use it for any purpose other than that intended. I am prepared to have an amendment put into the Bill in Committee to say that any money which may be invested or contributed under this system shall be paid into a separate account, and a return laid on the table of the House in the following year, precisely in the same way as is done in connection with the Post-Office Savings-Bank. That, I think, Sir, will effectually remove the objections of honourable members.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh!

Mr. WARD.—It is all very well for the honourable the senior member for Wellington City to laugh; but I say the proposal I am now making is one which will effectually remove this money from the ordinary disposal of the Treasurer of the day; and that is what I am prepared to do in order to make the Bill thoroughly effectual. Let it not be supposed that the Government want to take advantage of any member of this House. What we want to do is to have a system such as this initiated in the colony, so that the people may be safeguarded in investing their money.

Sir R. STOUT.—What about conversion?

Mr. WARD.—Well, Sir, if it will be of any service to the honourable member, I am prepared to strike clause 35 out of the Bill altogether, and also to strike out clause 7. Is that sufficient for the honourable gentleman? I am prepared to do more than that. I can assure the House that there is a misunderstanding about the proposal. The whole object of this is to enable the people of the colony to invest their savings in a system of Consols, and to give a more productive system to them than exists at the present time in the colony. If honourable members want to understand how this system has been used in the past, let them carry their memories back to the time of the Franco-Prussian war, when Consols were issued by the French Government. These the French peasants and others took up largely. Large sums were invested under that system. When the system was started in France, money that had been stowed away was at once unearthed by the people of the country. As for talking of borrowing under this Bill for carrying on the public works of the colony, I say it never was intended; and, if honourable members, when the Bill goes into Committee, will accept the amendments which I have suggested, and which I am prepared to cordially agree to myself, all objection on this score must be removed. I can only say, in conclusion, that it appears to me that honourable members on the other side of the House have not been able this session to criticize the proposals of the Government in a fair manner. They seem to have been afflicted with a plethora of words such as I have never before heard in this House. It has therefore been necessary for me, for the purpose of exposing the misrepresentations of those honourable members, to take up the time of the House, upon this and other occasions, when I should not otherwise have done so. It seems to me that those honourable members are resorting to the old tactics, the tendency of which is to, if possible, cripple the finances of the colony. I would ask, What ruined the Grey Government? What ruined the Stout-Vogel Government? Was it not that the honourable gentlemen who were on that side of the House were continually decrying the Government? Sir, history repeats itself: those honourable members are doing the same thing now, in the hope that they may, by this process, succeed in ejecting the Government from office. But, Sir, they will, I think, find on this occasion that they have undertaken a much more difficult task than they imagined.

Mr. BUICK.—As a matter of personal explanation, I wish simply to say that the Colonial Treasurer has rather misunderstood me as to the action I intended to take. I did not say that I would support a loan of £1,000,000. I said it would be more satisfactory if he came down with a straightforward proposal to borrow this £1,000,000. The Treasurer has also misunderstood me when he supposed I was against this system of Consols. I said that the prime motive of the Bill was a good one. I am not opposed to the principle itself, but I object to several of the provisions in this Bill by which the principle is to be given effect to.

9.30. The House divided on the question.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES' DEPOSITS BILL.

Mr. WARD.—In moving the second reading of this Bill, I wish to explain that the principal object in introducing it for the consideration of the House is to insure that people who do business with life, fire, and marine offices in this colony shall have some security in connection with the business that they may offer to such offices. By way of prelude, I may say that the draftsman has, in connection with life offices, inadvertently allowed the Bill to apply to some of the large mutual life offices carrying on business in this colony, and in Committee I shall be prepared to put that right. As the Bill stands, it has, I believe, under their articles of association, the effect of putting some of the mutual offices in a position which it was not intended, when the Bill was being prepared, that they should occupy. The desire is not to interfere with the strong offices doing business in this colony, but to insure that, in the case of offices that are perhaps not strong, people doing business with them shall afterwards not find out that they have made a mistake. The object is to make the Bill as fair as possible, and to enable that to be done a sliding scale has been drawn up, which will be found in the First Schedule of the Bill. In connection with policies it is proposed that, where the amount assured by current policies does not exceed £20,000, a deposit of £5,000 is necessary, and for every additional £20,000 of assurance there is to be an increase of £1,000 in the deposit, until the total sum deposited amounts to £10,000. One of the objects of the Bill is to get a deposit of £10,000, either in cash or approved securities, out of foreign offices proposing to carry on fire insurance, or marine insurance, or fire and marine insurance business in the colony. This has, I may say, been modified somewhat since the proposal was first made in the Financial Statement. It was at first intended to have a deposit of £20,000, but upon going into the matter the Government came to the conclusion that that might have the effect of unfairly forcing out of the colony those offices at present established here which, though strong, are not doing a large business. It was not the desire to interfere with such offices, but to insure that people doing business with them shall have some guarantee as to their stability. It is also intended to prevent foreign companies with limited liability from carrying on business in this colony, and those already established from continuing such business after the expiration of six months from the coming into operation of the Bill. This provision appears to be desirable, as, in face of the policies which some of those offices issue, it is impossible for one who does not know what is comprised in their articles of association to comprehend what their conditions really are. Accident insurance offices are also brought under the provisions of the Bill. There have been in the colony some offices which have not treated the people doing business with them in such a way as they ought to have done. There is on record here at the present time the case of one office carrying on business in the colony—I am referring to a fire insurance office—which took up risks, and afterwards got into difficulties, and the people who paid their money for the risks found themselves in the position of being unable to even get the premiums returned to them. I think it is desirable that this important matter should be dealt with, and if the Bill can be improved upon, or if any honourable member may think that the proposals will unduly affect foreign offices carrying on business in the colony, I shall be only too happy to consider in Committee any reasonable suggestions. I might also say that honourable members will see that there can be no such thing as imputing the proposals of this Bill to a desire on the part of the Government to obtain money. By referring to the Bill, honourable members will see that it is quite optional for offices carrying on business in the colony to deposit approved securities; if they elect to deposit money, however, they may do so, and that money will be deposited in the Public Trust Office, and bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent.

An Hon. MEMBER.—In what?

Mr. WARD.—The money will be invested by the Public Trustee in the ordinary way.

Mr. DUTHIE.—In Treasury bills?

Mr. WARD.—The money would be at the call of the offices, and, should they at any time desire to take it out and substitute ordinary securities such as I have named, or if they give up business, the money would be returned to them at once.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Six months afterwards.

Mr. WARD.—Provision is also made for offices, if they desire to do so, to substitute colonial stock for ordinary securities. That will be at once accepted. I desire, Sir, to move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. Ward

Sir R. STOUT.—I do not know that there is much to criticize in a Bill of this description, but, as it has been called a policy Bill, I suppose that is sufficient excuse for criticizing it. There are many objections to be made, and I will first deal with what is an important item—that of life assurance. A life-assurance contract is a long contract, and the risk extends over a great number of years, and there may be a reason for asking that a life assurance office should therefore give some security to policyholders here, if that office is not a New Zealand office. I do not think, however, that the same deposit should be insisted upon where the contract is not long extended.

Mr. WARD.—I propose to have that dealt with in the Bill.

Sir R. STOUT.—This one provision in regard to life companies may be necessary, but then the security should not be fixed at the same limit. So far as fire and marine offices are concerned, they are in quite a different position. A fire risk is only a yearly risk; a marine risk may be for less than a year; and, although it may be necessary to insist upon security for a life office because the risk is so long, and may be extended for so many years, it is useless to interfere with fire offices, for the risk is simply a yearly risk, and is entirely different from a life-office risk. A man may insure for fifty years, and never have a fire; and I leave it to the House to say whether the same security should be given in the case of a fire office as in the case of a life office. In general a fire office only takes a year's risk, and all the time this colony has been in existence there has been no case where a fire risk has not been paid by any foreign office.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Yes.

Sir R. STOUT.—I know that there have been risks not paid, but I meant there had been none unpaid because the company was not able to pay them.

Mr. SEDDON.—There was a case in Auckland.

An Hon. MEMBER.—And in Wellington.

Sir R. STOUT.—What is the name of the company? I have never heard of such a case. I ask honourable members to recollect also that the fire offices cannot take all the fire risks. That is another point. The life offices—for example, the Government Insurance Office—will take almost all the life risks asked for, up to a certain limit; but, so far as fire insurance offices are concerned, the local fire insurance offices cannot do all the fire business that is offered to them. Not only can they not do all the fire business, but honourable members know that up to last year even the foreign offices in the colony could not undertake all the fire risks they were asked to take, by merchants and others, because they had a limit. What, then, will happen? If you, by any legislation, make all the foreign offices discontinue business here, the injury would fall on the commercial community. You will not get your risks taken up, in the first place; and the second injury will be that, if you limit or restrict the business of certain offices, you will raise the risks, and you will call upon the insurers to pay this deposit, for the money will come out of their pocket. The more foreign offices there are, and the larger those offices are—the greater the encouragement you give to foreign offices—the lower will be the rates of premium for your fire risks. Suppose by any legislation you prohibited fire offices from coming to this colony, what would follow if you were limited to the four offices belonging to New Zealand? I think there are only four: the National, the Standard, the South British, and the New Zealand: if you attempted to limit the fire business to these offices, what would happen? They could not safely undertake all the risks that would be offered to them; they could not take one-tenth of the risks; and consequently, if they did, they would have to charge such a premium as would practically prevent persons insuring their property.

Mr. WARD.—A number of the foreign insurance companies have their securities here now.

Sir R. STOUT.—Some of them may have double or treble the security. They may have invested the money in various ways; but that is not the point. The point is, why should the State undertake to say they have to look after the security of the people who are dealing with commercial business? Why restrict it to fire insurance companies? Why not apply the same principle to companies who are doing business in other directions of commerce? Why not apply it to persons who are carrying on a large produce business, for example? And why not also apply it to the banks?

Mr. WARD.—Why insist on banks having a reserve of coin?

Sir R. STOUT.—If the honourable member knows nothing more than that about the banking business of the colony he does not know much. I am amazed to hear that statement. The honourable member ought to know there is no analogy between the two cases at all. The reason why a coin reserve is required is that the coin reserve must be held against paper money, which is a monopoly which the State has delegated to certain institutions. There is no analogy to this argument at all. There are a great number of commercial businesses carried on in this colony. We may have a company or a private individual starting in Wellington, who may buy wheat to the value of £100,000, or frozen meat, or butter: is the State to step in and say, "You are not to conduct your business of purchasing unless you deposit a certain amount of security with the Government"? Then I could understand the argument. It would mean that no grocer would have the right to start business in the White City of Oamaru unless he was prepared to deposit so many thousand pounds with the Colonial Treasurer. Before he can sell he has got to buy, perhaps, from the wholesale dealer. If you are going to say no person is to carry on commerce until security is given, to what extent will you carry that principle out? As far as fire insurance is concerned, it is purely a commercial transaction, which only lasts a year, and it is not like life insurance. A certain event must happen; there may never be a fire; and there is no analogy between the two cases. What will be the result of a policy of this class? It first limits your competition, and that will necessarily raise your risks; and it will be utterly valueless as security. What is the deposit to be under this Bill? Honourable members will see by clause 5 of this Bill that every fire and marine insurance company doing business in this colony is to deposit £10,000. What is £10,000 in the case of a big fire? It is nothing at all. What is it in the case of a marine risk? Nothing at all. It is giving no security at all. And, if you are going to insist on foreign offices making this deposit, why not insist on local insurance companies doing the same? The local company may be in debt; and what security is there in that case? If the Government are to stand between the large insurance companies and these local companies, then you must insist on these local companies giving certain approved securities to the Government before they can carry on this class of business. I submit that this Bill cannot have any beneficial effect. It affords no security to the persons having fire insurance; and what, then, is its object? Simply to worry and harass foreign companies which are doing business here; and, if it tends to drive them out of the colony, what will be the result? I again repeat, it will simply injure those people who have to obtain fire risks, because the rates will be raised, and the insurers will have to pay for these deposits. I have a letter in my hand, addressed to the Colonial Treasurer by several insurance companies, and I understand that there is only one local insurance company that has not joined in the protest. The other six companies, that have not joined in the protest, are large English companies, and possibly they may think that if they can get a monopoly, by legislation such as this, it will be very beneficial to them, and they therefore do not want to join in this protest. I was surprised to find the number of companies carrying on business in New Zealand. This protest is signed by twenty-three companies carrying on business in this colony. Two of these are local companies, and, I understand, one other local company joins in this protest. What is their argument? They protest against the proposals of the Government, and the reasons they give are these:—

"1. That the proposed protection has not been demanded by the public.

"2. That it is a distinct advantage to the public and to the commercial community generally for foreign insurance companies of high standing to be established in New Zealand.

"3. That the four local companies established in New Zealand could not conduct the business of the colony without the aid of foreign insurance companies.

"4. That Government interference with ordinary commercial transactions is strongly to be deprecated.

"5. That the Bill, if it became law, instead of affording increased security to the public, would tend to weaken the power of companies to make good their losses, as the strength of insurance capital lies in its being held in a concentrated and liquid form, under immediate control, to meet necessity at every point.

"6. That the principle of the Bill is unsound, and if similar Bills are enacted elsewhere the result would be that insurance capital would be disintegrated and scattered, and unavailable for application to its special purposes.

"And, finally, we would respectfully suggest that, instead of placing further disabilities upon the insurance offices domiciled in the colony, and who materially contribute, in license-fees, income- and land-taxes, and stamp duties, to the revenue, the Government should seriously consider the advisability of placing a tax upon the large amount of insurance premiums contributed in this colony to companies and underwriters not established in New Zealand, to the manifest loss of revenue to the colonial Exchequer, and to the disadvantage of the companies operating here."

Now, there are two points mentioned in this Bill to which I have not referred. I wish to refer to them now. The first is, What must the effect be on our local companies? Now, some of our local companies have got agencies in London, America, California, and in all the other colonies—Victoria, New South Wales, Tasmania, South Australia, and Western Australia. If these companies are compelled to pay £10,000 as a deposit in every place in which they start business, what will result? Their capital will be so dissipated that it will be impossible for them to have that capital put out in such a form as to enable them to take risks, and it will simply prevent them from competing in foreign places; so that by this Bill you are really injuring our local companies, and doing them no good. The next point is this. We will take, for example, a company that starts here, and that wishes to withdraw from the colony, and gives notice to insurers that it will continue to insure their properties. The whole of that insurance can be effected in London. There will be no stamp duties, no license-fees, no revenue from clerks and offices. That company will be carrying on business without having a local habitation or a name in New Zealand, and without paying a single penny to the revenue, and yet doing business in the colony. The Colonial Treasurer, as a businessman, will know what often happens. We will suppose there is a block of buildings in Wellington, and the owner wishes to get £20,000 on the block. He may go to the local office, and they may say, "We will only give you £10,000"—or £15,000—"on the block, and our margin is 10s."—or 15s.—"per cent." "Oh," says the owner of the block, "I can do better; I will write to my agents in London,"—and he gets it insured perhaps for £20,000, at, perhaps, 7s. 6d. per cent. Now, that class of business is done. I know it is done. I have had one transaction myself, and have seen others. And what is the result? If you force this insurance to go to Australia or elsewhere you will not get any revenue from fire insurance. You will lose your stamp duties, your license-fees, and you will also lose something more. Having a foreign office located here, it means not only some employment to clerks, but also rent of offices, and so forth. So that, as far as this Bill is concerned, you are going to get no advantage. You are injuring your local offices, because you will have similar legislation, perhaps, proposed in the other colonies, and there your local offices will be prevented from entering into competition with other offices. And what is the value of this part of the Bill? I repeat, again, it is only a yearly contract, so far as fire insurance is concerned; but so far as marine business is concerned the insurance is for the voyage. It may be two years, on a long voyage. But, generally, when insurances are effected for a long voyage the insurances are effected in Home offices, and not in New Zealand offices at all. I therefore ask the House not to agree to the principle laid down in this Bill so far as fire and marine offices are concerned.

Mr. DUTHIE.—My honourable colleague has so fully dealt with this measure that I do not intend to occupy the time of the House many minutes. In so far as the proposal relates to life insurance, I do not think that under the present law there is a sufficient deposit required in the colony; but, on the other hand, and in so far as fire and marine insurance is concerned, the deposit named in the Bill is altogether unnecessary. It will prevent new offices opening here, and will make it not worth the while of certain offices to carry on. In regard to life insurance, I think the Treasurer ought to agree to a scale in proportion to the business done: that would be more suitable, and would not drive insurance companies from the colony, and deprive it of the advantage of competition or of the different tables the offices offer. In regard to the question of limited-liability companies, the Treasurer has intimated that he will meet the objections raised, and there is no need for me to deal with that. Passing to marine and fire insurance: it is pointed out by the protesting companies that there has been no demand by the public for any Bill of this sort. Commercial people are quite competent to look after their own affairs, and quite able to discriminate as to which are really sound insurance companies and which are to be avoided; and, so far as the insurance companies are concerned, there has been no call on their part for any legislation of this sort. Nor can the Government point to any transaction that has called for this legislation. The effect of this Bill will probably be to defeat the object the Government have in view. It will not bring deposits into the Treasury to any extent; but a good many offices will withdraw, and continue to do business without an office in the colony. Traders must get cover, and will again be driven to insure outside the colony, with all the attendant inconvenience. Then, similar legislation may be adopted in other colonies, and our New Zealand companies will be called upon to find similar deposits wherever they are doing business. It will be a great disadvantage to the insurance companies to have their funds tied up in this way. They will be deprived of the use of so much capital, deposited with the various Governments, and not available to pay losses when such occur,—because, unless the company winds up or withdraws, its deposit must be maintained. But where the Bill will principally defeat its object is in respect to marine insurance. We know now that the principal exporters from New Zealand do not do business in the colony; it is done entirely in London by means of the cable, which is cheap and available. There is no difficulty to any firm in covering risks to much better advantage in the English market. And wherever you load insurance companies with disabilities and restrictions, as proposed, you will throw them out of the race in competition, and it will result in a sharp restriction of business, in the loss of stamp revenue, and in bringing no advantage to the insuring public. I am surprised at the Treasurer, with his commercial experience, bringing forward such proposals. I think, at least, if we pass the second reading, the Bill should then be withdrawn.

Mr. MCGOWAN.—I think the two honourable gentlemen who spoke last have hardly put the case fairly before the House. The senior member for Wellington City referred to the difference between a life policy and a fire policy, one being for a long period and the other being only for a year; but he forgot to mention that the year policy might cover a larger amount than the life policy, and it is just as important that the public should be guarded with reference to insurance risk in one case as the other. The object of this Bill is to prevent mushroom companies coming into competition in New Zealand, and I think honourable gentlemen who have any knowledge of the affairs of insurance companies know that companies have been doing business on such terms as were not safe. That the result of such a measure may to some extent increase premiums no sensible man will doubt, but it is much better that the public should pay a fair premium for a secure risk than have a risk worth nothing because the premium happens to be cheap. I do not mean to say the clauses in the Bill are all that they should be; but that some security is required from foreign companies doing business in New Zealand I think all right-thinking individuals will be prepared to admit. The whole question resolves itself into this: Is it wise that the colonist should be secured against the risks that are taken by, I might almost say, bogus companies—is it wise that there should be some protection for people who are not prepared to protect themselves?

Mr. PIRANI.—Sir, I can give instances from actual experience showing the necessity for the Bill, and it surprises me greatly that the members for Wellington City, who ought at least to know something of the circumstances I am about to speak of, are so ignorant of what has occurred in the town they represent. A gentleman of the name of Baird purported to be the general manager of a company belonging to New South Wales—I forget the name, but I think it was the Colonial Fire Insurance Company. He established himself in business here, and opened agencies throughout the Manawatu and Hawke's Bay districts. Business went on for about twelve months, and during that time there were about twelve risks at least in which fires occurred, and not one single risk was met after the fire. It was a very great hardship in my own district to a number of farmers and business people, and I feel sure that, if it had not been checked by publicity in the newspapers, such companies would be running the same game now, without any check from the large business firms that have been spoken of as people who could be trusted to find out the true character of such bogus companies. It is absolutely necessary that the public should be protected from swindles of this character, and more especially in regard to insurance. It is a thing that, above all things, should be safe and secure; and, if it is not to be so, we might just as well do without it. I am pleased to see that the Treasurer has introduced the Bill, and trust that, at any rate, the main principle will be passed into law, and act as a check against further swindles.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The honourable gentleman has afforded an instance of the vague and loose way in which the most important subjects are frequently approached in this House. He began in the most indefinite manner to state to the House that he "thought" the name of a certain company in this city represented by Mr. Baird was the Colonial Fire Insurance Company; then, further, that "about" a dozen men in the Palmerston district had held risks that had not been met.

Mr. PIRANI.—I can show you the names and policies of sufferers.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—In an equally vague way he states that a number of farmers—a large number—a dozen is not a very large number—and business-men had suffered because of the defalcations of this company, and that were it not for the exposure of the bogus business of this company a still further number would have suffered. The cases he speaks of cannot have been of any extent or importance, or they would be familiar to the senior member for Wellington City and his colleague. Both are quite ignorant of these cases; and I for one, though living in the district for a good many years now, have never had these cases brought under my notice. And supposing there have been a few defalcations, can the honourable gentleman name any business in which some do not occur, and will he therefore argue that the Government must necessarily step in with special legislation to protect people against their own indiscretion? Surely those people who insure with bogus companies do not take proper precautions to ascertain the business soundness of the institutions which offer to take their risks. The Bill under discussion is another specimen of the eternal meddling of this Government in matters they do not take the trouble to understand. The Treasurer has been blamed for bringing in this measure, but I feel satisfied that it was not introduced at his instance, because his business knowledge would not prompt him to bring in such a Bill. The real reason is to be found in the frequent use of the word "foreign"—foreign companies. It hits a shallow public prejudice; and any stick is good enough to beat a dog with, and instances of this are cropping up in this House continually. New Zealand should be the last country in the world to talk about foreign companies and foreign capital; because it has been from the beginning of settlement much more than ordinarily indebted to the assistance afforded by foreign capital. The effect of this Bill would necessarily be to increase the price of insurance to every farmer and business-man throughout New Zealand; and though there are so many so-called foreign companies competing in New Zealand, great difficulty has been experienced in covering the risks attached to some of our largest business concerns. Take, for instance, the costly establishments owned by the freezing companies: to my knowledge, and with all the competition that exists, a difficulty is frequently experienced in covering their risks satisfactorily, and it is only by the distribution of risks amongst the so-called foreign companies that the business of these freezing companies has been carried on successfully. I do hope, as far as the fire-companies portion of the Bill is concerned, that the Treasurer will reconsider the position, and realise that it affords no security whatever to the public to have £10,000 deposited by each of them. What is £10,000 compared with the serious risks which these companies undertake in many cases? It affords no protection whatever; and I hope to see these foreign companies rather increased in number, because we shall then have business people, farmers, and all those interested in insurance, able to insure at a rate much lower than they can at the present time. Do honourable gentlemen realise the enormous difference between the premiums which we in New Zealand have to pay compared with the rates current in the Home-country? And is it by the provisions of a Bill such as this that New Zealand insurers are to be relieved from the heavy premiums they have to pay? I therefore hope, as far as fire and marine companies are concerned, that the Government will allow them perfect freedom to go on in the future as they have been doing in the past. I have no interest in the business of any of these companies, and hold no shares in them. My only aim is to encourage the investment of insurance capital, so that the public generally can get their risks covered on the most favourable terms.

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—I recognise that this Bill is of such great importance to the mercantile community that I think I should not be doing my duty if I were not to say one or two words in connection with it. First, what is the position of foreign companies so far as New Zealand land is concerned? We must not forget that they are now paying a tax for the privilege of carrying on business in New Zealand of £300 a year. In addition to that, they pay an income-tax on their profits. They occupy as a rule large buildings, and they pay municipal rates, and employ a very large staff of clerks to do their work. Before we attempt to do anything which will interfere with the carrying-on of this business in New Zealand we should be very certain that we shall get some corresponding advantage. What I am afraid of is this: that one of the results of passing this Bill will be that some offices now carrying on business in New Zealand will withdraw rather than submit to the terms set out in this Bill. The result will then probably be that traders who even at the present time cannot get sufficient cover will get even less; and men who are employed in business in the large centres will have to take correspondingly greater risks, which means in the case of a fire absolute ruin. Some little time ago, on another Bill, I heard from the Government benches certain remarks about close corporations. If this Bill is passed I believe it will lead to close corporations being formed in connection with certain fire insurance companies, and the result will be, as was pointed out by the honourable member for the Thames, that insurance rates will be considerably increased; and I think that at the present time we are suffering from premiums which are exorbitantly high, and anything which will tend to raise them will inflict a burden upon the people of New Zealand. I do not think this Government ought to attempt to inflict such a burden upon them. There is another question. If the New Zealand Government insists on deposits being made by foreign companies it is extremely probable that the Australian fire and marine insurance companies doing business in New Zealand will instigate their Governments to impose like terms upon New Zealand offices, and, as the capital of New Zealand companies is extremely limited, it will mean that they will not be able to carry on a business in those colonies, and will have to confine their operations to New Zealand. In addition to that, if these foreign offices close their New Zealand business the whole of their colonial staffs will be dispensed with, and any one who knows anything about the labour-market, so far as the clerical profession is concerned, will realise that to have forty or fifty clerks thrown on the labour-market in New Zealand will be a very serious thing for those engaged in penmanship. This Bill will press heavily, in my opinion, mostly on the poorer parts of our population. Those engaged in mercantile transactions, or in large trading concerns, will simply get insurances effected by open cover in London. The premiums will be paid in London, and the result will be that a large amount of business will be lost in the colony. I hope that, when this Bill gets into Committee, the clause relating to fire and marine insurance companies will be either struck out or very considerably amended. Again, there are in this colony some companies carrying on business as fire and marine insurance companies with a very large capital, and under this proposal they would be required to make a certain deposit. Then, there are other smaller companies carrying on business as fire offices only: they will have to make the same deposit as offices carrying on both fire and marine business. I think that provision is unfair to the smaller offices, and I think that in Committee the amount to be deposited by fire and marine offices should under certain circumstances be materially reduced.

MR. BELL.—I understand the Colonial Treasurer to say, with regard to life insurance companies which, being first formed many years ago, have a few shareholders as well as a mutual fund, that he does not intend the Bill to apply to them. I understand him to assent to that, and that he will accept amendments which will make it clear. With regard to fire companies, I really wish to put this to the Colonial Treasurer—there is no party question involved in a Bill of this kind: I would ask him, is it not quite clear that at the present time we cannot afford to do without the large companies? Is it safe for the New Zealand companies to stand alone? Let us take, for instance, large companies like the Liverpool and London and Globe, the Sun, and the Royal. Take those three together—there can be no question about them. Any man who knows anything about business prefers to insure with one of these large companies, letting them reinsure. Then, there is the case of the Liverpool and London and Globe. It is a life insurance as well as a fire insurance company, but it refused to do life insurance business in New Zealand after the passing of the Life Insurance Policies Act, because it was required to give security. That company said it was not worth its while to submit to such terms. Perhaps it is rather a high and mighty tone to take, but we have to consider it, because that is the tone the companies are likely to take. I hope the Treasurer will consider that point before the Bill goes into Committee. There is a great deal in what the honourable member for Palmerston said, and what the Colonial Treasurer said in introducing the Bill—namely, that the public do want protection in the matter of bogus companies; but it would be very easy to provide that. The Bill should be prospective, and not retrospective—that is, that fire and marine companies which may come here hereafter to do business should be required to make a deposit; that no companies should be able to carry on business, other than the companies carrying on business here now, without making a deposit. I have very good ground for believing that the result of this measure will not be to bring £10,000 or £20,000 here at all: not because the companies are not able to invest that money here, not that it would not be a good investment, but they are likely to say, "After all, our business in New Zealand is not so very large as to induce us to depart from our principle and give security." They will not give security, because it would be submitting to a kind of indignity. That is the attitude which the larger companies are likely to take up. The object of the Bill will be obtained if the House simply provides that, for the future, every insurance company which comes to do business in New Zealand shall, in addition to the provisions already required by law, deposit with the Public Trustee sufficient security to cover all possible risks. That, no doubt, has the look of protection about it, and it might have that effect; but I think it would at all events prevent the establishment of any bogus businesses such as the honourable gentleman fears. I do not think there are any companies now carrying on business which are not safe, or which would be rendered more safe by the mere deposit of these small sums with the Public Trustee. As the honourable gentleman knows, the only thing which can bring a fire company down is an immense conflagration, and then companies go down like ninepins. With regard to life insurance companies, I submit to the honourable gentleman that this matter requires reconsideration. The sum he is taking is too large in some cases and not too large in others. What is required is that there should be a sufficient deposit in proportion to the amount insured. Then, why is a bank deposit-receipt excluded from the allowed securities? There seems no reason against it, except the reason suggested by the Government—namely, that those deposit moneys are drafted away to foreign countries. I can assure the honourable gentleman there is no foundation for that; and great hardship will be inflicted on these companies if they are not allowed to invest moneys in securities of that kind—investments which, I may point out to the honourable gentleman, are allowed to private trustees at the present time.

11.0. MR. WARD.—In replying on this Bill, I desire to say that the proposals contained in it relative to fire and marine insurance offices are not oppressive. I may say that in the Cape Colony, in the United States, and in Canada offices of this class have to deposit the sum of £10,000.

SIR R. STOUT.—In some of the States.

MR. WARD.—Yes; in some of the States, and in the Cape Colony and in Canada. I think, Sir, that it is admitted that there is a necessity for such a Bill as this. The arguments which have been adduced against the proposal are deserving of consideration; and when in Committee—as I indicated in moving the second reading of the Bill—the Government will be prepared to consider any reasonable proposals which are calculated to improve the Bill.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, in asking the Council to read this Bill the second time it may not be out of place to remind honourable members who were in the Council at the time of the reason which led the then Government to make the change which was made by the Railways Act of 1887; and it may perhaps be interesting to other honourable members who were not then here to tell them also the same reasons. Sir, the then Minister for Public Works, in introducing that Bill in another place, stated that the country was clamouring for a change, that there was nothing but dissatisfaction right throughout the railway service, and that, at any cost, this clamour should be set at rest. He also said, I think, so far as I remember, having glanced through his speech—a very able speech, delivered on that occasion in 1887—that he himself had been very much opposed to the change, but he thought that public opinion was in that direction, and tended so much in that direction that he had become a convert to the scheme. Sir, it will be in the recollection of honourable members that one of the great desires on that occasion was to get what are known as experts—experts in railway management. Victoria had taken the lead, and Victoria had one of the most magnificent systems of railway management perhaps known—but Victoria's experts have cost them something; and New South Wales, not to be outdone in the management of railways, got experts also, with a result that is probably well known to honourable members. Queensland followed also in the same lines: and it was so fashionable that New Zealand thought it a proper thing to do to get experts also. I have never ceased to think, speaking for myself individually, that one of the great objects of the change at the time was to get rid of some objectionable—to some people, not to me—some objectionable officers in that department. That, I think, was pretty widely circulated all over the place at the time; and how far the change has been a success is a matter well known to every one. This Bill was introduced in December, close upon Christmas-time, when it became necessary to hurry a great many matters through the House. The Bill was introduced then, and it is a very curious fact that the present leader of the Opposition in another place and the present Premier, who was then a private member of the House, were in accord upon this question. They were of opinion that it was undesirable that a change should be made; but the clamour for the change was so great that it was considered that the railways should be handed over from the political control of Parliament and from parliamentary influence to a body irresponsible—I should say, to an irresponsible body. I would only refer to one portion of the honourable gentleman's speech, and I will not weary the Council by any very long remarks upon the question.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Hear, hear.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I am glad to hear my honourable friend say "Hear, hear," because I am sometimes accused by him of not giving very full information on matters which come before this Council. I am pleased to see that my friend is still my friend, and comes to my assistance on this occasion as he has done on many others. I will, however, call attention to one short remark by Captain Russell, who, I believe, leads the Opposition in another place on the present occasion. This remark is, I think, worthy of the attention of honourable members. Among other things, he said,—

"Though I now think that it may be my duty to vote for this proposal, I cannot but think it is a serious reflection upon parliamentary government when we admit it is impossible our railways could be managed by the chief legislative body. It is as much as to say that we have been continually doing what we know to have been wrong, instead of insisting on what is right being done. I do not believe that under the proposed Bill we shall get much better results from the railways than at the present time."

Well, Sir, that was the view held by both honourable gentlemen, as I have stated, and that was the view held by many other members of that branch of the Legislature upon that occasion, and that is the view that was held by myself, although I said nothing in this Chamber, because I saw that it was impossible to do anything, as honourable members in another place approved of the measure. It was not carried unanimously, and a reference to Hansard will show how it was rushed through Committee in that House by force at an early hour in the morning until it reached this place. Sir, when it reached here the late Hon. Sir Frederick Whitaker, who was then Attorney-General of the colony, in a very able speech in moving the second reading.

of the Bill, said it was an experiment. It was an experiment, and the same reasons which exist now existed then for a change in the administration of the railways. Sir, at the last election public opinion demanded that the change now proposed should take place; that there had been nothing but dissatisfaction right throughout the whole of the railway service; and it is hoped, by the restoration of the control of the railways to a Minister of the Crown, that, at any rate, there will be more responsibility, such as has not existed during the last five years. I am not going to find any fault. I should be very sorry to find that any language of mine is misinterpreted. I have no fault to find with those gentlemen who have managed the railways. I believe many of them did their duty honestly and conscientiously; and I believe some are able men, though I am not going to individualise them. But the same reasons for a change that existed in 1887 exist now, and have caused the Government to introduce this Bill to restore possession of the property of the railways to Her Majesty the Queen to the same extent as before the change was made in 1887. Sir, there is only one feature in this Bill which calls for remark. Under the Bill of 1887 there was no Board of Appeal, but under this Act it is proposed to create a Board of Appeal, the Board to consist of a District Judge, a representative of the railway employés, and a representative of the officers of the Railway Department. That Board of Appeal will have authority to regulate every matter about which dispute may come, and which is brought under the notice of that body. There are other small provisions in the Bill which are of a mechanical or technical character, and do not require any comment at the present time, as they can more properly be dealt with in Committee. Honourable members will also notice that on the Supplementary Order Paper I have given notice of several amendments which, I think, will be beneficial to the Bill. These also are matters which can be considered in Committee. Sir, it is the fashion, I believe, in many places to allege that this Council is not in touch with public opinion, and that this Council resists public opinion. I have never been a party to holding that view, but I say that this Council has resisted what has been alleged to be public opinion until it has ascertained what was public opinion, and, having ascertained that, it has fallen in with it, and carried out the voice of the people as honestly and as earnestly as any other body. I do not think I have any more to say in moving the second reading of this Bill. It is practically a restoration of property, valued at over fifteen millions, handed over to a non-political Board, as it was called at the time: it is now to be revested in Her Majesty the Queen. I move, That the Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—This Bill is very different from the one which was sent up here last year. The Bill last year was similar to the one which was introduced in another place this year, and it practically gave control of the railways to the Government without throwing upon the Government responsibility in connection with their management. This Bill logically carries out what I know some people are in favour of—that is, that the railways should be under direct State control. Now, I think that this Council acted wisely last year in treating the Bill which was brought up then as it did; but I also think the time has now arrived—that is to say, there has been a sufficient expression of public opinion—to justify the change which is now proposed. I personally do not agree with that change. I think it is a retrograde step; that the colony will come to repent of it yet; and that, instead of its being in any way an improvement, it is a decided disadvantage. Now, the Attorney-General has referred to what took place in Victoria and New South Wales. If honourable gentlemen will study the Acts under which these Railway Commissioners existed there, they will find that they were very different from those which governed the Railway Commissioners in this colony. The Railway Commissioners in this country were placed in office not for the purpose of constructing lines or recommending their construction in any way—that is to say, it was not part of their duty; but they were put in control as experts, and as men above political and other influences, to carry on these railways in what may be termed a businesslike manner. Now, I venture to say they have been eminently successful in that. There has been a very large amount of traffic conducted, and there has been, practically, immunity from accident. The department, I think, has been well officered, discipline has been maintained, and I think the whole colony ought to be congratulated on the way in which the railways have been managed during the last five years. I cannot help thinking that this so-called cry for a change in the management is confined to very few. I say, relatively, to few: at all events, they do not represent those who are immediately connected by business relations with the Railway Commissioners, because the business-men and the settlers who have dealings with the Railway Commissioners, taking them as a body, I believe, have approved of the present management. It is perfectly true that complaints have been made from time to time by the farmers that they could not get their grain carried at such rates as they thought it should be carried at, and there have been other complaints made; but there is no public department against which grievances will not be raised, and respecting which grievances may not be supposed to exist. I maintain that the three late Commissioners—namely, Messrs. McKerrow, Maxwell, and Hannay—were eminently successful in carrying on this business in a satisfactory, successful, and enterprising manner. And I maintain that the change now proposed is one which is a retrograde movement, one which is brought forward merely to give expression to the clamour of a section of the community, and not in the direct interest of the colony. I need not take up the time of the Council further on that question. There are several amendments which I think are necessary, and I see the honourable gentleman has given notice of certain amendments; but whilst this Bill vests all the property in Her Majesty the Queen—that is to say, removes it from the Railway Commissioners—I think there ought to be more distinct provisions making Her Majesty the Queen liable for all rights of action which now exist against the Railway Commissioners. The Bill is rather peculiar, as it states that all rights, powers, duties, et cetera, are to be vested in Her Majesty the Queen as against the Railway Commissioners; but with regard to the rights of workmen who may be injured, and the rights of persons who may have claims against the Railway Commissioners, it does not seem to effect a transfer of what I might call actions in tort or wrong done against the Railway Commissioners. The liability is not transferred to Her Majesty, and I think the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill will see that in order to do justice it will be necessary to make that provision.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Look at subsection (12) of clause 4.

The Hon. W. DOWNIE STEWART.—I have looked at it, and it states as follows:—

“All rights, powers, duties, and obligations now by law conferred and imposed upon the Railway Commissioners are hereby transferred to Her Majesty; and all references to the Railway Commissioners in any statute or regulation thereunder, or in any Order in Council, Proclamation, or other similar instrument, shall be construed as references to Her Majesty.”

It appears very much as though the existing obligations of the Railway Commissioners in regard to accidents—that is, injury to goods or harm done to passengers—will not be transferred. I think the Bill should provide something to this effect: that all rights and claims which might exist against the Railway Commissioners may be enforced as against Her Majesty. Although I do not approve of it, I shall not oppose the Bill, simply because I think the matter has been fairly ventilated, and the party in power are giving expression to the opinion of those who sent them there. I think, however, the measure is one which may be very dearly bought.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—Sir, the honourable gentleman who has just sat down has told us that the management under the Railway Commissioners has been eminently successful. Of course, that is a debatable point, and it is one which I am not going to deal with. But I might remark that the prosperity of our railways depends not only on their successful management, but to a great extent upon the prosperity of the colony as a whole. In dealing with a question like this we have to look at it in that light. The Commissioners may have been eminently successful, or they may have been the reverse; but the prosperity of our railways in itself would be no sufficient argument for or against the appointment of Commissioners, or a reason for the control of the railways reverting to the Government. Sir, I support the Bill, and I am in favour of it for the reason that it proposes to put right a wrong that was perpetrated in 1887, because I think that such an institution as our railways should never have been put beyond Government control and placed in the hands or under the control of irresponsible persons. We have been told that one of the objects in so placing the railways in the hands of these people was to obviate the occurrence of political influence in respect of appointments. Now, if that is so, I think it is more desirable that the Government of the colony should have the power of making appointments to the service than that three irresponsible persons should have a like power. There is often a cry about political influence, and we hear occasionally about “the right colour” when appointments are made by the Government; but, taking all that into consideration, I say it is better that people holding responsible positions like the Ministry should have the power of making these appointments rather than persons who have no responsibility other than that which appertains to their office: the one might lead to political patronage, but the other might lead to nepotism. If there is anything at all in the argument that it is desirable that the railways should be continually under this independent control, I say all our Government institutions should be conducted on a similar basis. We should have Commissioners to run the Post and Telegraph Department, and Commissioners to run the Government Insurance—we had them at one time and they proved a failure; and we should also have Commissioners to run the Public Trust Office: but we have found from experience that the Government is quite capable of conducting its own enterprises without taking advantage of the services of persons quite outside, and who are irresponsible. Now I come to this: What are the New Zealand railways as an institution? If any one has seen the large railway institutions of other colonies or countries, the fact that strikes him is that our railway system in New Zealand is a mere one-horse show, and no more to be compared with the railway systems of other countries than a wheelbarrow is to be compared with a coach-and-four. As it is, if a man happens to miss a train he feels himself growing old while he waits for the next one. Yet, in order to run this one-horse show and to carry on this enterprise we have had three men doing the work of one. Let us look at the matter from a practical point of view, and from the point of view from which any business-man would conduct an enterprise. Would any man conducting such an enterprise employ three men to do one man's work? Sir, that is exactly the position in which the railway service of this colony has stood since 1887: so I welcome the return to Government control, because I think it is possible for the Government to appoint an Under-Secretary or a General Manager, or some officer of that sort, who will run the railways just as economically, and probably more so, and quite as much to the advantage of the country, as the three Commissioners who have been running them during the past six or seven years. In looking over the Bill, there is one provision which I confess I do not quite understand. That is in regard to the appointment of a Board of Appeal. This Board is not a Board of final appeal, because it is provided that, though the Board of Appeal may give a decision, it must be afterwards ratified by the Minister. In the question of imposing fines the Board has no jurisdiction. The appeal is left to the Minister, and I cannot understand why that should be so. I think a Board so constituted should give satisfaction to everybody concerned.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Look at the amendment on the Order Paper.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—I confess I have not read that amendment; I am going by the Bill.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—That is provided in the proposed amendment.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—Then, again, it is provided that the Board shall have power to decide any questions brought before it other than appeals against fines. But it is a very short time since we passed the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, which is now a law, and, that being so, I think it is desirable that the questions on which the Board shall decide and determine should be set forth in this Bill; otherwise I think there is likely to be a collision between the Board so set up or the Minister and the Court of Arbitration set up under the Act I have referred to, passed recently. Under the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act the railway servants have the power, if they think fit, to bring any grievances they have before the Court of Arbitration, and the decision of that Court is to be final. Yet, supposing that a decision of the Board of Appeal under this Bill is also to be final, it is hard to say in what position we should really stand. There, it seems to me, is an element of weakness. But these are matters, of course, which can be set right in Committee, and I rose for the purpose of expressing approval of and of supporting entirely the principle of this Bill, and I shall vote for it.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—Sir, of course I am very well aware of the political exigencies of this case. We are all well aware of the habitual ingratitude of all democracies, and we have had abundant experience in this colony of the injustice with which some of our best public servants have often been treated. Recognising all that, I do not exhaust myself in surprise at what some honourable members have said in relation to this measure; but I think we should do better to remember the old proverb, "It is well to be off with the old love before you are on with the new," and do justice to the servants we have had before proceeding to consider the kind of service that is to await us under this measure in the future. It is with a desire to contribute a quota to that view of the subject—one which, I think, is worthy of the consideration of the Council—that I wish to make a few remarks on this occasion. My honourable friend Sir Patrick Buckley, in introducing the Bill, exhibited his usual skill. It is a very marked skill, for he touched the several subjects lightly, suggested a good deal, and committed himself to very little. But, Sir, I appeal from Sir Patrick Buckley, the advocate of this measure, to Sir Patrick Buckley, the just man, whose mental equipoise is, I think, undisturbed by party bias. I ask him now if Mr. J. P. Maxwell was not an invaluable public servant.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I always said he was.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—I am glad of the admission. A comparison was established between our Railway Commissioners and those of Victoria and New South Wales. Sir, the Commissioners appointed in Victoria began by demanding nearly a million of money for the purpose of putting the railways in an efficient condition, and the Railway Commissioners in New Zealand from the first moment had the greatest difficulty in getting a few thousands of pounds.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They wanted £44,000.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—But they did not get even £44,000, and I wish to do justice in this matter; and I want my honourable friend to understand that I am not a partisan. I say we should not expect more from our institutions than we are likely to get out of them; but we ought to be fair to our public servants. As to the comparison, I have no hesitation in saying that the Victorian lines were run in a most extravagant manner, and yet, in many instances, the service was not as good as our own. Taking New South Wales, the system introduced into the management of the railways there was one of conducting them regardless of expense; and the principle laid down by the Chief Commissioner was that they had nothing else to do than to establish a splendid service, and it would attract traffic. What was the case with our Commissioners? They were left without means, and face to face with the problem of an extremely unpopular service, which had been conducted on political, commercial, and, I might add, romantic principles. With a hostile country, narrow means, and a rather feeble support from the Government, they set to work to effect reforms; and what was the result? They increased the efficiency of the service, they increased the returns, and they put the whole system, in the teeth of a great many difficulties, on a business footing. Now, Sir Patrick Buckley says that the original Act was introduced owing to the unpopularity of the service prior to the passage of that measure in 1887, and the inference clearly was that that unpopularity attached to the General Manager, Mr. Maxwell.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—He was put there by the Ministry who introduced the Bill.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—That has nothing to do with my case. I want to show that we should be just; and it is absolutely true that it was the intense unpopularity of Mr. Maxwell with a large majority that led to the passage of the Bill appointing Commissioners. We cannot doubt that. And what did the Government do? They retained him. And why? Because they could not get any other competent man. I know absolutely that they could not get any other competent man. I do not want to say they could not get any man, but they tried in England, in Victoria, and in America. The colony was not prepared to pay what was necessary in order to get an expert of equal merit. Why did not the Government, seeing that Mr. Maxwell was in its service, and was admittedly a first-rate man, under these circumstances make him Chief Commissioner? They hampered the unfortunate man with a surveyor—an honest, trustworthy, hardy Scot, but one who knew as much about railways as I do, and that is mighty little. They hampered Mr. Maxwell with a cautious and carefully-trained official who had worked in harness successfully under the inspiration and control of various Ministers of Lands—they put him in as Chief Commissioner to manage the railways. Was that giving Mr. Maxwell justice?

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—That is my case, as far as the Railway Commissioners are concerned. Now, what does all this show? Simply that Mr. Maxwell has been a wonderful public servant, for, although hampered on every side, he has effected administrative wonders; and we ought to be grateful to him. As for the dissatisfaction in the service itself, let us see what that dissatisfaction amounts to, and how it arose. The railway hands on the various railway-lines were absolutely taught that no man should have a salary of more than £500 a year, and that the higher branches of the service were constantly being fostered to the neglect of the others. I know the case of an official who was chief engineer in charge of the locomotives in this colony. His salary was a very small one, not more than £800 a year, and I do not think it was so much. I ask anybody to consider the enormous amount of wealth that was at the disposal of that man's judgment and wisdom,—to consider what economic results depended on his fitness—a man who, in any other country in the world, having such a valuable plant under his superintendence, would have been getting a very handsome salary indeed. The truth is, there are certain classes of servants whom you must pay well if you want economical administration; and the men working our lines must be taught that you cannot equalise salaries, but that they must, by merit and intelligence, make themselves worthy of the higher positions. I have as much sympathy with these men as anybody in the country, and I do not believe there was any great discontent among the great mass of these men, but what there was I believe was fostered by misrepresentations. However, I would say one word more in relation to this matter of Mr. Maxwell. No Parliament can administer a railway system; and it will be found by experience, as it has always been found, that you must have an empire complete in itself. You cannot be for ever changing the machinery; otherwise failure will result. My honourable friend Mr. Rigg said that the appointment of these Railway Commissioners had led to the practice of nepotism. I should like to ask the honourable gentleman if these Railway Commissioners ever appointed any of their relatives to offices in the service. Can he tell me that is so?

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—I might explain that I said no such thing.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—You used the word "nepotism."

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—I said that the control of our lines being in the hands of irresponsible persons might lead to nepotism, and I thought that was just as bad as what is termed political patronage.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—I understood that you alluded to nepotism in connection with the Commissioners.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—No.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—It appeared to me to be so said in regard to appointments in the service. But I say there has been nothing of the kind, and that complaint is absolutely baseless, as are other complaints made against these Railway Commissioners. These men rendered invaluable assistance to the colony at a moment of great public difficulty, and we shall be fortunate indeed if the colony ever again gets officers like them.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—The honourable gentleman who has just sat down referred to Mr. Maxwell; but on looking over the Bill I find that the two late Commissioners, Messrs. Hannay and Maxwell, seem to have been carefully excluded from the benefits which it appears will be given to the present holders of the office of Railway Commissioners. In subsection (5), clause 4, it is stated,—

"The two preceding subsections shall also apply, mutatis mutandis, to the persons holding the office of Commissioners at the date of the passing of this Act who were in the Civil Service of the colony at the commencement of 'The Government Railways Act, 1887.'"

That appears to carefully exclude the previous Commissioners, Messrs. Hannay and Maxwell.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—No.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—I understand it does, and I cannot read it otherwise; but if it is not the intention it ought to be made clear, as this clause seems to exclude the former Commissioners while it includes the present ones. Of course, the effect is that, whereas Messrs. Maxwell and Hannay were paid Civil servants at the time they were appointed Commissioners, by this clause they are excluded from the benefits which might have accrued to them as Civil servants had they remained a certain time in the service of the colony, for they would have been entitled to a retiring-allowance based upon their length of service. I think the compensation is a month for every year's service. According to this Bill they are absolutely excluded, as I read the Act, from any benefits. But if the Colonial Secretary assures me that it is the intention of the Government to consider the claims of those gentlemen I have nothing more to say on that point. Of course it can be easily amended in Committee. I will only say that it does seem to me that the colony has every reason to be grateful to those gentlemen for the very efficient way in which they managed the railways for years past. So far as I am able to gather, I believe that the colony as a whole is not in favour of the change proposed, and that, so far as the users of the railway are concerned, they would very much prefer having the services of the Commissioners. I refer to the late Commissioners, as I know nothing about the present Commissioners. The late Commissioners unquestionably did their work well in every way, and deserve the confidence of the colony, and, that being the case, I doubt very much whether there is anything like the general desire alleged to prevail for the change of policy that is here indicated. As the Hon. Dr. Grace said, of course there are always a certain section of the community who are anxious for change, and they will certainly clamour for it until they get it. But, as far as I am myself competent to judge, the people who use the railways are not at all anxious for this change, and certainly there has not been any general clamour for it. Take the different Chambers of Commerce all over the country, and you will find that, without any exception, they are strongly opposed to any change being made in the system of employing Commissioners to manage our railways. The Canterbury Chamber of Commerce, at a meeting on the 8th instant, passed the following resolution: "That, in the opinion of this Chamber, the interests of this colony will best be served by a continuance of the present system of management by Commissioners free from political control." That resolution was passed after a full discussion on the Bill as it originally came before the House. They examined it and discussed the question from a more difficult point of view than if they had been discussing it now, because one of their main objections was that the Bill as originally brought down proposed a sort of double control. The Bill, however, now before the Council is less injurious in that respect, as it proposes to do away with the Commissioners entirely. I myself would rather have had the Commissioners as we are accustomed to see them and the railways placed entirely beyond political control than have had our railway system made a political system under political control. The result, we shall probably find, will be mischievous, and if we decide to try the experiment I am afraid we shall have to pay for it. There can be very little doubt about that; but I should very much prefer returning to the system of direct Government control, rather than to revert to the half-and-half system originally proposed. I am glad to see that the alterations have been made in another place which have given birth to the present Bill. As to the argument against placing the railways under the control of an independent Board,—that if

that system is good in the case of railways it ought to be applied in all other departments,—that by no means follows, for the simple reason that many of the departments are simply of a mechanical kind, and go on in a regular routine, such as the Post and Telegraph Department, and they are perfectly easily managed by the ordinary political head; while railway management does unquestionably require the services of experts—that is, of people who have to regard the whole question not only from a mechanical and technical point of view, but from the point of view of general business. It appears to me there must necessarily arise a very great evil in the management of our railways when that management is constantly subject to political pressure—the pressure of constituents who want grain rates lowered in one place, and who want rates on something else lowered in another, and who desire all sorts of changes in the timetable, and everything else, which, no doubt, locally, may be very convenient, but which, when considered in relation to the railways as a whole, must prevent their being really as useful to the country as they would be when conducted on different lines. I do not see how it is possible that railway management under political control can escape this political pressure. It is inevitable. We have already had the experience, and that experience has shown it was necessary to make the change which we made in 1887. I remember being quite convinced at that time that the success of the experiment would entirely depend upon the persons appointed to conduct the railways. All I can say now is that the experiment has been eminently successful. The railways have been conducted in a very efficient manner, as regards both the convenience and the safety of the public, and they have steadily increased in their net proceeds, so that last year we find they were paying something more than 3 per cent., and there is no reason to suppose that they would not continue to pay reasonable interest, of course subject, as the honourable gentleman properly observed, to the general condition of the country. Of course every one will admit that this condition would have a very large effect upon the success of our railways—certainly so far as their paying is concerned. Well, I can only regret that, having tried this experiment, as the honourable gentleman said, and having found it successful, we should now think it necessary to try another experiment—the experiment of reverting to the old system. I am not at the present moment prepared to oppose trying this experiment. I think that, under the political conditions of the country, it is an experiment which has become inevitable. I only hope that the details of the Bill may be altered in the direction I have pointed out, so as to do no injustice to the gentlemen who have given such valuable services to the country, and who certainly deserve to be treated with the utmost consideration by the Government and the people.

The Hon. Mr. JENNINGS.—Sir, several honourable gentlemen who have spoken on this subject have entered into a defence of the Railway Commissioners. It is not my intention to say one word against the past Commissioners, good, bad, or indifferent. I think the Bill is one which deals with a wider question—that is, whether the railways shall be under political control or not. Personally, I am strongly in favour of their being under the control of the Government, and there are very few reasons, I think, that could be given why they should not be under that control. The Hon. Dr. Grace, in referring to the Bill, stated that no Parliament could regulate railway management. Well, there is a work with regard to Germany and its State railways, and I think my honourable friend will agree with me that it answers his particular objection very well. Herr Maybach, in speaking in the Reichstag, in 1888, of the control of the railways in Germany, said,—

“This year we have made a surplus of fifty-one million [marks] beyond the amortisation of three-quarters per cent.; and next year we expect a surplus of forty-nine millions, which can be applied to other State purposes. Last year we were able to make a surplus which exceeded by twenty-nine million marks the entire interest on the national debt [of Prussia], and we hope next year to make a larger surplus still when we have built several small lines in order to complete the railway network. This year we have laid aside 784,500 marks for the improvement of the salaries of the officials of private lines taken over by us—a total of 9,700,000 marks applied to this purpose. Moreover, we have made considerable financial sacrifices in order to give railway employes rest on Sunday. Go through the country, and ask the people whether or not the nationalisation of the railways has benefited them. You will hear from the overwhelming majority a loud ‘Yes.’ (Loud applause from the Conservatives.) When, after a few years, we have completely surmounted the difficulties of transition we shall be able to tell what the State railway administration can do. I am not altogether dissatisfied with what it has done already, but I think it will do better still.”

I could also quote instances of the very successful working of the railways in Belgium, which have been under State control for many years. The Hon. Dr. Grace also stated that the Railway Commissioners here had had very little money to work upon. Well, if he will hunt up the Public Works Statement of last year he will find that the Railway Commissioners demanded, in effect, no less a sum than £714,914. I think every one will admit that this is a fair amount in a small colony like this for three irresponsible gentlemen to have the handling of. But the main point in it is this: that the other place could not get any information whatever about the expenditure of that money. Therefore I think that is really a very strong ground indeed for the people's representatives requiring and demanding a change, so far as railway management is concerned. It is simply a question of whether the railways shall be under political control or no control at all, for that is what it amounted to, so far as the Commissioners were concerned, during the last five years. There are several other points, but I do not wish to take up the time of the Council. I might refer to the many requisitions and demands that have been made to the Commissioners in the past. I will, however, only refer to one instance, and that is a small one. A number of people who reside at Avonside and Helensville wanted the trains altered to suit the requirements of settlers and working-men living in those places, but the Commissioners resolutely set their faces against it, and would not alter the trains to suit the great majority of the people. This is only one instance out of a great multiplicity that have occurred all over the colony of a similar character. I believe if the railways were under Government control these little irritations that have existed in the past would be done away with. The railways are not, in my opinion, to be run simply for the purpose of making a great revenue out of them. I think there is a greater object in the railways than that. The object should be to open up the country, and to suit the requirements of the people, and I think by having these railways under Government control we shall obtain that end. I should also, if I could in any way, further a scheme that has been promulgated by a very well known man in Auckland, and perhaps many honourable members have heard of him—that is, Mr. Samuel Vaile. I should certainly be glad if the Government could, now they are dealing with these railways, see whether it was not possible in some way to assist that gentleman in carrying out the views that he has so persistently and earnestly advocated year after year. Many great reforms and many great projects of honest people have been laughed at and ridiculed when first brought before the public. In fact, the very man who first took the system of railways into serious consideration—Thomas Grey, of Nottingham—was treated as a madman. Many people laughed at him, as many people laugh at Mr. Vaile; but I think that a man who has shown so much earnestness, and who has spent so much money out of his own pocket in trying to further his scheme, is worthy of the consideration of the Government, and if they could in some manner give him an opportunity of proving whether he is right or not I do not think it would be a very great tax on the colony if it were tried on one section of the railways. If the Government could see their way to do that, a very great object might be achieved. I have very much pleasure in supporting the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Sir, we are going to have political management now. My honourable friend opposite has suggested that Mr. Vaile should try to get his views carried out now, for now is the time to have all experiments tried. There is the great danger, I take it, of political management—that we may be subject to every rash experiment that may be urged by politicians interested or disinterested. However, I am not going to discuss the question of Mr. Vaile's plans, except to say that I think the chief fallacy at the bottom of his suggestions is that he wants to apply a system which has been tried with some success in a very populous country to a country that is not populous. Now, I must congratulate my honourable friends on the Government benches on having brought down a policy Bill which will be accepted by the Council. But the reasons for which it will be accepted are various, and very dissimilar in character. In the first place, there are a large number of members in this Council, as well as in another place, who believe that it would be advisable to keep the railways out of reach of political control. It has been found in Europe and elsewhere that political control has been most disastrous in the management of railways. An honourable gentleman opposite quoted Germany, but I would remind him that Germany is not exactly a country in which politicians of all shades can interfere directly with the management of the railways.

The Hon. Mr. JENNINGS.—But they do.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—No, Sir, they do not. In France they do, and it has been found exceedingly difficult to manage the railways economically in France in consequence of this interference. In France some of the railways, as honourable gentlemen know, are in private hands, and some are in the hands of the State, and it has been found that interference, political interference, has led to great corruption and mismanagement.

The Hon. Mr. JENNINGS.—What about Belgium? They have State railways there.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Yes, in Belgium the railways are State railways, and they work better in Belgium than anywhere else. It is a remarkably small country, and the management is a strictly business one—not political. But the question before us now is this Bill, and I say I believe a great many honourable members feel, like myself, that the time has come when we must accept political control, lest a worse thing happen to us; because we have seen that it is possible to interfere, as we thought the Government could not interfere, with the control and management of the Commissioners. Sir, a little while ago, when we had Commissioners not directly subservient to the Government, the backbone was taken out of the Commission, deliberately taken out of the Commission, and since that time the Commissioners are simply the servants of the Government for the time being, and, I am afraid, are under other influences too. From what we have heard, the position of employes may be dependent on unacknowledged and irresponsible pressure from below. I must say that I would myself a great deal rather see the railways in the hands of the Government, who are directly responsible to the people, and who can be brought to book for what they do, than see them in the hands of a Commission which is nominally responsible, but which is really only a cloak to conceal from the public the real wielder of power. The Government have destroyed the independence of the Railway Commissioners. Let them openly take over the responsibility. I should just like to refer to what has been said about the House of Representatives not having been able to get information from the late Commissioners. I think the honourable gentleman said that information could not be got in another place. Sir, if the honourable gentleman inquires, he will find out the reason that information could not be got there: if the House of Representatives had insisted upon getting information, they could have got it; it has never been shown that there was any intention or desire on the part of the Commissioners to withhold it. There was one expression used by my honourable friend the Colonial Secretary in bringing in the Bill which I must protest against, and that is, that the Bill has been brought down owing to the great dissatisfaction in the country with the management of the railways by the Commissioners. Sir, the Bill was not brought down at all in its present shape. It was brought down in a totally different shape, and I think honourable gentlemen will agree with me that it was brought down in consequence of a desire on the part of the Government to subordinate the Commissioners to the Government. I am not blaming the Government more than their followers for their desire to absorb power;—some people think that the Government ought to be omnipotent. It was not because of public dissatisfaction that the Government dismissed the late Commissioners; it was not because there was dissatisfaction on the part of the people who used the railways. There was singularly little dissatisfaction in the country. The system was gaining strength, and only required the loyal co-operation of the Government. This it did not get, and therefore it did not get a fair trial. The late Commissioners had a very difficult task to carry out, and I think they did it remarkably well under the circumstances. They could not possibly have been a very popular body, having such duties to perform. I think they did their work honestly and fearlessly, and I only hope it will be done nearly as well by the Government; but I have my doubts. I also hope that the Government, if they find that they are not able to conduct the railways as they were conducted before their interference last year, will come down here and tell us so honestly, and ask us to put back the control of the railways into the hands of a body totally and absolutely independent of political influence, or, at any rate, as independent as it is possible to make it.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—I may say I am thoroughly opposed to the Bill now before the Council. I believe the change is one which will be very injurious to the interests of the colony. I would far sooner that the late Commissioners were there for two or three years longer, to see whether they had not the confidence not only of the Legislature but of the public. Hitherto, I believe, they have had that confidence. I consider they have done their duty, and that the colony is largely indebted to the Commissioners for the way in which our railways have been managed.

Hon. Mr. Bowen

An Hon. MEMBER.—The present Commissioners?

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—No; I do not know anything about the present Commissioners. I am talking of the late Commissioners, and I think that the colony is highly indebted to them for the manner in which they performed their duties. I hold that the present Bill will open the door largely to jobbery and corruption. There is no doubt there will be influences brought to bear on the Ministry of the day, whoever that Ministry may be, by members of Parliament, and the Ministry of the day will give way in all probability in order to retain their seats, and to secure the votes of certain honourable members. The result must be that the colony will be the sufferer. I believe, Sir, that if party government did not exist in this colony it might then be safe to leave the railways to the administration of the Government, because the Government, in point of fact, would not be selected as it is at present, under party organization, but would be selected so as to be composed of all the best and most capable men to carry out the duties devolving on our administrators. It has been said in another place that since the change of Commissioners has taken place there have been a number of dismissals and reductions in the railway service, and it has been proved by these statements that these reductions and dismissals certainly were not carried out with much credit to the parties concerned. I am not aware that as yet these statements have been contradicted, but I can understand perfectly well that there must be some foundation for them, otherwise they would never have been made. The honourable gentleman, a representative in the other House, who made these statements I know to be a thoroughly honourable man, and he would not have made the statements unless he was perfectly satisfied of their truthfulness. As I said before, I am thoroughly opposed to the principles of the Bill, but I should not feel justified under the circumstances in voting against its second reading. Such being the case, I shall not record my vote either one way or the other. I shall show my opposition by not voting on the question.

The Hon. Mr. KERR.—I am in favour of this Bill, and will support it. I cannot see that we should hand over the railways to Commissioners while we maintain all other services under political control. We have not suffered from having the Post and Telegraph Department under political control, or from having the public works of the colony under the same control; and I cannot see for my life why taking the railways under political control should have the damaging effect some honourable members would lead us to believe. Now, I am going to vote for this Bill, believing that it will be serviceable. I am rather surprised, after some honourable members who have taken part in this discussion have said all that it was possible for them to say against the Bill, that they wound up by saying that they will support it. One honourable gentleman I was very much surprised at, because he is an old politician, and one who generally speaks and votes consistently. The Hon. Mr. Stewart regrets that the change must take place. He said that the change was only wanted by a few parties, that it was a retrograde movement, and not in the interests of the colony; and yet he concluded by saying he was going to vote to pass a measure that is not in the interests of the colony! That is something that I cannot understand. The Hon. Mr. Pharazyn spoke in a somewhat similar strain. He objects to the political control, and says that it will be mischievous, but, nevertheless, he is not prepared to oppose the Bill. I think those honourable gentlemen who entertain those opinions—that it is mischievous to the country, and likely to do the country a great amount of harm—ought to vote against the Bill. As I said at the commencement, I have not much to urge, unless I go over all the different views that have been explained by Councillors, not only to-day, but last session, and generally in conversation. It is generally admitted that it will be a good thing for the colony to have the railways worked as other departments are worked, under the political control of the country, and, seeing that every precaution is put in to relieve the workmen—such as a Board of Appeal—and that their interests are conserved in every respect, I think it is a piece of legislation in the interests of the general mass of the people, and that it will have a very beneficial effect, and give railway facilities to the inhabitants of the country. I have no doubt the wants of the settlers will be much better attended to, that freights will be reduced, and the traffic on the lines increased. Altogether, I think this Bill may be safely passed. The country will then have the management of the railways, and the people will be responsible to themselves. I have often looked into this matter, and considered that it was not in keeping with good government to give over our principal works to three or four men who have no responsibility. We might as well give over everything else to irresponsible people and get them to manage for us. What would be said supposing we appointed two or three men to look after public works, and gave them carte blanche to spend money as they chose without giving an account of it to Parliament? The thing, in my opinion, simply amounts to that, and I think it is time the railways were under the control of the people.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—It seems to me to be quite forgotten that there is nothing new about this at all. We had this state of things before for a great many years, and it ended in failure. When we had it before we were so disgusted with it that we were willing to consent to the proposal to have an English Commissioner—a high-price man—sent out to put our railways in good working order, and have the best management possible. Instead of a Chief Commissioner being brought out three gentlemen who had the misfortune to be New-Zealanders were appointed; and that was quite enough, the fact of their being New-Zealanders, to place them within the reach of everybody, and from the day they took office to the day they retired they never had fair-play in the country. Nevertheless, I think it is only due to Mr. Maxwell especially to say that he retires from his office with the respect of everybody, and with the name, well earned, throughout all Australasia of being by far the best railway manager in these waters; and, if it can be any satisfaction to him to know it, I think we are bound to give him that praise. Moreover, I think it was an unfortunate thing that a somewhat brusque manner, and nothing else whatever, caused the reaction against him that culminated, first of all, in his not being made the chief expert, and, secondly, in his having to retire at the termination of his term of office,—which has been, so far as I have always heard, eminently successful. It is quite impossible for a man to satisfy everybody, and any gentleman who looks into a newspaper published about the time referred to will see that it was one perpetual course of correspondence raised far and loud in various parts of the colony for certain concessions; and, of course, the refusal of these things, it not being possible to grant them, raised a certain amount of carping all through the country; and, even if the Commissioners appointed had endeavoured to grant the concessions demanded, I think that cry would not have been put down very easily. At all events, when their time came to an end, it appears they got into an impossible position on account of the ridiculous proposals of some of their servants, and, in order to get over the difficulty, and to consult the views of the people, and to scatter about large sums of money, even under parliamentary control, the original intention was set aside. At any rate we shall know who is responsible for the future, and, although the management of the railways in the past by Government was a failure,—and we can only hope that it will not be so in the future,—we shall have had the advantage of having had the railways under the control and management of experts for some years, and may hope that the result will be far better than it otherwise would have been. At present the benefit to all parts of the colony from the railways is not at all equal; there are parts of the colony which get all the benefit while the rest of the colony is handsomely taxed to pay for it. In many parts there are no railways, and yet those portions have to help to pay the interest of the debt; and I think our taxation should be more equalised. I wish to speak hopefully as to the future, and I shall be satisfied if the Minister of Railways is able to conduct things in the future as well as they have been conducted under Messrs. Maxwell, Hannay, and McKerrow; at the same time, I think a great deal of credit is due to those gentlemen, who have done so much. The case of the Prussian railways has been referred to, and their management by the Government, but there is not very much to crow about on these railways, as they give a very moderate result indeed; they are not so good as our own.

Hon. Sir G. S. Whitmore

An Hon. MEMBER.—They have been very much improved lately.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—I can only speak about what I really know, and I do know that they were some years ago much inferior to our lines. I think they have the broader gauge, but they are very much more costly, and the Government control is a very poor one.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They pay better than the company lines.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—I have no idea, but I think they do not pay so well as the company lines. A comparison made the other day showed that the private lines were far better managed than the Government ones. As regards this Bill, I did not desire to make any further remarks, but I wished to add my testimony to that of the other honourable gentlemen who have spoken as to the success of the administration of Mr. Maxwell, and I say, further, that our railway system has been enormously improved by him since the day we took it away from the Government control.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY.—With regard to this Bill, it seems to meet with general approval. Some honourable gentlemen are going to vote for it although they are in favour of the control by Commissioners, and others are going to vote for it because they believe in the Bill and hope it will pass. I shall vote for it also, because I have always opposed the appointment of Commissioners; therefore I can speak in favour of the Bill with a clear mind. It seems to me that those honourable members who think that a department of State of the magnitude of the Railway Department can be placed beyond political control are labouring under a delusion. Parliament is omnipotent in the matter; and it is simply impossible in this country, where every man and woman has a vote, to limit political control. The only way I know of by which railways could be placed beyond political control would be to sell them. Would that satisfy the colony? Certainly not. The railways then would pay, because the country would be taxed tremendously to make them do so, and because they would be run in the interests of the shareholders, and not of the country. The interests of the shareholders only are kept in view by private corporations. With regard to the late Commissioners, I have not a word to say against them. No doubt both Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Hannay were very good administrators. I came into contact with both gentlemen frequently during past years, and I always found them to be thoroughly good officers; but it is not on that ground that I oppose them, or any other Commissioners, but it is on the ground that Parliament must have the control of its own departments. That was why I opposed the appointment of the Commissioners. Parliament must have the control, and will have the control, in spite of anything that may be attempted against it. In America, which has a written Constitution, a department might be placed beyond the control of Congress, and it would be extremely difficult to restore it to such control, owing to the rigid nature of the Constitution; but in a country like this, which is absolutely under the control of the people, I do not see how even the people can do away with the political control, and it is therefore very unwise to attempt it. What we ought to do is to put safeguards on the administration, and to put Ministers in power who have a little backbone—people who can face the country and resist the clamours for things that are not desirable. Under the system of direct political control it is, to my mind, inevitable that we ought to have a good departmental head. One of the first things the Government should do is to get a first-class man as General Manager, and we ought then to defer a great deal to his advice in respect to administration. Of course, Parliament must have a voice in the matter. We do not run the railways for the sake of making 3 or 4 per cent. profit, but we run them in the interests of the persons who use them. The General Manager must give way on points of policy, but on all mere details I think the Minister ought to be guided to a large extent by the General Manager's view of the matter. I do not see why this Railway Department cannot be managed efficiently by the Government and by a Minister, just the same as any other department. I shall therefore support the Bill, as I think we should never have taken the railways away from political control in order to place them in the hands of irresponsible Commissioners.

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON.—I wish to say a few words, and I do so because I had very much to do with the action taken in 1887 in connection with this matter, and previously. I was in the House of Representatives at that time, and I remember I strongly supported the appointment of the Railway Commissioners. I spoke, on the occasion of the passing of the Railways Bill in the other Chamber, under a sense of very great responsibility, having had control of the railways to a certain extent, as Minister for Public Works, for many years. From my own experience, I can only say, in reply to those persons who think it is very easy for a Minister to control the railways, that the next Minister who attempts to control them will find it a very different matter from that represented just now. I am not going into a long discussion on the question, and I only rose to explain why I am going to vote for the second reading and to support the Bill now before the Council. I think it is due to myself and to this Council that I should do so. The honourable gentleman, in introducing the Bill just now, stated, very correctly, that Victoria was the first to start placing its railways under the management of Railway Commissioners, and New South Wales followed suit, then Queensland; and, lastly, New Zealand, to be in the fashion, followed suit also. That is just what we did not do; for, unfortunately, we did not vote a sum equal to that voted by the other colonies for a Chief Commissioner. Parliament considered that the money voted was quite enough to command the services of a very good man. I protested—I think it was about four o'clock in the morning—against the amount fixed, but the Government insisted on passing the Bill through, in the early hours of the morning, and they had their way. It is also quite true that the Government did make attempts to get a Chief Commissioner, and if the Government had had sufficient backbone they would have got one, and I feel sure that the country would have supported their action. They could have got a man, and more than one man, quite as good as any one of those they were getting for Victoria or New South Wales had they chosen to take the responsibility of offering a larger salary than that given. My object in supporting the Bill then was that we should have a Chief Commissioner from outside, and that the other two men should be got in the colony—to have a first-class expert from outside, in whom the outside world and the colony would have confidence; and, when that was done, to get two of the best local men in the colony. What railway expert did they put in? They put in a man who had not an iota of an idea about the management of railways, and they not only put him there, but, in the position he occupied under the Act, he had the right of veto on every single question, if he chose to exercise it. I am not going to say one single word against Mr. McKerrow; I believe that in the position he has occupied he has done the best he could; and I cannot add anything to what has been already said in favour of those two gentlemen—Messrs. Hanney and Maxwell. I believe in Mr. Maxwell thoroughly. He came out here with other engineers when we could not get any engineers in the colony, and from the very first day he was in the colony he showed a most remarkable amount of ability. Not only so, but before he left the shores of England, I believe, he was asked to remain there and take up a better position. I know, myself, that on various occasions afterwards appointments were offered him at a far higher salary in England had he chosen to accept them. If the Bill as introduced in another Chamber had come up here, I should have been found opposing it, and I think the Government have shown very good tact indeed in sending the Bill here in the shape they have; otherwise I should have opposed it. I shall support the Bill, and I only hope that who ever has the luck to be Minister of Railways will be able to withstand the frightful amount of worry to which he will be subjected day and night, from Christmas Day to Christmas Day; he will be worried and badgered for favours of every description. Whatever may be the position he takes up he will be bound to give offence, and eventually bring great odium on the Government. I shall support the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. BOLT.—I only wish to say a few words, and I do so merely for the sake of demurring to some of the statements made by some honourable gentlemen. We have been told by Sir George Whitmore that the control by Government prior to the Commissioners coming into office was a failure. I demur to that. I do not think it was; and, if it was not quite so successful as the Railway Commissioners' control, I think that can be fairly explained. The Government started with the railways very inefficiently equipped in many ways. There were lines that were not joined with one another, the system was practically incomplete, and it had only reached its present stage of efficiency when the Government surrendered it to the Commissioners. They entered into a field which was quite ripe for success, and we had every reason to expect they would be successful. The Government had no such opportunity. Again, the Hon. Mr. Stewart told us that this Bill is the result of clamour from a small section of the people. I demur to that statement also, for what he calls clamour is practically to be found to date from 1890, for in that year the first cry was got up against the Commissioners. I need not refer further as to the cause of that cry, as the main reason is known; but I do say that the opinion has been growing in strength that this department of the public service should revert to the hands of the Government again. My opinion is that it was a great blunder that the railways were ever put into the hands of the Commissioners, as I do not think that any large concern like this, in a democratic country, should be lodged in the hands of a few irresponsible men. The fact is that management by the people is the very principle of democratic government. We have a large annual expenditure on our railways, and the Government have no control over that expenditure, and on that ground alone, if on no other, the management should revert to the Government. Again, I would ask, for what purpose have we railways in a young country like this? The cry when the Commissioners took office was that our railways should be conducted on what were called commercial lines—that they should be conducted for profit-making; but now I think a great many people are beginning to see that, in a young country like ours, at any rate, the wisest policy with regard to our railways would be to develop the resources of the country as much as possible. You cannot carry them on on commercial principles if you carry them on to the greatest advantage to the country. I have no idea of casting, and I do not wish to cast, the slightest slur on the Commissioners in this respect, for they carried out the mandate of the people when they took office; but they have conducted the railways too much on commercial lines, and I think that may be seen from the fact that more encouragement should be given to many of our industries, which are still hampered. Even this session there has been a proposal to put a duty on fruit to encourage fruit-growing, and I venture to say that, if railway facilities had been given to fruit-growers in this country to bring their fruit to town at moderate cost, there would have been no necessity for any such proposal. That is one case in point as showing that the Commissioners have run the railways too much on commercial principles. I must say that the legislation which put this department into the hands of the Commissioners appears to be amongst the last of a long line of Conservative legislation, which practically closed in 1890, and which, I believe, was kept up mainly by the old cry to mistrust Government action. The other colonies also took up the same cry. But what do we see now? All round we see miserable failure in every respect with regard to this question. We also see failure such as the history of the world has never seen before in the commercial management of every institution, such as banks, et cetera. The opinion is fast gaining ground that if you want to have a thing properly controlled, honestly controlled, it must be controlled by the representatives of the people; and to say that we shall do away with political control, as the Hon. Mr. Kelly has pointed out, in a democratic country such as this, where every boy—at any rate, every youth—and girl of twenty-one has a vote, is nonsense. You have appointed your Commissioners, and they are appointed under certain conditions by the people, but you cannot get away from democratic institutions, for, as a last resource, it must come to political control. The Commissioners are created by the people, and therefore to say that you are going to manage the railways without any political control is a mistake. As to management, there is no difficulty in getting an expert if an expert is necessary, any more than in getting an expert, say, for the Defence Department. I think the theory holds good that if you manage your Customs, Defence, Post Office, and Public Trust Office under direct Government control you can manage this department also. There is a direct disadvantage in not having this department under Government control. It is quite true you may be able to avoid some of the evils connected with Government control by having a department under Commissioners, but you must also bear in mind that it is a great disadvantage for a country such as this not to be able to express its wishes, desires, and wants directly to the management. This can never be done through the Commissioners, as the people have no means of approaching the Commissioners directly—only an indirect means; whereas with regard to the Government the wants of the country can be expressed directly to the Government. I say that putting the control of this department in the hands of the Commissioners was a slur upon parliamentary institutions and upon parliamentary government, which should be remedied as quickly as possible. We are not going to hark back in this way to individualistic methods; we have seen too much failure already in those methods. I shall support the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I did not intend to offer any remarks on this Bill—and those I shall make will be very short—had it not been for the reference the Colonial Secretary made to the speech of the Minister for Public Works in 1887, on the occasion that the Act now about to be repealed was introduced. The impression the Colonial Secretary gave to the Council was that Mr. Mitchelson, in introducing that Bill, was introducing a thing which was at variance with his own opinion.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Up to that time.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Yes, up to that time. The impression conveyed was that Mr. Mitchelson was introducing a measure which he did not approve of in regard to the change in the railway management. I think there is no doubt that was the impression. The Colonial Secretary read only part of the speech. Let me read the first portion :—

"I myself have for many years been against appointing non-political Boards, fearing that by doing so we should be parting with too much power. I have during the past year considered the question very carefully, and I must say that I have reluctantly arrived at the conclusion that the only solution of our present difficulties is a non-political Board."

What were the circumstances which led to that conclusion? The speech explains them :—

"We are continually receiving applications from various parts of the colony for conveniences, extra accommodation, and other matters, and there are also complaints of inconsistencies and anomalies in our present scale of rates and charges, and repeated applications for reductions."

Again,—

"If it were possible that a Minister could be appointed to the position of Minister of Railways and Public Works for a definite period, then I should say, Maintain our present position; but, where we have Responsible Government, and Ministers are subject to come and go at the will of the House or of the people, it is a matter of impossibility for any Minister, no matter how clever he may be, to grasp the position or make himself thoroughly acquainted with the intricacies of railway management, which requires years of careful thought and study to thoroughly master. In the unfortunate position of Minister—who, perhaps, is only in office for a very short time—he has to rely, to a very large extent, entirely upon the advice and information he receives from the officials of the department: and this will always be the case so long as we carry out our present system of appointing Ministers to the position who have had no practical experience."

Now, Sir, these were really the views of Mr. Mitchelson—and they were the views of the Government of the day—who introduced that Bill, and it was in no light spirit of getting rid of Government responsibility that the Government of Sir Harry Atkinson, my late colleague, introduced the measure in 1887; but it was to get rid of what had become an intolerable burden—a positive danger to the country—with regard to the continual pressure that was brought from time to time, for a series of years, upon successive Governments with regard to a variety of matters, whether appointments, or tariffs, or traffic rates. My honourable friend Mr. Kelly talked of Ministers with backbone. Sir, what sort of a backbone can a Minister be said to have who has all his other limbs taken away from him—that is to say, who has been quietly extinguished by his constituency because he thought right to agree to the restoration of the grain rates on the railways? Yet we have had that, Sir; and not only in one instance, but I think in more than one. Yet my honourable friend talks about a man with a backbone! I ask, what is the use of a Minister with a backbone if the constituency simply sends him out into the cold? Yet that is exactly the state of things to which you are going to return. As to that, I hardly think it possible that—I do not say any one person, but—any person of any real experience can ever have any doubt. I have been now a number of years in the Legislature—a great many years—and I remember my life was made almost intolerable by reason of the pressure upon me by persons in the employment of the Railway Department who had grievances, as they thought—many of them supposed grievances, I believe, but which they aired before the member of the district. If that is a desirable state of things to re-establish by all means re-establish it; but I think differently.

An Hon. MEMBER.—There is a Court of Appeal.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Yes, you have a Court of Appeal, and I think you may have that Court itself appealing to the Legislature before it is twelve months old. Then, my honourable friend Mr. Bolt has informed us that what we have now is antagonistic to the spirit of democracy—is inconsistent with democratic institutions. I wish that my honourable friend had had a short interview with me before the sitting this afternoon, and that I could have asked him to look at the division-list on the occasion that has been referred to in 1887. That Bill was carried on its second reading by a majority of forty-five. There were twenty-one, including pairs, who voted against it, and that was all. Nearly the whole House voted, and the majority was forty-five; and, Sir, it would harrow my honourable friend's feelings to look over that division-list. I hardly venture really to look over it, for some of his dearest political friends are there voting for that measure. It is not a perishable and transient thing, that division; it is one of the things that are embalmed in Hansard. It might be too much for me to call attention to all the names, but I will glance at a few of them. There is the present Minister of Lands, there is the present Minister of Labour—they are both in the majority; and I see there the name of a gentleman who, I believe, fills the important and honourable office of Government Whip, a gentleman named Lawry—he agreed with the majority; and the rest are so numerous that, as we see the newspapers inform us under certain circumstances, "they are too numerous to mention"; but I will leave the volume of Hansard on the table. I do really and seriously mean to say that I feel that the step that is now being taken is one of great public danger. It is perfectly true that, whether democratic or not, we can undo the evil we do; but there is something in the saying that the evil remains. "The evil that men do lives after them," and I think that is just what is going to happen in the present case. I believe the evil which will be done by this Parliament in introducing so enormous an engine of political management as this means is going to inflict a very serious injury on the country and one which is entirely gratuitous—one that is utterly uncalled-for by all those who use our railways, whether they be the travelling public, or the importers who have signified their opinion, or the exporters—the producers of the colony—who, I know personally, do not want this. And all for what? If my honourable friend will forgive me for saying so, all for the sake of taking the opportunity of grasping at political power.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON.—I am very glad indeed that we have one honourable gentleman present who was a Minister in power at the time the change was made in 1887, and I am glad that that honourable gentleman confesses that the Government of which he was a member were not strong enough and had not courage enough to control the railways. I think that is the effect of the remarks the honourable gentleman has made in the very tragic speech we have listened to. He admits that the Government had not the stamina or the backbone to control the railways; and I believe that is the reason why the change was made. My honourable friend Mr. Jennings, in his speech, referred to Mr. Samuel Vaile, and I shall refer to the same gentleman, because I find that in a circular that has been addressed by Mr. Vaile, I think, to every member of this House there is a paragraph the sentiments contained in which are as so well in accord with my own opinion on the subject that I do not think I can do better than quote them. He says,—

"Railways, in every country where they exist, are pre-eminently its great highways. They are the channels along which its trade, commerce, and social intercourse must flow. No Government has the right to hand over the highways of its country to the supreme control of any set of men, nor would they dare attempt it in the case of the common roads. To keep control of intercommunications is one of the first duties of every Government."

Now, why did not the Government recognise that? Why did not the Government introduce a Bill to give effect to these sentiments? We know, from what took place in another place, and from the public newspapers, that the Bill—the Bill that now gives the Government control of the railways, or purports to give the Government control of the railways—is not the Bill that was introduced elsewhere; and I ask, why did the Government not introduce it in this form? Why did they not continue the bold policy of dealing with the railways that they started when they made the late appointment of Commissioners, instead of bringing down a sort of bastard measure that is neither one thing nor another? I am glad indeed that the Government accepted the amendments which are going to place the railways wholly under the control of the Government. But I was disappointed, and I think the Government were to blame for not bringing down a measure in the first instance that would give practical effect to the mandate of the people. The Government knew very well they had the country at their back on the question. They knew perfectly well, when the representatives of the people were returned, that this was one of the chief planks—that the railways must come directly under political control; and yet, instead of bringing down the Bill in the form they have it now, they brought it down in a sort of bastard form, which was neither one thing nor another; which gave the Minister a seat on the Board, but under which the Minister and the Commissioners would not, in my opinion, have worked amicably together for two months. The Government, I think, started a fairly bold policy when they made the late appointments. And, while on the question of those appointments, I should like to say that the criticism we have had on the Bill this afternoon has been animated, in my opinion, by nothing else than fond praise of one of the late Commissioners—Mr. Maxwell. We have heard that gentleman's name from almost every corner of the chamber, and most gentlemen who have spoken have spoken in praise of him. Well, I am not going to say a word to detract from the character of Mr. Maxwell; I believe that he is a good railway man. But the Hon. Dr. Grace referred to Mr. Maxwell as being the one man in New Zealand who had reformed the railway service and had put the service on a different footing, and who gave general satisfaction. Well, I should like to add that he is the one man in the railway service who has also given very general dissatisfaction. I ask honourable gentlemen here, why did not Mr. Maxwell give satisfaction for years before he was made a Commissioner? For years before that, he was the General Manager of the railways, with almost supreme power. We have been told by the Hon. Mr. Stevens that the Government of that day did not dare resist the applications made for the lowering of rates; but if they had such a strong, such a wonderful man in Mr. Maxwell at the head of the railways, as the General Manager, why did they not refer the applicants to him, and say, "There is the General Manager; we do not deal with details of management—we rely upon him for the management of the railways"? I do not think Mr. Maxwell was competent to give satisfaction, or perhaps it was from the fact that when he was the General Manager he seemed to take very little, if any, trouble to give satisfaction. On the other hand, when he got to be a Commissioner—when his powers were very much increased—he gave the very greatest dissatisfaction. There is just one other remark regarding Mr. Maxwell. Now that he is out of the service I do not think we should enter into anything that in any way might be construed against his reputation; but I say I was disappointed in Mr. Maxwell's action after he had ceased to be a Commissioner. As soon as the other Commissioners got into power he seemed to take some trouble to make their path the most difficult imaginable. The present Commissioners were a very short time in power before the question of the grain rates—of lowering those rates—was brought forward in the country. Now, we find Mr. Maxwell, when this question was being discussed in the country, after he had been General Manager of the railways for years,—after he had been one of the Railway Commissioners for five years, with almost supreme control,—immediately he got out of office, writing a letter to the newspapers saying that, in his opinion, the grain rates should be at once lowered, and that the grain rates in Canterbury could be lowered without difficulty, and urging the Commissioners to lower them. Then, in a letter of a still later date, we find he agitated in a Wellington newspaper that the through service between Wellington and New Plymouth should be conducted on much faster lines. I do not say anything about whether we should have a faster or a better service there or not; but if it seemed necessary to Mr. Maxwell, or if he was sincere in his wish that the New Plymouth service should be better and quicker, why did he not inaugurate a better service?

An Hon. MEMBER.—How could he?

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON.—He was a Commissioner with supreme control, but he never took these steps to improve the service, except those which were in the way of increasing the difficulties that were likely to come in the path of those who came after him. Before leaving office he inaugurated some most expensive works, and gave orders to the shops that certain locomotives should be built—I suppose, with a view to increasing the service. He also gave orders that some very expensive work should be carried out between here and New Plymouth in reducing the grade of one of the sections on that line, and it was in consequence of this extra expense that part of the present dissatisfaction reigns in the railway service, and that men have to go on short time—he swelled the expenses so much with those works. I do not know if they were necessary, but, whether he intended it or not, what he then did increased the difficulties of those who came after him. Then, Sir, we have the Hon. Dr. Grace saying that when Mr. Maxwell was appointed one of the Commissioners, in 1888, the Government could not get an efficient man to take his place, because they did not offer a salary large enough. Now, regarding the salary of these Railway Commissioners and of railway officers, we are told by a great many honourable gentlemen that unless we give very high salaries we cannot get efficient men. But we have also heard and know that the Manawatu Railway Company has a most efficient service, and that it is a well-managed company. Yet I notice that a few weeks ago they advertised for a secretary for that company—that means really a general manager for the company; and they offered a salary of £400 per annum. While our Railway Commissioners were being paid £1,200 and £1,000, the Manawatu Company have offered their secretary £400. And who took that position? One of the late Railway Commissioners—one of those gentlemen we were paying £1,000 a year to. He stepped into the breach and accepted the £400, and will, I have no doubt, do as good work there as he did in the Government service. I hope for any sake honourable gentlemen will not say that the efficiency of men entirely depends on the amount of their salary. I do not wish to reflect for one moment upon Mr. Hannay's action. I think he is deserving of the highest credit for attempting to carry on the work he is accustomed to, and, because he has accepted the salary of £400 a year, I do not wish to reflect upon him for a moment; but I say that his action in accepting that salary, and the action of the Manawatu Company in offering such a salary as that, is quite sufficient to prove that the salaries on the Government railways are far too high. Now, there is another point respecting the Railway Commissioners that I want to touch upon—I think it was touched on by the Hon. Mr. Richardson—and that was in reference to the Chief Commissioner. I want to know why this particular Commissioner was retained when these appointments were made. He was kept in the place he occupied, the Chief Commissionership, and had the power of veto. If, then, there was dissatisfaction reigning in the country through the action of the Railway Commissioners, why were not all made to suffer alike? Why was this Chief Commissioner kept on, and with the same power that he had before? We know perfectly well that he knew nothing at all about railways, although he had been cradled in the public service from his babyhood. We know that Mr. McKerrow, although he may have been a good Government officer in his particular department—the Survey Department—had not the slightest idea of what was required in connection with railways, and had not the slightest knowledge of the business connected with the running of trains. His sitting on the Board was a perfect farce, and he did nothing, so far as I am aware, to prove that he had the stamina or the qualifications to be Chief Commissioner, except that I find, on reading back, this about him: that he made this report concerning the railways. He says, in 1892, "The Commissioners are happy to be able to inform the Government that the relations between themselves and the railway servants are quite cordial and harmonious." That, I think, is a most palpable falsehood, and that it was so is known throughout the country. I have before referred to the matter of these railway servants being on short time, and we are told that the workshops men being put on short time is caused by a shrinkage of the receipts and revenue of the railways. I should like to know why the workshops men should be the ones singled out to make good the deficiency that is arising from the depression and through prices going down of wheat, et cetera. Five or six hundred men in the railway workshops throughout the colony are put on five days' work a week. Some of these men receive only 6s. 6d. a day, and yet their pay is reduced from £1 16s. to £1 10s. a week, and that not only for the few winter months, but for six months of the year, because they are not to be put on full time again until the 15th October. That is the latest news: the workshops are to be started on full time on the 15th October. But why was that date chosen? Because four weeks will bring it to the November holidays, which, in Christchurch, amount to a week, and so, following the 15th October, they would only have three weeks' pay. And in December we have the Christmas holidays. So that for six months continuously they will be on short time and short pay. Why did not the Chief Commissioner, who has the power, say, "We will decrease expenditure by decreasing the number of trains," instead of screwing the whole out of the men? And why should not those who are receiving high salaries lose something? But no; what they say is, "We will reduce the men who are at work at 6s. 6d. a day, and who, instead of getting £1 18s., shall only get £1 10s.; but we will not touch the highly-paid men. They are to go right on." And in this present Bill we find that something of this old style is to continue—these class distinctions are retained. We find in one part of the Bill that the officers are to have their usual leave of absence, which amounts to from three to six weeks, and even up to twelve months in some instances, but that the employés—the men on 6s. 6d. a day—are to be content with one week. That is three days in addition to the three days they already get, and I thank the Government for that concession. This is simply continuing the class distinctions that have arisen in our railways, and the class distinctions that have been pretty well pointed out by the action of the Commissioners in putting the men at the railway workshops on short time for so long a period. My opinion of the Chief Commissioner of Railways is this—and I do not want to go behind people to say so: that he is too mummified and wrapped up in red tape to undertake the working of this department. The Chief Commissioner, and many of the other officers, have been too long in the public service, and when the slightest difficulty arises they take the easiest way out of the difficulty, and cut down the working-men. That has been the practice in the past. I think the Hon. Mr. Bolt has also referred to it. Before the reaction came, in 1890, it was supposed to be a sacred expression, "Touch the working-men first if there is any reduction to be made." On inquiring why the officers of the railways were not reduced as well as the men, I was told that the officers gave all their time—that is, they worked on holidays or overtime without extra pay. That, however, is simply a myth. Few of the officers ever work overtime. And, then, we are told that the officers are always at the call of the Commissioners. Now, a short time ago I saw a complaint in the Wellington papers calling attention to the fact that the heads of many departments of the Government were to be found lolling about the Wellington Quay at twelve o'clock in the day, when their understrappers were doing the work in the offices. And I know that that nefarious system is carried on in the railways, for I have only to go back about a week to a day when I found two of the heads of the department drinking champagne at eleven o'clock in the Central Hotel when they should have been at their work in the offices. Well, Sir, I trust that this Bill will pass, and that the Minister who is to administer and control the railways will work them in the interests of the country. I sincerely hope that he will make it his first duty to teach the country, or attempt to teach the country, that revenue is not the only object for which the railways are run—that the object for which the railways were built was, and should be, to benefit the country. The country has borne taxation for roads without the slightest demur; and why should it not to a great extent bear taxation for railways? Why should we always look at the end of every four-weekly period to the percentage of receipts over expenditure, to see whether these railways are managed well or otherwise? It is impossible to tell from these returns whether the railways are giving satisfaction. It is impossible that they should give satisfaction if we say the only object we have in running them is to make money. I hope this will be one of the first improvements the Minister will make when he takes over the railways: that he will manage them with the view of serving the country, and not with the view of making them pay. I hope we shall hear no more carping and dissatisfaction because the railways are not paying, and I hope sincerely that the Minister will see that the railways are run for the benefit of the people, whether they pay or not. It was said that the last railway administration gave satisfaction. Now, I called attention last year to the dissatisfaction caused by the late Commissioners owing to the express train which runs from Dunedin to Christchurch having so few stoppages, and, in reference to that, I have the greatest satisfaction in saying that since the late appointment of Commissioners the gentlemen appointed have gone over the railways inquiring into complaints and grievances, and they have given the greatest satisfaction to the people between Dunedin and Christchurch by allowing the express to stop at certain stations. I think that bears me out in saying that, if the trains were run in the interests of the people, and the question of serving the country were made of more prominent importance than the question of revenue, the colony would indorse the action of the Government, and say it was quite right for the Government to take over the railways. I say that the country, if it were only properly served by the railways, would be only too glad to bear extra taxation to make up for any loss of revenue that might accrue from the increased cost of a better service. I remember last year, in the debate that took place on this subject, reference was made especially to the Canterbury District, and to the competition carried on against the railways by the owners of traction-engines. Well, it appears to me that the Government could go further in the matter by serving the country more in connection with its roads and railways, and I think that if the Minister who is to hold the portfolio of railways were to go further afield, and make a feeder to the railways by establishing a system of carriage on roads by means of traction-engines, he would do a great deal of good to the country, and also increase the traffic of the railways. This would be the means of giving the railways more work, and the farmers and stationholders would find the benefit, because a traction-engine would come straight to their barn or woolshed, and get loaded up, and, if a special form of truck to suit rail and road were adopted, take the load right into town to the wool- or grain-stores. There would be only one loading and one unloading. At present the farmer has to cart his grain to the railway, first loading it at his barn, and again unloading it at the railway-station; then he has to do the same in the town, loading at the railway-station and unloading at the grain-stores. I cannot see much difficulty in the way of the State further extending a system of direct carriage, and if the State owned a few traction-engines I think the result would be—in fact, I am sure it would be—a very much better plan than building branch railways, as has been done in the past, which has proved such a failure. While on this subject, I may say that it was referred to in the last Commissioners' report. Speaking of traction-engines carrying to railway-stations, they say,—

"This fact should cause no surprise, when it is considered that the roads and bridges are free to the owner of the traction-engine. He has no contribution to make, either of interest on capital, cost of road, or for maintenance; the ratepayers do that for him. The railways, on the other hand, provide nearly 3 per cent. interest on capital cost, and bear the entire cost of maintenance, which averages £140 per mile per annum."

If it can be proved to be the case in Canterbury that traction-engines could do this work better than railways, it indicates that there is something radically wrong. I say, with a view of meeting the evil, and lessening the expense to the farmers, the Government should at once take in hand the question of feeding the railways from the settlers, and that could be done by means of traction-engines and trucks made to suit both road and railway. As regards the railway system generally, there is another point: In Canterbury last year there were hundreds of tons of potatoes rotting, and they were actually thrown away, while men in the towns were almost starving. Surely it is a pity that families should be allowed to starve in this country. Why should we have such a state of things existing, and why should not the railways be utilised to bring this produce into the towns? The same remark may also apply to firewood. There are hundreds of tons of firewood rotting in this District of Wellington, on account of bushfelling going on; and within thirty or forty miles of Christchurch it is the same, and it is the same at Dunedin. Yet we cannot, so far, utilise the railways to bring this into town. If the Minister will take this into consideration—namely, that the towns must be fed by the railways—and let the whole country bear the taxation and give us cheap carriage, we shall have a much better state of things existing in the towns. There will be less unemployed, because a good many of these men would be able to get up country and earn some means of support, while the expense would be almost nothing. It would simply mean taking empty trucks out and loading them up; and I feel sure that many men in New Zealand would be only too glad to load up those trucks with firewood if they had the chance. We have heard a good deal lately as to the high price of coal, and I think this is a case where the Government should step in and minimise the evil that exists by carrying the coal free, and also firewood, or by reducing the freight to a very small amount. I also hope the Minister will deal with the matter of salaries in the railway service. I do not think it is exactly the case that in the matter of salaries any comparison can be made with the Manawatu Railway Company; because they do not pay high salaries. I am quite sure, if the Minister follows the course that has been laid down by the present Minister for Public Works, he will take some step to put the salaries of the railway service on a more equitable footing. But there are a large number of items in the cost of maintaining the railways that could be also saved. One is, the lines being so frightfully curved—I do not refer now to the politically-crooked ones. I think that the matter of straightening the different lines could be taken in hand at once by the Government. It would, no doubt, be an expensive work, but it would be reproductive work. If we look at the Wellington-Pitone line we find that it is almost like a corkscrew; and many other lines are as bad. Honourable members must know the line between Lawrence and Milton, which is, I think, one of the most striking examples of curvature that could possibly be found; I do not suppose that there are 2 chains of straight line in the whole distance: and I think the Government might certainly take the matter in hand and straighten these lines. In a very few years the expense would be saved in wear-and-tear, from the less cost that would be required to keep the rolling-stock in repair. Then, we have the Rimutaka incline. Of all the stupendous monuments of stupid and foolish engineering, that line beats all. I am not quite sure, but I believe it was built by Mr. Maxwell.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON.—I heard it was Mr. Maxwell. That section should be dealt with by the Government at once. There is one point on the Rimutaka incline where two or three miles would be saved by the construction of a short tunnel. But it is simply a question of time when the Government will have to take into consideration the question of building a new line to Featherston, or to the plains beyond Featherston, by some other route than by way of the Rimutaka. There is also the question of stations. On the main south line, at the junction of the Otago Central, we have a station at Wingatui; there was already a junction—namely, at Mosgiel—a mile further on, and it would be very easy indeed to run the Otago Central line from there. I think the people in the district agitated some time ago with a view to getting the Otago Central to start from Mosgiel Junction instead of from Wingatui. They have there sufficient loops and sufficient shunting-lines to satisfy all requirements of the Otago Central for some time. And now, Sir, I should like to take this opportunity to say a few words in reference to a report that has been spread by a member of another place as to some action said to have been taken by the Railway Society just before the appointment of the last Commissioners. I refer to what is now known as the "railway black list." I say most emphatically—because I have been blamed for it by one newspaper in Wellington—that I never had the slightest knowledge of such a thing being in existence. I can also say that the Railway Society had not the slightest knowledge of such a thing being in existence; and I can also say that one of the Commissioners—the one who has been charged with connivance in regard to this list—is a man of honour, and very much above descending to such a depth as making any arrangements of the character hinted at as to the removal or dismissal of any railway men. This is the same gentleman who has been appointed a Commissioner; and I am very glad to find that he has been so appointed, because last year, in the debate on the Railway Bill, I said that he—Mr. Ronayne—was then considered by the railway men to be the most efficient officer in the railway service. I am very glad indeed that the Minister for Public Works did appoint that gentleman, as his powers and qualifications for the appointment are, I believe, everything that could be desired. Mr. Ronayne was blamed for entering into a ring with the Railway Society which would result in the dismissal of some of the men and in the reducing of others. I knew at once, and say now, that such a thing was very much below a man of Mr. Ronayne's honour. I have also heard it said, and I believe it is on record in Hansard of the present session, that Mr. Ronayne was not an acknowledged expert in railway matters. As I said before, the railway men thought Mr. Ronayne one of the most efficient officers in the service, and any person who knows his past history knows that he is a railway expert of very long standing. In regard to this matter, the Hon. Mr. Bowen, in speaking to-day on the present appointments, thought all the backbone was taken out of the Commission when the late appointments were made.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Hear, hear.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON.—I ask the honourable gentleman if there is no backbone in the present Commissioners. Did they not show backbone on the occasion when the Minister for Public Works and the country said just a few weeks ago that the grain rates should be lowered? The Commissioners then took up a stand and said, "No; if we decided to lower the grain rates there would be a loss of £40,000 a year." And they absolutely refused to make any concession regarding those rates unless the Minister would bear the responsibility of such action. I think their action on that occasion showed that the present Commissioners have backbone, and are not to be regarded as merely a buffer for the Minister for Public Works. I do not think, in regard to this Bill, that there is very much matter to discuss in it, or any fault excepting in regard to that part where it makes a distinction between the persons employed. All through the Bill we find the word "employés" and the word "officers." I think that the whole of the servants on the railways as a class ought to come under the term "employés." And on that point I wish also to refer to the matter of the Appeal Board. The Bill says,—

"One person to be elected by the officers of the railway service in the North Island and Middle Island respectively, and one person to be elected by the employés of such service in the aforesaid Islands respectively."

If we set up a Board on this constitution to deal with the grievances of the service, if the grievance affected both officers and servants, and if the whole of the servants were dissatisfied, how could the country expect justice from a Board constituted of those men who were elected by the parties aggrieved? Under the Bill two votes, I think, will decide the appeal, and therefore the Stipendiary Magistrate will not have any voice in the matter. I myself would rather see a Board composed of one person appointed by the Minister and of another person appointed by the employés,—not by the officers, but by the whole of the employés,—with the Stipendiary Magistrate as Chairman. I certainly also object to the provision which says, "Every decision of the Board shall be submitted for the approval of the Minister before it takes effect." I think that provision completely nullifies any good that might be done, and I am entirely against this Appeal Board. We had one before composed of really competent people, and it was found to be a complete dead-letter; and I am very much afraid that this Appeal Board will turn out on the same lines, if it is provided that every decision of the Board shall be submitted for the final decision of the Minister. It simply nullifies what little good might accrue from the Board being appointed. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the Bill will be accepted by the Council, and that the change will be accepted by the country, and that the country will indorse what the Government have done—or perhaps I should say what a private member has done—in saying that the railways shall come back direct to Government control.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—Sir, I rise to compliment the Government upon the acquisition in this Chamber of the honourable gentleman who has just addressed the Council. We have heard him for, I suppose, about two hours—for an hour and a half before the adjournment and for half an hour afterwards—and it seems to me that if there is one man in this country who is fit to conduct and carry on the railway system of the colony it is the honourable member who last spoke. The honourable gentleman has been lecturing us and advising the Government upon what is best to be done and how to do it; upon the straightening of the Rimutaka line, and upon taking the twists out of the lines from Dunedin to Lawrence, and from Wellington to Pitone. He has told us how to take these lines through the high mountains and bring them into proper shape and form. The honourable gentleman seems to me to be very sore; something must have hurt him during his lifetime to make him speak so ill of every officer in the Railway Department; but I might remark that it is a matter of record that if any officers were well used they were the officers of the Railway Department by the late Commissioners—Messrs. McKerrow, Maxwell, and Hannay. I am not in love with those gentlemen, but it ill becomes any man who occupies the position of the honourable gentleman to run down gentlemen who have endeavoured to do their best in the interests of the colony. They may have erred, but they erred for the benefit of the whole community in not giving way to one or two individuals who desired to benefit themselves. I say that the sole reason that these gentlemen have been disposed of is on account of the cry got up amongst the working-classes in the department against the Commissioners because they did not raise the wages to that extent that those classes expected they should be raised. With regard to Messrs. Maxwell and Hannay, we can simply say that they were two gentlemen who were well qualified for the positions they were called on to fill, who were able men in their profession, and who did their best in the interests of the Crown. As I have already stated, it ill becomes any one who has left the service to speak ill of them. With reference to the remarks made about the high wages paid to some officers in the department, the honourable gentleman referred to the position Mr. Hannay has lately accepted in the service of the Manawatu Railway Company and the salary he is to receive as compared with his salary as a Railway Commissioner; but the honourable gentleman did not point out the difference in his work and responsibility as compared with the work and responsibility of the position he formerly occupied in the Government service. When Mr. Hannay was in the Government service he was responsible for two thousand miles of railway, and he had much greater responsibility than he will have under the Manawatu Railway Company. He has now nothing to do with the outside working, but only to attend to office-work, for which he is to receive £400 a year: and I think, if an honourable member rises here for the purpose of bringing charges against a man, and says that he was not worth high wages, he should be truthful in the matter. However, I was not at all surprised when I heard the honourable gentleman making that speech, for I well remember one he made on a former occasion, which I do not wish to refer to now. I have been in Parliament now twenty years, and I have heard a great number of speeches delivered in my time, but I have never listened to one more degrading to the position the honourable gentleman occupies in this Council than the speech the honourable gentleman delivered this afternoon.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh, oh!

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—You may "Oh, oh!" as much as you like, but I will show my reason for what I say. The honourable gentleman referred to two officers of a certain department and said that, instead of being in their offices, he found them in the Central Hotel drinking champagne. Well, Sir, I did not know that we had a detective amongst us.

An Hon. MEMBER.—You were not there.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—If I had been there you would have found a gentleman, and you would not have heard me talking about men whom I saw taking a glass of champagne. It is a wonder to me that the honourable gentleman did not give their names. The honourable member also went into a long rigmarole as to the way we should manage the railways, and he asked, as we did not use the roads and bridges in order to make a profit out of them, why should it be necessary to make the railways pay a return? I say it is a different thing. The roads and bridges are constructed by the local bodies, and they must get the money for them by means of local taxation direct from the people; but in the case of the railways it is entirely different, and the railways ought to be made to pay, to bring in a return for the money invested in them. If the railways are to pay nothing, I should like to ask where the money is to come from. The roads take very little to maintain; but the railways, after they are constructed, require a great deal of money for maintenance; and if they return nothing where is the money to come from? The honourable gentleman contradicted himself a great deal on that point, and I trust that, in future, when he gets up to speak he will make himself clear. I do not wish to go any further into this matter, but I think the honourable gentleman should in future adopt a more modified tone before he makes further statements of the kind in this Council: and I think the railway men should watch the kind of individuals they have allowed to get into the railway society. I intend to support the Bill, but I would rather have in the control one Commissioner who would sit in the other Chamber and answer any questions that might be asked relative to the railway service. As, unfortunately, that cannot be done, the next best thing is for the Government to take over the railways, and therefore I shall vote for the Bill. All I can say is this: that I pity the Government for the trouble that will be put upon Ministers, through the pressure of honourable members to bring all their friends of "the right colour" into the service. I have not the slightest doubt that my honourable friend the Colonial Secretary, before he is very much older, will very much regret having introduced this Bill.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, I have a word or two to say to my honourable friend Mr. Jenkinson. I listened with pain to many of his remarks, and I listened with very great pain to the language he used about certain high officials. That, Sir, is not a question that is before this Council. It is not a question of the character of those men; they were selected for their positions, and I am quite sure they would not go to my honourable friend for a character if they wanted one. Sir, there has not been a single Government measure introduced into this Council which that honourable gentleman has not attacked, not excepting even the Shop-hours Bill. Everything is wrong, and this Bill is wrong from head to foot. There is no single clause of the Bill worthy of consideration, if we except one or two points which the honourable gentleman seems to think fit to approve of. The honourable gentleman has lectured the Government here to-night, and I am satisfied that this Council will not tolerate such language from any member of the Council, and, above all, will not tolerate from any young and inexperienced member of this Council attacks upon the characters of officials of high standing, when those officials have not any opportunity of reply. Sir, I am not in favour of those gentlemen; I never was in favour of these Commissioners; but I say it is a monstrous thing for any member of this Council so to attack any official. How can an official put his heart in his work if attacks of this character are made upon him? I am sorry to hear any one holding the high position of a member of this Council attacking officials in that way. As I stated, I was opposed to the Act taking the property in the railways from the Queen and handing it over to Commissioners. I was opposed to that from the first; I thought it a mistake, and have never ceased to think so, and that is the reason I wish to have it restored. But we made a great mistake in this colony. We have been looking round for an expert for military purposes, and we have found one; but we made the biggest mistake in that we did not discover in the honourable gentleman who has been lecturing the Government on every Bill a railway expert who could have straightened the whole of the lines by a stroke of his pen; and yet that honourable gentleman knows very little of the merely mechanical part of the duties which he had to perform! He little knows the trouble a Minister has regarding these matters. He little knows the amount of labour to be performed, or what work has to be done. The honourable gentleman sits confidently there, and knows nothing whatever about the labour or the nature of the work that has to be done by men who have the interests of the country at heart, and who, I undertake to say, have the interests of the very people he pretends to favour more at heart than he has himself; and I say that I am one of them, and that I will yield to no man in this Council in my honest desire to see the working-classes put on a proper footing. I have been one of those who have favoured more than any other the working-men of this country, and I venture to say there is no one they have more confidence in, though I say it myself. I am obliged to speak so warmly, because the honourable gentleman's attack has been made in such unmeasured language. He, first of all, characterized this as a bastard measure.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON.—Will the honourable gentleman allow me to ask in what way I attacked the measure?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I have explained, and am explaining, that the honourable gentleman informed the Council that this was a bastard measure, in the way the Bill was introduced by the Government in another place.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON.—Pardon me, I did nothing of the sort.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I took the honourable gentleman's words down, and I ask Hansard to record them. He said it was a bastard measure, introduced in another place.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON.—Yes, the Bill was introduced in another place.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—I am not going to be interrupted by the honourable gentleman, and I trust that you will protect me, Sir. He said this was a bastard measure, but the Bill was introduced in the other House, and was a Bill of the same character which the Minister had before the elections told the people the Government intended to introduce into Parliament—that was, a measure to give to the Minister a controlling or, at least, a responsible position on that Board. The Government placed alternative proposals in the measure. They placed that proposal and an alternative one. This was the one that was adopted by the representatives of the people; and the Government, feeling that the representatives of the people preferred that they should introduce the measure in its present shape, accepted it. Yet this is what the honourable gentleman calls a bastard measure! Sir, it was in direct obedience to the will of the people, in direct obedience to the will of the representatives of the people in another place that the Bill has reached this Chamber in the form in which it is now. I say this to the honourable gentleman: He has from time to time charged people with not having the courage of their opinions—with speaking against a measure and voting the other way. I ask him now to vote against this Bill, if he has the courage of his opinions. I dare him to do so, for he has spoken against it as much as any one. I ask him to vote against the measure. He would not dare to go down to Christchurch if he did. There was one argument he used that I will briefly refer to. He said that the Government should make themselves the possessors of the traction-engines. Sir, is there to be no private enterprise? Are we to have our meals regulated, our time for going to bed regulated, by the State? Is everything to be done by the State? What nonsense, to be sure! If we get the traction-engines, and have the honourable gentleman regulating them, the country is to go right. That is the position. And, then, the enormous and magnificent argument in favour of that was that there were men starving in Christchurch, and farmers were prepared to give them potatoes, but they would not go to the farmers for the potatoes, and the farmers must bring them to the men! That was the argument the honourable gentleman used. Well, Sir, a man deserves to starve if he cannot go for his own potatoes. My honourable friend Mr. Shrimski has anticipated pretty well everything I had to say to him in other respects, and so I will now leave him to the consideration of the Council. I wish to say a word or two about some of the remarks made by my honourable friend Mr. Pharazyn. He has referred to what he considers the injustice of a subsection of a clause of this Bill. Sir, there is no injustice in that; it is for the purpose of protecting the rights of those who are entitled to them; but he was under the impression, wrongly, as he informed me afterwards, that the rights of some officials who had left the service—that is, of the two Commissioners—were not protected in the same way. This afternoon I was informed officially that every right to which they were entitled on leaving the Service was granted to them on leaving the Service, so that the object is really to protect precisely the same rights of one or two others who are still in the Service and entitled to be considered as Civil servants. My honourable friend also, with that—I was going to unsex him and call him Cassandra, but that would not be right—he is hardly that; but my honourable friend is always gloomy; everything is going to be wrong; but still he is going to vote for the Bill. I have never known him to take any other view than that of melancholy foreboding and a Cassandra-like fear. I have noticed that often; but still the colony has survived, notwithstanding his prophecy. I was under the impression, when my honourable friend Dr. Grace spoke this afternoon, that, in my anxiety to place before the Council the fullest information with regard to the measure, I had used some language which might in some degree be taken as reflecting upon individuals who have been connected with the railways. That was the last thing I had any intention of doing, and if any language of mine could have conveyed that idea to the honourable gentleman I must certainly say it was not intended. Sir, it is all very well to attack public servants. I myself, like many other people, before I came in contact with them had very peculiar notions of them. But when you see these men at their duties, the assiduity they bring to bear upon the labours they are engaged in, the loyalty they give to any Government, no matter what Government it may be—Sir, I speak as having had some years' experience amongst them, and I venture to say that no living man has a higher opinion of the Civil Service of New Zealand than I have, for a more faithful, loyal body of men there could not be, even though they may not feel with you, or may be opposed to you politically. Now, I have just one word to say to my honourable friend Mr. Stevens, and I hope he will give me the same permission that I gave him. He said he hoped he would be permitted to use the expression that this would be used for the purpose of grasping political power. I would say that no Government ever grasped more political power than the Government my honourable friend was at the end of, for he was not originally one of the Continuous Ministry, but joined it towards the close of its career.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Why imitate our example?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Well, evil communications corrupt good manners, or morals. I have no fault to find with my honourable friend, but I will ask permission to use the same language that he did, and I say that no Ministry grasped political power so ardently and effectively as the Government of which my honourable friend was one. Sir, I have nothing more to say.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON.—May I make a personal explanation? The honourable gentleman has put words into my mouth which I did not use. He said that I called this a bastard Bill. What I said was that the Bill as introduced into the other Chamber was a bastard Bill. The Bill we have now been discussing I am in favour of, and will vote for.

Tramways Bill.

TAEKATA TE TOKOITI.

Mr. W. KELLY asked the Native Minister, If the recommendation of the Native Affairs Committee of last session on the petition of Taekata te Tokoiti has been carried out? If not, is it the intention of the Government to give effect to the recommendation—namely, that this petition should be referred to the Government, with the recommendation that an inquiry should be held into the matter at Rotorua? The matter had been before the House on several occasions. Last session the Native Affairs Committee had made a recommendation that an inquiry should be held into the matter. Nothing, however, had been done, and he wished to know what the Government intended to do.

Mr. SEDDON said nothing had been done as yet, but the recommendation of the Committee would receive every consideration at the hands of the Government, who would go into the matter carefully.

TAITA CONSTABLE.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Minister of Defence, If he will appoint a constable for the Taita district, in the Hutt County? This was a growing and important district, and he had been asked by some of the residents to move in this matter, as there was a considerable distance between the Lower Hutt and the Upper Hutt.

Mr. SEDDON was afraid that the Government would not be able to comply with the honourable gentleman's request, for, from information received, it appeared that the Taita was included in the Lower Hutt police district, the distance from the Lower Hutt station to the Taita being only three miles and a half. The Lower Hutt constable, who was a mounted constable, visited the Taita four times a week. No complaints had been received of want of police supervision in the district, and it was not considered necessary at present to open a police-station there. Taking the population, and comparing it with other parts of the district, and seeing that the residents there really, as far as he could gather, were very law-abiding, he did not think there was any necessity for a police-station: in fact, he believed it would be rather a reflection upon them to open a station there.

NORTH ISLAND TRUNK RAILWAY.

Mr. MITCHELSON asked the Minister of Lands, If he will inform the House of the amount now owing to the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan for moneys used for the purpose of acquiring Native land under the provisions of the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act; and if he will, out of the £250,000 that is now annually, for a period of three years, to be devoted to the purchase of Native lands, repay to the credit of the North Island Main Trunk Railway such sums of money as have been taken from it under the above-named Act, and thus enable provision to be made upon this year's estimates for the further construction of the railway for which the loan was originally "ear-marked"? He would point out to the honourable gentleman that it was absolutely necessary a further sum should be provided for the construction of this railway. The Financial Statement showed that the only sum available out of the loan for this work was £79,000, and against that there were liabilities amounting to £29,000, leaving only £50,000 for further works on this important railway. Seeing that the Government were providing sums of money for the construction of railways in other parts of the colony which were not of so much importance from a colonial point of view as this one, something ought really to be done for this line, in order that the Wellington Provincial District might be connected by-rail with the Auckland Provincial District.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said the honourable gentleman would see, by the Bill which was presently to be discussed, that the Government were only asking for £250,000 for the purpose of purchasing Native lands. From a return which he held in his hand he noticed that £220,000 had already been taken out of the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan for the purpose of buying Native lands. The present Government had not taken that money: £100,000 had been taken by the Stout-Vogel Government and £120,000 by the Atkinson Government. If the present Government were to be called upon to restore these two sums of money, amounting to £220,000, out of the £250,000, it would leave them only £30,000 with which to buy Native lands this year.

Mr. MITCHELSON said it was to be distributed over three years.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said the Government were asking, in the Bill he had referred to, for money for one year. The money had been taken out of the loan by Act of Parliament, and to restore that money he thought it would require another Act to be passed. He was of opinion that it would be far better if the honourable gentleman asked the Government if they were prepared to pass another Bill to raise this £220,000 for the purpose of paying back the money. At any rate, he might inform the honourable gentleman that it would be impossible to refund the £220,000 out of the amount of money which the Government was asking the House to authorise.

WELLINGTON LAND-SALES.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Minister of Lands, If he will instruct the Superintending Surveyor and Under-Secretary for Lands to consult the Commissioner of Crown Lands with regard to the dates of land-sales in the Wellington District before printing the plans, so that such sales will not clash, as at present, with the monthly meetings of the Land Board? He would point out to the Minister that the last three land-sales held in the Wellington District had been fixed for days appointed for the meetings of a Land Board. The result had been great inconvenience to a number of people who had come in from the country to attend the meetings of the Board. He thought that some arrangement should be made by which these sales would be held on other dates.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said the dates of the land-sales in the Wellington District were fixed by the Commissioner of Crown Lands, who was also Chairman of the Board, and he thought it would be for that gentleman to fix dates which would give satisfaction to the members of the Board. However, it was sometimes necessary for plans to be prepared, and Proclamations to be issued, and so forth, so that it was not always possible to fix the exact dates on which the sales should be held very far in advance of the meetings of the Board. He was informed by the department that it was not necessary for the members of the Board to come in contact with the general public.

Mr. PIRANI said he referred to the Commissioner.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said he would communicate with the Commissioner and see if some better arrangement could not be made.

Mr. PIRANI said that some of the sales of land were held outside the Town of Wellington—for instance, at Waverley and other places—and when the Commissioner of Crown Lands was away at those sales he could not preside at the meetings of the Board.

NORTH CANTERBURY CHARITABLE AID BOARD.

Mr. COLLINS asked the Government, Will they appoint a Commission armed with full powers to inquire into the serious allegations made against the North Canterbury Charitable Aid Board (1) with reference to the high salaries paid to officials, and (2) as to the manner in which charitable relief is dispensed; and so satisfy themselves and the public that, if untrue, an unjust stigma may be lifted from the Board, and, if true, that such steps may be taken as may be necessary to insure speedy and effective change in the administration of charitable aid? His attention had been drawn to the necessity of placing a question of this kind on the Order Paper by reason of certain correspondence, and also certain editorials, which appeared in one of the Christchurch papers; and, furthermore, the allegations made in those articles and letters were borne out to some extent by repeated complaints made to him by certain persons in Christchurch. If the allegations were unfounded, it was only a matter of justice that the Board should be relieved of the stigma which had been cast upon it.

Mr. REEVES said the Government could not appoint a Royal Commission because there were certain rumours in the air. He might say that efforts had been made more than once to ascertain whether there was anything in the statement made, anonymously, concerning the Charitable Aid Board, but they had never been able to get any evidence. Were specific charges made, he would certainly have the greatest pleasure in asking the Cabinet to appoint a Royal Commission, or he would take some other means of having the matter inquired into.

FRUIT DUTY.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Colonial Treasurer, If the Government intend this session to bring in a Bill to increase the duty upon fruit, as announced in the Financial Statement, or if this part of their policy has been finally abandoned?

Mr. SEDDON said the Government would endeavour to give effect to the policy propounded in the Financial Statement. If circumstances prevented their carrying out the whole of that policy this session they would regret it, but whatever they did would bear good fruit.

LOCAL BODIES' "THIRDS" AND "FOURTHS."

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Colonial Treasurer, In what account annexed to the Financial Statement is included the sum of £28,799 8s. 10d., held on account of local bodies in respect of "thirds" and "fourths" on the 31st March last?

Mr. WARD said the account was not included in any table attached to the Financial Statement.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Minister of Lands, If he has yet had the opinion of the Law Officers as to whether moneys deposited on account of surveys on the selection of unsurveyed land should be subject to contributions of "thirds" or "fourths" (according to tenure) to the local bodies interested; and, if such opinion has been obtained, whether the Minister has any objection to inform the House of the effect of such opinion?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said he had not yet received the reply of the Law Officers of the Crown. When he did receive it he would let the honourable gentleman know.

AWAMOKO DAIRY FACTORY.

Major STEWARD asked the Minister of Agriculture, Whether, in accordance with the request of the settlers in the district of Awamoko, North Otago, he has given or will give directions to one of the dairy experts to proceed to that locality to advise the settlers as to the best steps to be taken with a view to the establishment of a dairy factory? He had the honour on the previous day to hand to the Minister of Lands a telegram from a gentleman well known to the honourable member, asking that some assistance should be given to the settlers in that district in establishing a dairy factory. He need scarcely point out that, owing to the low price of grain, farmers in Canterbury had had to change very much their system of farming, and go in more for dairying: in fact, he thought that was going to be their salvation. As the honourable gentleman took very great interest in his department, he did not think it was necessary to press him to comply with the request of the settlers.

Mr. J. McKensie

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said he had already given instructions, and an officer of the department had been sent to Awamoko.

AMALGAMATION OF COLONIAL BANK AND BANK OF NEW ZEALAND.

Mr. O'REGAN asked the Colonial Treasurer, If, before Parliament is asked to consider the proposed amalgamation between the Colonial Bank and the Bank of New Zealand, the Government will place clearly before this House the present value and nature of the assets of each bank, and the amount each has invested in real estate (1) within the colony and (2) without the colony? Also, will the Government obtain, for the information of members, an approximate estimate of the present value of such real estate? Also, if the Government will at once refer the memorandum of amalgamation of these two banks to the Public Accounts Committee for investigation and report? He was prepared to hear the Colonial Treasurer say this was too large an order. No doubt it was a very large order, but it would place before honourable members some idea of what they were asked to undertake if it was proposed to amalgamate those two banks. Although it might be somewhat difficult to get this information, still honourable members should have it before they were asked to discuss, much more to sanction, the proposal to amalgamate the banks. He might state that there was a slight inaccuracy in the question. In the assets of the Bank of New Zealand he meant also to include the value of "the globo assets." Even if the question were not answered so satisfactorily as he should like, still it would show the House what a gigantic matter this was, and his fellow-members would see that they were asked to take a step in the dark, unless placed in possession of the information he sought.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable member was introducing matter highly argumentative, which would be quite suitable in making a motion, but not in asking a question.

Mr. O'REGAN did not wish to introduce argumentative matter, but he wished to point out that unless they had the information alluded to they would be taking a step in the dark.

Mr. WARD said he had stated the other day that the Government had this matter under consideration, and until they had come to a decision he could not give an answer to the question.

Captain RUSSELL asked if the Government would give the House more information as to when they intended dealing with this question. A circular had been issued calling a meeting of shareholders of the Colonial Bank for the 26th instant.

Mr. WARD hoped the Government would be able to give the House the information before that date.

Captain RUSSELL.—And the Bill?

Mr. WARD said they had no Bill at present. Perhaps the honourable gentleman had better wait till the information was given.

Captain RUSSELL wished to know what was the answer of the Colonial Treasurer to the last part of the question—namely, if the Government will at once refer the memorandum of amalgamation of these two banks to the Public Accounts Committee for investigation and report.

Mr. WARD said his reply must be on the same lines as the reply he had on a previous occasion given to a question put by the honourable member for Palmerston—namely, until the Government had considered the memorandum and had arrived at a decision upon it they would not refer it to the Public Accounts Committee.

FEILDING LIBRARY.

Mr. STEVENS asked the Minister of Justice, Whether the Government will vest in the Feilding Borough Council, for the purpose of erecting a public library, an area of land sufficient for that purpose out of the land upon which the Courthouse stands in the said borough? The Courthouse stood in an allotment of about half an acre, which was a great deal more than was necessary for the purpose. He hoped the Government would see their way to vest a small portion of the land in the library committee.

Mr. REEVES said the land surrounding the Courthouse was only a quarter of an acre, and Feilding was such a flourishing township, surrounded by such a growing district, and

3.0 it was so obvious that the town must progress, and that a larger Courthouse would be required there, that the Government did not think it desirable to part with any portion of the reserve.

GRADUATED TAXATION.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Colonial Treasurer, Whether he will consider the equity and justice of applying the graduated system of taxation to all properties held in this colony of a higher value than £210,000, so as more equally to distribute taxation on the shoulders of those better able to bear it?

Mr. WARD might say that there were three taxpayers in the colony with lands of a higher unimproved value than £210,000. One of them paid graduated tax on £812,982, another on £676,243, and the third on £346,811, the rate in each case being 2d. in the pound. The Government had not considered as to whether it was desirable to increase the amount beyond £210,000. It was not proposed at present.

TAX ON MORTGAGES.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Colonial Treasurer, Whether he will consider the propriety and fairness of relieving taxpayers of payment on mortgages under the graduated system of taxation, in like manner as the primary and ordinary taxation under the direct system?

Mr. WARD said this matter was one which was under the consideration of the Government, and he might say it was proposed to make an alteration in connection with this matter. That alteration would be seen when the Land and Income Assessment Bill was circulated.

OTAGO CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. LARNACH asked the Government, If they will supply correct information of the actual balance now due and owing from the several large sums set apart by different Governments, and specially placed under the supposed bond fide scheme of being "ear-marked," for the purpose of promoting and carrying on the Otago Central Railway-line, after deducting all moneys that have been really expended on the said railway-line since any of the moneys referred to was first "ear-marked"?

Mr. SEDDON said, with a view of assisting the honourable member to obtain the necessary information, and so as to save a return being asked for, he had requested the department to give him some details as to the amount "ear-marked" for expenditure on the Otago Central line and of the amount expended. The only amounts specially borrowed and "ear-marked" for the Otago Central were as follow: "Loan Act, 1882," £300,000; "Loan Act, 1886," £140,000; "Loan Act, 1888," £85,000; permanent way, et cetera, £80,000: total, £605,000. The total expenditure on the line to the 31st March last amounted to £621,719, in addition to which a further amount of £15,504 was chargeable for rolling-stock, making a gross total of £637,223: so that not only had the total amount "ear-marked" been expended upon it, but £32,223 had been found in addition.

LANDS IMPROVEMENT AND NATIVE LANDS ACQUISITION BILL.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—In rising to move the second reading of this Bill, I may say it is one of those peaceful measures which I have no doubt every member of the House will support. Honourable members know that in the Financial Statement brought down by my colleague the Colonial Treasurer he outlined the fact that the two sums of money necessary for the preparation of land for settlement and for purchase of Native land were to be asked for under the Bill now before the House, and I think, of all the measures indicated in that Statement, this one ought to be the most acceptable to the House. Therefore it is unnecessary for me to occupy the time of the House at any great length in expatiating on the profits and benefits to be derived by the colony through the passing of this Bill. Honourable members must be aware that it is almost impossible to carry on the work of colonisation in a young country like this out of the ordinary revenue of the country, and there has been no period in the history of the colony when it was more necessary to make ample provision for roads and bridges in the colony than it is at present. In evidence of that, I would point out to the House that at the present moment applications are before the Government for three times the amount of money that is set forth here as being proposed for roads and bridges. In connection with this matter, and to give even anything like justice to the various claims that have been made on the colony to open up Crown lands by roads and bridges, it would be necessary to have this amount of money along with the other sums we have at our disposal. Sir, there are provisions in this Bill not only for roads and bridges to open up Crown lands which we are at the present time disposing of, and which are already being surveyed for the purpose of being disposed of, but also for the purpose of opening up lands we may acquire at any time. There is also provision in the Bill to the effect that a certain proportion of this money may be used for the purpose of improving land before putting settlers on it. Last year we took a vote for that purpose, and we have made a commencement in that way, and so far as that commencement has gone it has been very satisfactory, and we intend to extend that system of improving land by felling bush, grassing it, and then disposing of it to settlers, who can get work, so that we may help these men and give them a start on their own farms, after which they will have to pay to the Crown interest on the value of the money so spent in making improvements, and which is to be added to the capital value of the lands. Then, we have in contemplation in this matter the starting of several others of these improved farm settlements, some of them in the North Island, some of them in the extreme north, some of them in the Wellington District, some in Otago, and, in fact, all over the colony we wish to have a few of these settlements. Honourable members will understand that the amount of money we can use for this purpose will, to a certain extent, be limited. It cannot be a very large sum, and the work cannot go on very fast; but still we think it is one of those works which will pay the colony eventually very well to go into, and one of those works through which we shall be able to get a large number of people placed on the land. Then, there is the question of village settlements. We are getting a good many more village settlements established throughout the country, and they want some assistance to start upon the first year or two, and that also will be provided for out of the moneys in the first part of this Bill. Then, Sir, with regard to this Bill, honourable members will see that it is divided into three Parts. The First Part provides for a sum of £250,000 for roads and bridges, and for improved lands, as I have already stated. Honourable members will see, moreover, that all the money under this Part of the Bill will have to be voted by Parliament. The Minister of the day will have to bring estimates before the House, and the approval of the House will have to be given before the money can be expended, and the House itself will have full control over the expenditure.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—What about clause 9 and the proviso to it?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Clause 9 states where the money is to be put when raised. It is to be placed in a certain fund called the Lands Improvement Account, and in order to be paid out of that account it must first be appropriated by Parliament. Honourable members will see by sections 3 and 4 that Parliament will have first to approve of the money before any of it can be paid to any one. This Part of the Bill does not apply to Native lands. It is in the Second Part that we make provision for the purchase of Native lands, and honourable members will, I am sure, agree with me that there is no object to which we could better apply any money at our disposal. And, when I explain to the House that we have at the present time under negotiation very large areas of Native lands, it will be seen by honourable members that it is impossible to close these negotiations for the purchase of these Native lands without having the means to do it with. We have in the King-country an area of from seven to eight hundred thousand acres under negotiation, and we have in the Gisborne and Waiapu district from five to six hundred thousand acres under negotiation. We have of the Awarua Block a balance of a hundred and thirty thousand acres, over and above what we have already purchased, under negotiation. We have under negotiation in the Wanganni district three hundred thousand acres. These are some of the larger areas that we have under negotiation. But in addition to these there are areas in other parts of the colony, not so large in extent, but which will be of very great importance with regard to settlement to those parts of the colony where the land is situated. Then, to complete these negotiations, and to successfully carry out the desire which I am sure this House must feel—namely, to bring these large areas of Native land into a more productive state than they are in at the present time—it will be necessary to set aside a portion of this money for the purchase of Native lands, for the purpose of roading the land and making it accessible for settlement, to pay for surveys, and so forth. Part III. makes provision for raising these funds, and states how the moneys are to be provided, and so on. On the whole, Sir, I think honourable members will agree that this Bill will meet their views, and I have no hesitation in saying, in connection with the roads and bridges, honourable members will admit that we have endeavoured to meet the demands in the various portions of the colony; but we find that there will not be sufficient funds to go on without some assistance of this nature. I may say it is useless, in my opinion, to place people on the land unless you provide them with the means to get to and from their holdings. You may place settlers on a block of bush-land; but to keep them there successfully, and to enable the district to progress, we shall have to give them the means to get into their country. Without that, I am afraid it will simply mean a lingering death to them. Several amendments will be necessary in Committee to provide for the more easy working of the measure, which were somehow overlooked when the Bill was drafted. I shall also be prepared to accept any reasonable amendments that honourable members may see fit to propose. I hope, Sir, there will be no objection to the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—Sir, I do not rise for the purpose of offering any opposition to the Bill, which I consider is a desirable one, and one that will meet with approval in all country districts throughout the whole of the North Island and parts of the South Island. But to judge from the remarks of the Minister in moving the second reading, we should be led to suppose that the money proposed to be raised under the Bill for the purposes of roading and bridging is not as it was originally intended to be—namely, for the purpose of constructing roads and bridges through lands acquired by the Crown for the purpose of settlement, or to give access to such. The Minister stated that he had received applications for votes for three times the amount proposed to be raised under the present Bill. I notice that clause 3 says,—

And in clause 9 there is a rather peculiar proviso, which I think ought not to be allowed to pass as it is. The proviso is as follows:—

“Provided that any payments on account of the construction of works under this Part of this Act, begun or completed since the thirty-first day of March in the now current year, may be made from the said Lands Improvement Account under this Act, notwithstanding that such payments may have been advanced out of the Public Works Fund or out of the Consolidated Fund, and the amount of such payments may be transferred accordingly.”

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—You had that before you this session in the estimates.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—Where is the estimate?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—It is meant to cover the expenditure that has been going on in connection with opening Crown lands and for roads and bridges.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—What I want to understand is, whether the money proposed to be raised under the Bill is to be used for the purpose of constructing roads and bridges in settled districts, or is only to be borrowed to make roads and bridges through Crown lands, and to give access to such.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Yes; to give access to Crown lands.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—I think it should be made a little more clear, because under the Bill it seems that it is to be used for constructing other roads and bridges; which I do not think is at all desirable. As to the means to be raised for the purpose of acquiring Native lands I entirely agree, and I also agree with the proposition of the Minister of Lands that a portion of the money so raised may be used for opening up roads and making bridges to give access to those lands, because the Minister would not be able to carry out the work of colonisation without such power. There are several matters of detail in connection with the Bill that need to be amended, but these are simply Committee objections, and I shall endeavour to help the Minister in every way I can to make the Bill a workable measure. Although it is to all intents and purposes a loan Bill, it will enable good work to be effected.

Sir R. STOUT.—Sir, it cannot, at any rate, be said that this is not a borrowing Bill. We heard of other Bills that they were not borrowing Bills—they were simply raising money for a specific purpose. This is a Bill providing for the borrowing of half a million: and the House seems to take half-millions nowadays very lightly. Sir, I would point out one or two things that I am surprised the Minister of Lands did not explain to the House. This is apart from the question of borrowing, which I shall refer to later on. I should like honourable members to read sections 4 and 5 of this Bill. Do they see what these sections mean? They are these:—

“Any person may by agreement with the Minister settle upon any Crown lands for the purpose of clearing or otherwise improving the same upon such terms as to advances or otherwise as may be agreed on, and the Colonial Treasurer may, when authorised by Parliament, make all such advances out of moneys available under this Act.

“Any person who settles on and improves such lands pursuant to any such agreement as aforesaid has a prior right to a license or lease, under Part III. of ‘The Land Act, 1892,’ of so much or such portion of those lands as may be defined by regulations under this Act, but not of any area greater than that prescribed in the said Act.”

That means that the Minister may agree with any person he likes.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—It means the improved farms we are carrying on now.

Sir R. STOUT.—If the honourable gentleman will listen to me I will tell him what it means. It means that the Minister of Lands may under this Bill set aside for a man 640 acres of first-class land, and that the Treasurer may make any advances he chooses to make to him out of this money to be borrowed, and when the improvements are made this man is to be allowed to get this piece of land without competition.

Mr. BELL.—The Treasurer has paid for them, not the man.

Sir R. STOUT.—Exactly. But he is to have a prior right. It is an amendment of the Land Act. It is giving the Minister power to allow a man to take over lands for any term, and on any terms, and receive part of any money that the Minister and the Colonial Treasurer please, and without complying with the Land Act or any other Act in existence. I say, Sir, there never was such a section proposed in an Act before. Why, the Czar of Russia would not propose such a thing without consulting his nobles. And yet not a single word was said about it when the second reading of the Bill was moved.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I suppose the House will agree to it.

Sir R. STOUT.—The Minister has the power, I quite admit. He has a majority in the House, and this is called a policy Bill, and so their followers will swallow anything that is proposed, no matter what their opinions may be, or what their pledges may have been. I ask this House to look at these sections. Is it right to give any Minister of the Crown power to make such an agreement without any proper safeguards being provided? There should have been some explanation given when the second reading was moved. I now want further to point out this: that this Bill is not limited in regard to its roads and bridges to opening up Crown lands. I do not know if the House knows the history of this roads-and-bridges construction system that we have seen on the floor of this House. It was originally proposed in 1877. Prior to that it was stated that we should not hear the name of roads and bridges in this Parliament except for the purpose of congratulation. I think I am quoting the words of one Financial Statement. This road-making was all to be managed by our local bodies. The Counties Act was to deal with this work, and it was to cease to be a function of the Legislature. In 1877 it was pointed out that in dealing with these lands that were far removed from settlement there was absolute necessity for spending a sum of money for opening up Crown lands for sale, and the sum of £50,000 was asked for by the then Minister of Lands, Mr. Donald Reid, for that purpose. What has this amounted up to now? Year after year it has increased; and now we are to have no less than a quarter of a million of borrowed money spent absolutely for this purpose. How has such money been used? I am not making any charge against this Ministry, but I say that ever since almost 1877 the money has not been spent on roads for opening up Crown lands in the strict sense of that term. Moneys have been sometimes spent on roads miles and miles removed from Crown lands. Now, it may be said that if you make a main road it is bound to open up Crown lands. There is an old proverb which says all roads lead to Rome, and I suppose if you make a main street in a town miles away from Crown lands it would be said that that is opening up Crown lands. But that is not the strict meaning of the provision in this Bill for I venture to say that, when the public works estimates come down with allocations for roads, more than half the money that is to be voted for this year will not be spent to open up Crown lands for sale at all, but will be spent in various parts of the colony. We have only to take up the public-works estimates for the last ten years and it will be found that vote after vote for roads and bridges is not to open up Crown lands at all. Now, I want to point out how this Bill is drawn. I understand that the honourable gentleman talks of getting the drafting altered. Will honourable members look at clause 2, and then go down to clauses 8, 9, and 10? From a draftsman's point of view they are all wrong. All that need have been said in this Bill was simply this: that the sum of £250,000 was to be raised for roads and bridges and other works for opening up Crown lands for sale. That ought to have been put into one clause. How does this clause 2 read?

"The works contemplated by this Part of this Act are the construction and maintenance of roads and bridges, the preparation of lands for settlement, and such other works incidental thereto as the Minister of Lands, hereafter called 'the Minister,' may, with the approval of Parliament, think necessary."

Well, then, section 8 provides that—
3.30. "Out of the moneys hereinafter authorised to be raised, two hundred and fifty thousand pounds shall, as and when raised, be paid into the Public Account, and be thence transferred by the Treasury to the credit of a separate account, called 'The Lands Improvement Account.'"

And then, section 9 refers to the application of the money, as follows:—

"The moneys in the said Lands Improvement Account are applicable only for the construction of the works and the payment of the sums for which money is appropriated by Parliament for the purposes of this Part of this Act."

Then comes the proviso which the honourable member for Eden referred to, and the object of which I shall mention in a minute. I submit, Sir, that the getting of this money is to be done in a very peculiar, roundabout way. I submit that if the money is to be borrowed for such a purpose it ought to be so defined, either for opening up Crown lands for settlement, or the amount ought to have been stated for general contribution to roads and bridges. That is not done. Under this Bill there is no limit. The Minister may spend the whole £250,000 if he pleases, and not spend a penny on roads opening up Crown lands for sale. I apprehend that is not the meaning of what this Bill should be. The money is to be borrowed in the first instance from the Post Office, the Government Insurance, and the Public Trust. If they cannot supply it, then it comes from the Public Works Fund: there is not much there. Clause 10 reads,—

"Any moneys appropriated to specific roads or bridges under this Part of this Act may be paid over wholly or partly to the local authority in whose district the works are situated, or under whose control such works are usually performed, upon such terms and conditions as the Minister may in each case determine by agreement."

is the specific appropriation? There is none in the Bill. Then, there is the other point about raising the money. Half a million is to be raised locally. Well, what will happen? It is to be raised locally at 4 per cent., and then power is taken to convert this in London. That is what is called "sly borrowing": you may create the debt here, hold it only for six months, and then take it to London, convert it, and instead of calling it borrowing you call it a conversion operation, and the London people are asked not to lend you money, but to convert your bonds. The same thing that was done in regard to the Cheviot purchase will be done here. I do not see why we are going in this roundabout way. Why not go to London at once and borrow the money at 3½ per cent.? Why issue bonds here, and then go to London and pay for the conversion of those bonds? You can do it much more economically by going at once to London and asking for a loan at 3½ per cent. This scheme is what has been properly termed "sly borrowing." I do not think we need half a million for this purpose. We cannot afford it. What does it mean? It means that we are to pay £20,000 of interest annually. We are to practically add to our interest account £20,000 per annum, saying nothing about sinking fund. Now, it has been said we shall get Native lands for it. No doubt you do; but what becomes of the money you get from the Native lands? That money is taken into the Consolidated Fund and used for your ordinary purposes. It does not go in redemption of your debentures; and hence this will come to be a permanent debt on the colony. You get nothing in return for the money you spend upon roads and in the purchase of Native lands, so far as redemption of your debt is concerned. It becomes a permanent debt. It is true that under this Bill this is to be for only one year. But what does that mean? It means that next year we shall need the same amount of money; and what is the House asked to do? The House is asked to add to the permanent debt of the colony half a million a year. It means £20,000 in interest in each year. It is all very well to say you will get a return from that in the lands, and in your roading. No doubt, if the money is spent on roads, et cetera, it increases the productive-power of the colony; but can the colony afford to go on increasing its permanent debt, and pay £20,000 a year more for these purposes? I do not think you can, and therefore I do not think it is wise that such a large sum as this should be borrowed; and I hope that when the Bill gets into Committee the honourable gentleman will agree to reduce the amount. If he says our ordinary Consolidated Fund cannot afford sufficient money to be spent on roads and bridges and the purchase of Native lands, then I think the honourable gentleman ought to limit the amount now asked for. I am not aware that any Government has ever asked for such a large amount to be spent in one year on such a purpose. This is the first time in this colony when £250,000 has been asked for for roads and bridges out of borrowed money, and £250,000 for the purchase of Native lands. Go and look at all the past borrowing Bills, and you will not find any such large sum as this set apart for these purposes in one year.

Mr. SEDDON.—I had thought that, at all events, this Bill would have met with the approval of the senior member for Wellington City, but it appears there is nothing the Government can do, no measure that they can bring forward, but meets with his hostility and adverse criticism. The honourable member knows very well that this is not borrowing. They say, of course, that laughing is catching, and so is crying: probably the honourable member may not laugh when I have finished. I say that, if the honourable member had taken the House into his confidence as he should, he must know that under the Native Land Purchases Act now we are entitled to raise £50,000 a year for the purpose of purchasing Native lands.

Sir R. STOUT.—Not £250,000.

Mr. SEDDON.—That, I believe, runs for this and another two years, and consequently we are entitled by law to raise £150,000 for this purpose. Now, what is asked for this purpose I say in justice to the North Island must be done. We have the land offered by the Natives. The opportunity is there. We can get the land at prices which are fair to the colony and just to the Natives; but while we go on with this dribbling process that has been going on in the past, not merely are the Natives injured, living a life of misery and degradation, but our own population is driven away. Let the honourable gentleman listen to me for a moment, and he will see the necessity for at once dealing with this question. Here is a telegram just received by me,—and all honourable gentlemen in this House who have the interests of the country at heart will say that it is time something should be done:—

“Secretary, Labour Department, Wellington.

“Departures for Sydney: ‘Tasmania’—129 saloon, 95 steerage; ‘Rotomahana’—164 saloon, 94 steerage; ‘Mararoa’—243 saloon, 180 steerage: total—596 saloon, 369 steerage: 905. Return tickets, 68 saloon, 2 steerage: total, 70. This return includes both sexes—company could not give separate. Fares: saloon, £1; steerage, 10s. Of course, nearly all would try and go saloon. The whole talk was Coolgardie, and no doubt but the gold-fever is somewhat on. It would be difficult to tell capital, but it is generally acknowledged that a man to go to Coolgardie would require about £20, as it would take nearly £10 to get there, and a prudent man would want £10 on arrival. On the other hand, many will go if they can only manage to arrive. Passengers comprised all classes—solicitors, clerks, tradesmen, labourers, speculators. There is no doubt but many have gone on spec. just to see the place, and stop or return as inducements offer. To this is added the enticement of such cheap trips that men are tempted, as they could not live on shore for treble the sum. I heard some were heard to say they had a lingering cold and would try the trip for a change. You can take this as an instance, and conclude how a large number are going just for the trip, careless how it turns out. If good, so much the better, and, if not, well, they had a cheap and pleasant outing.

“H. FERGUSON,

“Labour Bureau Agent, Auckland.”

A total of 905 persons leaving. What does all this point to? It points to this: that if we had the land opened for them,—if we had it roaded, so that they could get upon the land,—the chances are they would not be wanting to go to Australia, but would be permanently settled on the lands of our colony. And here is at once—if the honourable gentleman desired to do what was just—the answer to the question: Are we under the circumstances to permit this drifting policy—neither more nor less—this losing of the population of our colony, to continue—or are we at once to firmly grapple with the evil, take a bold course, and take the necessary means for placing the people on the land? That is the difference between what the honourable gentleman is contending for and the course the Government are following. Now, with regard to this Bill, as with regard to nearly every Bill we bring before the House, when there is nothing else to be found fault with, the drafting is defective. So says the honourable gentleman. I should not like to tempt the honourable gentleman, or to place anything before him in the way of temptation, in case there should be a violation of the Disqualification Act, but if a Bill draftsman were wanted in the colony, and if the honourable gentleman would take up that position, then thanksgivings would be offered, and I think our troubles would be over. I wish to say this: that when the honourable member was in my position he was very much troubled with the same complaint, because the Bill-drafting from 1884 to 1887 was no better than we have at the present time. As to the Hospitals and Charitable Institutions Act, the Judges have said that no man who reads it can understand it. At all events, Sir, there may be, as the honourable gentleman says, room for improvement. But that is purely a Committee objection. When we get into Committee on this Bill I hope the honourable gentleman will give my honourable colleague his able assistance, and then, no doubt, we shall make the drafting perfect.

Sir R. STOUT.—What is the meaning of section 4?

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable member is very anxious to get me away from the point I am dealing with at the present time. The honourable member asks me what is the meaning of section 4. Well, I simply say this: The honourable member said we could take the moneys raised for the purpose of giving assistance to any person settled on the land; that we may take the whole of this money, and that this power was given solely to the Minister of Lands.

Sir R. STOUT.—No; I did not say that.

Mr. SEDDON.—That is as I understood the honourable member. He may not have used the exact words, but that was the meaning of what he said. He meant that this Bill was giving a personal power to the Minister of Lands to take public moneys, and that favouritism could be exercised, to the disadvantage of the State. We have been carrying out this policy. We have been assisting settlers who have gone upon the lands. We found that the demand for work was very great this winter, and that it was necessary to give some assistance to these people—deserving men, men ready and anxious to work, men who in time will make splendid settlers. Were we to allow them to remain in the towns, a charge on the ratepayers, living, I say, a life of misery, their wives and children suffering, whilst we had a public estate there? The trees wanted felling; the men were there to do it; every tree felled meant the improvement of the public estate of this country. We have therefore taken those means. We have placed those men on those lands. They have felled the bush. It is ready for burning. We shall have the land grassed. And, as my honourable colleague says, we have a school now in one district. These very men are independent; they are hewing homes for themselves, and they will become permanent settlers, and will increase the products of the country. Then, for such a purpose we propose taking a portion of the money so raised, and to pay these men for the work they have done, at the value of their labour to the land, and ultimately they will pay back to the State a fair interest on the money we have raised for this purpose. The capital value of the land has been increased, therefore the security is good; and I am sure I am voicing the opinion of this House when I say I do not think there are half a dozen members who will not approve of the Government taking this course—in settling people on the land. The sooner we admit this fact the better: that it is of no use taking a man simply with nothing but his hands and putting him in the bush in the hope that he will become a settler. You cannot do it. You must have public works going on, at which he can earn sufficient to pay for his food and clothes; and married men with families must be assisted, or they are a burden on the ratepayers under the Charitable Institutions Act. Therefore it is necessary to adopt this course, and the sooner we go to work in a practical shape the better it will be. I suppose my colleague will take a certain amount—perhaps £20,000—for this purpose. This is a fair allocation, and will not be objected to.

Mr. BELL.—He ought to take the whole.

Mr. SEDDON.—I am afraid we must not go to extremes; but, at all events, there ought to be a fair and liberal proportion.

An Hon. MEMBER.—£20,000 is not enough.

Mr. SEDDON.—I am pleased to hear honourable members say they approve of this course that is laid down. But the senior member for Wellington City takes exception to what we propose to do under section 4, and the manner in which it is to be done, because it gives too much power to the Minister, and may be abused. I say, so long as we have Responsible Government, and with the senior member for Wellington City in the House—and I hope he will be here a long time—I do not think my colleague the Minister of Lands, or any one on these benches, will be able to do much wrong without its being exposed. There is a check on Ministers—the members direct, and the people in the country. If a Minister is not to be trusted in matters of this kind he has no right to be on these benches. You must trust him. And not only this: you have the Land Boards—are they corrupt? Who deal with the details of settling the people on the land? The Land Board; they do not come to the Minister direct. And there is another safeguard. There are the Minister, the Land Board, and the Commissioner of Lands: are they corrupt and not to be trusted? I say an argument of this kind will not hold water for a moment. Not only that, but, as regards these very roads and bridges which the honourable gentleman says so much about, every vote has to come before the House. In the Public Works Statement there will be a schedule showing, item by item, on what particular roads and bridges the Minister of Lands proposes to expend the money. There is a safeguard. It is not to be left to the Minister's own sweet will and discretion to spend this money on particular roads and bridges—the responsibility rests with the House. The senior member for Wellington City will have the opportunity, if he finds a road or bridge which does not lead to Crown land, or which does not open up Crown land or Native land, of moving that the item be struck out, and calling on the Minister to explain in detail the particular item. Surely that in itself is a safe guard; and there is not any weight whatever to be attached to his argument in that respect. Then, my honourable friend the Minister of Lands has been compared to the Czar of Russia. Well, Sir, I do not know the Czar of Russia, but I know the Minister of Lands, and I know he is not threatened; he is not afraid of the assassin; there are none of these bombs placed in his way; there is nothing going on to compass his destruction, and I at once say that if the life of the Czar of Russia was as happy as that of the Minister of Lands, and he was as well satisfied that he had done justice to his people as the Minister of Lands to the people of New Zealand, he would have nothing to fear. The Minister of Lands has nothing to fear, and he is not entitled to have that said of him. Now, Sir, the honourable gentleman took occasion—and I do not think he was warranted in saying this—to say that, where it is a matter of policy, the Government supporters swallow it, and do precisely what they are told. I undertake to say that if the honourable gentleman challenges a division on this Bill he will find the Opposition members will come with the Government and do their duty to the country.

Sir R. STOUT.—To their districts.

Mr. SEDDON.—No; I say, to their country; and if the honourable member does not see his way to do what I believe is his duty to the country—and particularly to his constituents, and to the North Island in particular—I must express my regret; because I say that the one way possible of helping settlement, or developing the resources of the North Island particularly, is by putting in exercise the provisions of the Bill before us. The honourable gentleman told us that it was said some years ago—in 1877 and after that year—that we were not to hear roads and bridges mentioned on the floor of the House.

Sir R. STOUT.—Before that year.

Mr. SEDDON.—I suppose the honourable gentleman is alluding to the abolition of the provinces. All I can say is this: I have been in the House since 1870, and I have always heard roads and bridges mentioned on the floor of the House. We have general politics and the higher branches of politics discussed at the commencement and in the middle of the session, but the keenest interest in any matter coming before the House is in the public-works estimates: in fact, party and the higher branches of politics vanish into thin air before the Public Works Statement.

Captain RUSSELL.—When are we going to get it?

Mr. SEDDON.—As soon as it is ready.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—Not ready yet?

Mr. SEDDON.—It is impossible. Here we have these proposals, and we have to depend on our supporters and on the Opposition to assist us in passing this Bill, and by doing that we shall be expediting the Public Works Statement. It is of no use for us to say that we are not going to have a road or a bridge mentioned on the floor of this House. It is unavoidable; you are bound to have it. The honourable gentleman is one of those who are constantly urging extension of the functions of the State. Now, I say one of the functions of the State is promoting the settlement of the country, and you cannot promote the settlement of the country without roads and bridges, and you cannot construct roads and bridges unless you have money, and you cannot get money except from the people through the House. The Parliament holds the public purse-strings. The honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), when Premier, tried his hand in 1886: he is responsible for the Counties Act of that year: that is the local-government measure the honourable gentleman and his Ministry placed on the statute-book. Did they do anything in the direction of preventing a road or bridge from being mentioned on the floor of the House? If ever there were measures that took from local governing bodies their revenue, and left the districts dependent upon allocation, it was the very legislation he promoted. If he had gone back to the old provincial system and given the local bodies a certain revenue that they could depend upon, and from that revenue could construct roads and bridges, I could have understood it; but when he had the opportunity he did not do so. Therefore he should not blame the present Government because we have simply had to deal with some questions of greater importance; and I do hope, at all events, we shall to some extent minimise what is a growing evil—that is, small amounts, small roads and bridges in our settled or unsettled districts, coming before Parliament. But it can only be done by depleting the general revenue. We must give to the local governing bodies the revenue wherewith to construct roads and bridges which are necessary for the promotion of settlement in the counties and Road Board districts. Now, the honourable gentleman says half this money might be spent in opening up or constructing roads and bridges in no way whatever connected with Crown lands or with the settling of Crown lands. I say the power is given to the House itself, and there is not the slightest danger—no chance whatever—of anything wrong being done in this respect. It may be that there may be a block of Native land beyond the main road which the Government have purchased from the Natives. We may not be able to approach the land. Upon the honourable gentleman's contention, it would be unwise to spend money because this Native land was there. I say you must not consider that; you must consider the fact that you have the land beyond, and unless you connect that land with the arterial road you cannot promote settlement. I am not going to cast a reflection on the last Administration, but I say that in purchasing Native lands it would pay better to have given £1 10s. an acre and bought lands adjoining roads and bridges, and close to settlement, than to get it miles away, giving, perhaps, 2s. 6d. or 3s. for it. But, this policy having obtained, we are called to make the best of it. For the future I should say, Buy as close as you can to the roads—buy the best land, and get it as near to white settlement as you can. This is a wiser policy. These are matters we must under the circumstances take into consideration. As regards the question of sly borrowing, and this bogey that has been raised time after time in the House, every measure that comes before the House now is met with the exclamation, "Oh! that is borrowing." I say that this is not borrowing in the general acceptance of the term. I say that where you are buying an estate, and have the value of your money in exchange, you have your debenture in the one hand and the land in the other. That is quite a different thing altogether from borrowing money for public-works purposes—and some of the works anything but reproductive—many being political and not in the interests of the country. That is the distinction; and we can say honestly this is no loan. You do not find any loan Bills brought down by Government; not for six years has there been one on the statute-book. Will it be said that the money raised for the purpose of purchasing the Cheviot Estate was borrowing? Never a word was said about it; and what is the difference between acquiring the Cheviot Estate for the promotion of settlement in Canterbury and acquiring Native lands in the North Island? We are simply going under this Bill to use the money in the same way as in the case of the Cheviot Estate. Neither is it sly borrowing nor borrowing in any sense of the term. I thought on this Bill we might have had just a speech from my colleague explaining the details, and, if there were any defects, I am sure my colleague would be only too glad of the assistance of the senior member for Wellington City and of any honourable member in the House. I was pleased to find the honourable member for Eden admitting the necessity for the Bill and promising to support it. It is when bringing measures of this kind forward, and they are received as this has been, that we receive encouragement, and the country under such circumstances will appreciate the action of the Opposition in taking such 4.0. a course. But if they follow the lead of the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), and carp and cavil at every measure no matter what its benefits to the country may be, then their criticism will fall flat, because the people will say, "The Government cannot always be wrong." This is one of those cases in which I thought every member would have said we were going in the right direction, and that the benefits to be derived from this legislation would have been such as to commend themselves to every right-thinking man in the country.

Mr. BELL.—The honourable gentleman appears to be inspired with hope that the members of the Opposition will be bribed to come into this profligate scramble for the borrowed money which he throws on the floor of the House. The honourable gentleman read a telegram just now, stating that large numbers of men are leaving the colony. Does he remember the speech which he made in the last Parliament about our fathers and brothers leaving the colony?

Mr. SEDDON.—There was no Coolgardie at that time.

Mr. BELL.—If it is Coolgardie, what does the honourable gentleman read the telegram for?

Mr. SEDDON.—We ought to have a counter-attraction in the way of land-settlement.

Mr. BELL.—Why, people in all parts of the country are in distress, and not one single thing is being done for them by this Government. Money is to be borrowed for the people who are able to borrow money upon the security of their leaseholds and freeholds. Money is to be borrowed for the purchase of Native land; but not one single penny has been proposed to be devoted to the purpose of making provision for the employment of labour. This money is to be dissipated without helping the labourers.

Mr. SEDDON.—Out of what funds are the two thousand men paid who are now employed on various works?

Mr. BELL.—The honourable gentleman knows perfectly well that, when money was formerly used for public works, labour, at all events, was being employed. I do not say it was always a good thing; but that expenditure did employ labour. This expenditure does not employ labour. It will simply go into the pockets of the well-to-do class. I should have been glad if I could have stood beside the honourable member for Eden and said, "Here, at last, is the expenditure of money for the improvement of our lands and for the employment of labour." The honourable gentleman says that £20,000 out of £250,000 is to be used in the employment of labour.

Mr. SEDDON.—No; that is for bushfelling.

Mr. BELL.—The proper course which this country should take in respect to its land is this: This country is the landlord of its own land, and it ought to remain the landlord. Every acre it sells is a wrong. It has been said that I stated in one of my election speeches that I drafted a Bill for the Minister of Lands. That is not correct. I said that the Minister of Lands was beginning, and I hoped he would continue, to adopt what I had been preaching for years from the platform—namely, that the country should undertake the improvement of the land, and then settle the land; that it should not send people in misery into the bush without funds. Now the honourable gentleman comes down with a Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Bill. The real policy of the country is patent for a Ministry which is willing to undertake it; but this Ministry will not undertake it. We own the land, which is in great part covered with bush. We know that people will not leave the towns and go into the bush. It is a life of misery.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. BELL.—Yes; it is a life of misery. For a long time the men cannot earn a shilling on the land; the land has to be cleared, and then grassed. But the country has it in its power, without adding a shilling to its debt, really to do all the work for them. It can employ these men, and then make them pay for the improvements afterwards. There is no difficulty about it at all. The thing can be done on a large scale just as it is done on a small scale. I am speaking of a thing which has been thoroughly thought out, not only by myself, but by men far more competent to deal with this subject than I am. The Minister of Lands has recently tried the experiment. Has it or has it not been a success where he has tried it? I understood the Premier to say that it has been a success. If it be successful for a number of isolated men to clear small sections and then settle the country, it must necessarily be more advantageous to clear the country in large blocks and put the men upon cleared land, where they can earn an income. The Premier says these clauses have been drafted for that purpose. The senior member for Wellington City has pointed out that they will not effect anything of the kind. Take some possible successors of the honourable gentlemen: How will it be possible to trust them with such powers as are given here in clauses 4 and 5? It is easy to use language which will enable the country to do the work; but this Act provides that the colony shall enter into an agreement with these people, and make advances to them, when it should itself expend the money and employ the people.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—That is what we are doing.

Mr. BELL.—I know that, and that is what the Government ought to continue to do. I approve of what the honourable gentleman is doing in this respect, and hope he will continue in that way. Then, the honourable gentleman proposes that the House shall pass a measure retrospectively authorising expenditure to be incurred out of the loan which is to be raised for the construction of works under this part of the Act. If the honourable gentleman has already taken funds under this Bill in anticipation that it will be passed, no doubt Parliament would condone that once or twice, but if the honourable gentleman does that kind of thing often the Government will find themselves defendants in the Supreme Court at the suit of the Auditor-General. If the honourable gentleman would say, "I am going to borrow money,"—and I should not object to the word "borrow" at all—if he would say, "I am going to borrow money for the purpose of enabling this Government, the people of this country, the landowners of the country, to improve their estate, and thereafter to settle the people of the country on an improved estate"—they would have no greater supporter in that proposal than myself. That is part of the policy which I myself have long advocated.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Making a good road?

Mr. BELL.—I consider that making a good road into a block is a necessary part of the business of the country, but I believe in being repaid the money which we use for that purpose. But under this proposal we are adding to the permanent debt of the colony for works which we ought to pay a portion of ourselves. Take the case of the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan. We were told that the money might be just as well spent in the purchase of Native land, and that such purchases would be for the benefit of the railway. The money was expended on Native land instead of in the construction of the line; and the money has all gone—it has disappeared.

Mr. SEDDON.—Not quite.

Mr. BELL.—The land is there, but the proceeds go in "thirds" and "fourths," and all the rest of it. Part of the land is disposed of for special settlements, and part of it is let, and the money goes into the ordinary revenue. To give the land on 999-years leaseholds, and to make no provision for the refund of the capital, is to increase the debt of the country with the mere chance of the rent providing for the interest. Any landowner who entered upon such a programme as the present Government has entered upon, making no provision for repayment, would find himself landed in the Court of the Official Assignee; and the objection, at all events, on my part—I speak for none but myself—is this: that the provision is one under which, as the honourable member tells us, he is going to buy land without having anything with which to replace the money, and he is also going to dispose of the land so that in the end we shall have a debt and nothing for

it. I say we have been told before in this country what the honourable gentlemen now tell us, and the result has been that we have a debt and no assets to represent it—the land that was acquired is land that has simply gone; we have paid off no debt. But the conversion of these debentures into stock means an addition to the permanent debt—it means that, if you take the debentures here which might possibly have been redeemed—which we might possibly have made an effort to redeem—and convert them into stock elsewhere, the burden will become so great to ourselves as well as to our successors in this country that we shall, unless we are particular, have this Parliament held up to execration in future years. I know very well how ineffectual is our protest; yet we are speaking with a sense of the gravity of the occasion when we indicate that which is of the essence of the most ordinary rule of business. If you enter upon an arrangement, or a policy, or a course which will inevitably lead to the expenditure of capital money, then you must make provision for the filling-up of the hole in your affairs, or you must come to inevitable ruin. It was said the other day that the provision of a guarantee on two millions was to add an enormous sum to the coffers of the Bank of New Zealand. Why, any one can see that two millions appears on one side of the account, and two millions appears on the other, and that unless provision be made for the repayment of the money the bank will be exactly in the same position as regards its balance-sheet years hence as it is now. That is the position of the country, and I maintain that if we go on borrowing million after million, adding to the public debt, and making no provision for reduction by annual sinking fund, however small, we are continuing a course of wicked and profligate extravagance which, I am sure, will lead to this Parliament and this Government being held up to the execration of the people of the future.

Mr. PIRANI.—It is surprising, after all we have heard in the past from the Opposition about money being driven away from the country, causing loss to the working-men, to find the argument that cheap money in the country will not give or will not cause more employment is advanced by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). We know this: that if the settlers can get cheap money,—if they can get money at a cheap rate to be expended in improving their lands,—the whole of the money spent on these improvements goes to the working-men; and nothing will do more to improve the position of the working-men than will the expenditure of this cheap money by settlers in improving their lands. With regard to the Bill itself, I think it is a wise step on the part of the Minister of Lands to introduce such a measure as this in regard to improving lands for the use of the settlers. But I fancy he has gone rather too far when he allows the area of land to be taken up under this system, and to be improved under this system, to be the area defined in Part III. of the Land Act. That means that the assisted settlers will be able to take up 640 acres of first-class land, or 2,000 acres of second-class land; and if a man wants to take up that area he does not want the assistance laid down in this Bill. Already we have two settlements, I believe,—one at Pemberton and the other, recently formed, on the Hautapu Block,—based pretty well upon these lines. The bush is felled and the land grassed, and after that is done it is divided up into small areas, so that those doing the improvements will be able to take up the land to better advantage than if they attempted to take it up in the first instance. But the mistake the Minister has made is this: that, while cheap land close to the main trunk lines of railway—like that piece of land at Levin, which is now called the Horowhenua Village Settlement, and the piece of land near Waverley called Momohaki—is available, land which is eminently adapted for small settlers and for settlement on the same lines as are laid down here, he has gone into the back blocks. He has gone, for instance, to places like Pemberton, where these small settlers have to plough their way, I might almost say, through tons of mud, and where it is impossible to have any vehicular traffic; and I have not the least doubt, if the settlements are not a failure under these circumstances, it will be owing to superhuman abilities on the part of the men living there. It is an essential for the success of small settlements to place the men who are to make a livelihood out of these lands near to the centres of population, and, if that is made the first consideration, I have not the least doubt it will mean very much more successful settlement than if you put them in remote parts of the district. In regard to the second part of the Bill—that dealing with Native-land acquisition—it seems to me that from the first purchase of Native land by the colony until the present day the colony is really no richer; and until we alter our system of acquiring Native lands, and acquire them for the purpose of settlement, and not for speculation by the State, we shall never have a satisfactory system of acquiring Native lands. If the State were to administer the lands on behalf of the Native owners, and to use the lands for the purpose of settlement merely, placing altogether on one side the question of the money to be derived from those lands, we should not only get land without having to borrow money for it, but we should prevent the jobbery and corruption with which the Native Department has reeked so much ever since it was instituted in the colony; and I say that it is impossible to altogether separate from the acquisition of Native lands in the way of purchase that sort of jobbery and corruption. It is in the nature of things that it exists, and it will never be improved off the face of the colony until we abolish that system of acquiring Native land. I trust this Bill will be carried, and that, at any rate, the part dealing with the improvement of lands for settlement will be passed, and such safeguards given, and such limitation of the area made, as will improve the measure, and make it more in the interest of the small settlers than it appears to be on the face of it.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—The honourable gentleman who has just sat down prefaced his remarks with a short dissertation on the value of cheap money to farmers, but it was not at all applicable to this Bill. He went on to denounce the past system of acquiring Native lands, and he declared that lands ought to be bought near the centres of settlement, and that Native lands in the future should not be bought for speculative purposes but for settlement. Well, I hold that the Government are only doing their duty in buying Native land for speculation. They require to go into the remote parts of a district, and to rail and road the country to these lands, and, if they are not to gain the advantages of the increased value that they thus confer upon the land, then I should like to know who are to gain those advantages. The Government should, of course. I think, therefore, it is part of the duty of the Government to take advantage of the land which they may acquire in such places as were referred to by the honourable member for Palmerston, and the revenue from which will yet form a considerable fund in this colony. Now, I quite agree with the principle of the measure itself. I quite approve of allocating money for the purchase of Native lands. The more quickly we purchase Native lands and bring them into utility the better. Regarding that part of the Bill which provides that £250,000 shall be raised for improving Crown lands, I may say that, personally, from my experience of the Crown lands in the South, I do not think a great deal of it. Perhaps these settlements may be more successful in the North, but it appears to me that the system of employing labour in improving bush-farms is a system which adds a great cost to the land when it comes to be taken up either by the men who cleared the land or by other settlers. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) seemed to dwell for some considerable time upon the absolute necessity there was for providing a fund for the purpose of repaying the sums of money to be borrowed either for the purchase of land or for roading. He said that a small amount should be reinvested to provide a fund for that class of security. I altogether disagree with the honourable gentleman's conclusions. I hold that the people of the colony should not be required to reduce the principle; if they succeed in paying interest on the moneys so borrowed they do very well indeed. We know that if posterity inherits the liability it will also enjoy the advantages of the improvements that have been made. I cannot quite agree with my honourable friend in his contention, to that extent. I think the Bill in some of its clauses requires modification, or perhaps I shall better express my meaning by saying that some of the clauses might be more carefully defined. Clause 4 is of this description. It really appears, as drafted, to read as if people may squat almost everywhere, and have a right to the lands on which they squat. I shall be prepared to assist in amending the Bill in Committee.

Mr. MILLS.—I have very much pleasure in noticing that this Bill has been brought before the House, and I generally find that those who have the least experience of some of these measures are usually anxious to give their opinions. I now allude to the senior member for Wellington City, and to the medium, or second, member (Mr. Bell), the middle man. He generally gives expression to opinions on nearly every subject. But I venture to ask him what practical experience he has had in connection with land. Now, when he gives us some of his experience with regard to his own profession, I always listen to him with the greatest attention, because I know he is one of those capable men whose opinions on legal matters are worth listening to. But when he gets up to read a lecture to the House on matters appertaining to land I merely take his remarks at a discount, and think to myself that what he knows about the subject is not worth taking notice of. Sir, it is very amusing at times to hear—either during a debate or just at the termination—the introduction of the common conjunction “if”—“If so-and-so is altered I shall be found a warm supporter.” However, the “if” is always there. The honourable gentleman ought to be a warm supporter of the measure, and the criticism he has brought forward against it has certainly not been of that nature which will carry conviction to the mind of any one who has been listening to him. To my mind, such criticism weakens the position he takes up. Sir, I am glad to say that this is a Ministry that has the courage of its opinions. They bring something forward, I admit, that is somewhat new. All the better. If we are going to run in the same old groove year after year, we shall still hear people complaining of the depression here and the want of work there. Something must be done, everybody must admit that, and so it is for the Government to come out with a policy that will be beneficial to the colony, and it is the duty of this House to improve whatever measures they bring forward. They cannot be perfect all through, but there is evidence of good faith and of the great interest they take in the work they have before them. They are doing their best to place before the House such measures as will tend to improve the position of all those who reside in the colony at the present time. Now, taking clause 2, which relates to the construction of roads and bridges: I venture to say that roads and bridges are the mainstay of the back-country settlers, and we shall have to find something in the way of reasonable accommodation for them if we want to do them any good—that is, if we want them to remain on the land. And, if we acknowledge that the lands will require the outlay of a large amount of capital and labour to improve them, the greater facilities we give the settlers the better; and there is very little doubt that in time they will encourage others to come and take up land alongside of them. I know that in a great part of the district I represent the people have very poor roads: in fact, they are miserable tracks to their holdings, and I recognise that there is something required in the direction this Bill shadows forth, not only to improve the Crown lands, but also to improve the lands held by other people as well. With regard to the objections raised by the senior member for Wellington City against clause 4, he overlooks the fact that the points he raised are to be provided for by regulations, and I assume the position of a man coming under these regulations will be the same as that of a man who takes up land under the village-settlement system—that is, that he will be required to comply with the regulations under the system before he is entitled to take up a lease of the land. Sir, I assume that this Bill does provide for borrowing for suitable purposes, and my only objection to it is that it is only for a quarter of a million for the purchase of Native lands, and I think it should be a great deal more. Some people have an objection to the idea of purchasing land for settlement under any circumstances; and we must all acknowledge that the purchase of land near any settlement—that is, an old settlement—costs a great deal to the colony. But if we purchase Native land at a reasonable figure, as the Minister has told us, and then road it, to my mind Parliament is doing a good thing. We are encouraging settlement, and locating on the lands people who would otherwise remain about the towns. I do not view a settler's life in the same deplorable light as that pictured by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). The bushman has hard work, but his greatest trouble is as to what he is going to get for his dinner, and if he can keep the flour-bag supplied he can look forward with hope to gaining in the future some of those advantages of civilisation we consider necessary to us. There are many little troubles, of course, to be put up with, but at the same time there are many pleasures in a bush life that those who live in towns do not have; and therefore I do not think we should attempt to discourage people from becoming settlers; we should rather attempt to draw a brighter picture and persuade those who live in the towns to go and settle in the country. Before sitting down I should like to say that this Bill has, to my mind, made provision to supply a long-felt want, and I hope when we go into Committee to consider the details of the Bill we shall all have this object in view—namely, to improve, as far as possible, the important measure before the House, and endeavour to buy as much of our Native lands as will be required for settlement in the colony.

Mr. WILSON.—I cannot help carrying my mind back, Sir, to about the year 1882, remembering that the first member who suggested that the Crown lands should be improved before sale was the late Mr. Macarthur. Now so much is said in favour of first reading land and then settling it that the originator of the system should be remembered. In those days he had a great deal of experience of the sale of improved lands, and the company with which he was connected was the first to settle land successfully in that way. I think the settlement obtained in this way in that district, by its success, proved that to be the proper way. I am glad to see that the proposal is first of all to expend money on roads, and I agree in the main with the Bill. I believe that for no better purpose could money be raised than for the purchase of Native lands. There are still some few lands in my own district that could be purchased if the Government go the right way about it. They are now distinctly a bar to settlement. And, further, towards the centre of the Island, where the land is not quite so good, there are still large areas, on which I am quite certain they will never get settlers unless they make roads there first. I intend to vote for the second reading of the Bill, and I probably should not have made any remarks had it not been for the Premier saying that we could not banish roads and bridges from the House. There is no harm in discussing roads and bridges in the House; but what I object to is the way in which the money is allocated for the roads and bridges. If we are going to have any money spent on roads and bridges it should be by Act of Parliament; if you are going to provide any money for the purpose of roads and bridges, you should lay down the principle by Act, to allow all portions of the colony to participate in the advantages, so that no member may gain an advantage over another by backstairs influence. Now, the Roads and Bridges Construction Act laid down the principle clearly; but it went too far, it was too generous, but main roads under it were subsidised. To my mind, it was an Act that was very suitable to the North Island. On the West Coast during the last ten years the local bodies have had to settle the whole of their lands, and to devote most of their rates for the purpose of making main roads, and they could not get any assistance from the Government to do it. The Roads and Bridges Construction Act enabled them to get Government assistance to make roads and bridges. And some such assistance should be given to local bodies where main roads are yet to be made. The Surveyor-General in his report tells us that the time has arrived when the Government may be called upon to take over some of the main roads of the colony; and when the question of the allocation of funds is going through I hope the House will insist on some means being adopted whereby all people may participate in the moneys available. I shall certainly vote for the second reading of the Bill. There are some clauses that I think might be amplified, but I shall, at any rate, say nothing more until the Bill is in Committee.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—Sir, like the honourable gentleman who has just sat down, I shall strongly support the principle of this Bill, and for this reason: I think the roading of the colony is a most important matter, and one which has been very much neglected in days past. In regard to what has fallen from the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), I agree as to the necessity of the country being improved before settlement. I, however, differ from him in one respect. I gather from what he said that he considers that it is proper that there should be connected with this expenditure something in the nature of a sinking fund, so that the money spent could be paid back. But, if that method is brought about, I do not see how we can avoid something in the nature of the cash system of selling our lands. If that is to be the result of what the honourable member proposes, then we certainly should not be able to carry out that idea. I am one of those who think that no more land should be sold. I think all our land should be on perpetual or eternal lease, provided it is revalued from time to time, and while I am in this House I shall always advocate that course. I think the Government should, in letting its lands, in the first place give an opportunity to small settlers who take up sections to find employment in making the roads and in opening up further blocks of land. The settlers should then have an opportunity of enlarging their holdings. I think if that principle were carried on it would be a great success. My principal object in rising in connection with this Bill is to object in toto to clauses 4, 5, 6, and 7. Clause 4 provides that any person may, by agreement with the Minister, settle upon any Crown land. This Bill is not confined to bush districts in the North Island; it relates to wherever there are Crown lands to be opened up, and any person can, by agreement with the Minister, go and settle upon those lands; and, having done so, power is given to the Colonial Treasurer to advance to those particular persons money with which to improve the block. I ask honourable members to notice particularly that—

“Any person may by agreement with the Minister settle upon any Crown lands for the purpose of clearing or otherwise improving the same, upon such terms as to advances or otherwise as may be agreed on, and the Colonial Treasurer may, when authorised by Parliament, make all such advances out of moneys available under this Act.”

I say, if these clauses are to remain in the Bill, you will be bringing back the very worst evils that have been caused by the gridironing in Canterbury in past days.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Nonsense!

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL.—An honourable member says “Nonsense!” It may be nonsense so far as he is concerned; but we all know what the evils of that system were in Canterbury; and we say this: that if any man is to be allowed to go and pick the eyes out of a valuable block of land, and thus cause difficulties with regard to the future settlement of that block, it is bound to be disastrous in its effect on large portions of the country. I say, Sir, that any enactment which permits of anything in the nature of gridironing being carried out will be disastrous in the future. The Government should themselves, in the first place, improve the land, and when it is improved they should throw it open for sale under the ordinary clauses of the Land Act, and let everybody have the same opportunity of selecting the land. No person should be enabled to get the ear of the Minister and make a private agreement with him to secure special portions of a block. If that provision is to be carried out in this Bill you have got a worse form of gridironing than ever existed in Canterbury. Honourable members talk of safeguards, but I object altogether to the necessity of safeguards where a matter of principle is involved, and I sincerely hope the House will throw out this portion of the Bill. I should like to ask why clauses like these are incorporated in this Bill. This is an amendment of the Land Act in a most important matter, and one that ought to have been brought down in a general Act, and not in a Bill of this kind. It has no business in this Bill, because it is asserting a new and general principle, and I shall do my best to have this clause excised in Committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I am very glad to be able to give the Minister a general support to the principle of this Bill, although, as a matter of fact, it does not largely interest the district I represent, because it happens for the most part to be an old-settled district. Now, with regard to the purchase of Native lands, I was much astonished at what fell from the two members representing Wellington City. My honourable friend Mr. Bell complained that there was only £20,000—so the Premier said—to be allocated to the improvement of the land, and that there was no sinking fund provided to prevent the cost of the land from being added to the permanent debt of the colony. Now, there is only one way in which that can be arranged, as far as I know, and that is by a reversion to the freehold system, against which both these honourable gentlemen are strongly opposed. I think, if they will look to the history of land-settlement in this colony, they will fail altogether to find any profit which has been made by the State on the purchase and settlement of Native land out of which any fund could have been established for extinguishing the debt. Are settlers to be charged a rate beyond that which they can afford to pay out of the products of the land? I feel satisfied settlers generally are heavily enough taxed already, without any further burden being imposed upon them; and it would be impossible that any such fund as that named by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) should be established. The senior member for Wellington City must also realise this. He objected to the purchase of Native land.

Sir R. STOUT.—No; I did not say so.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I understood the honourable gentleman to mean this at all events, as he objected to the large addition which would be made to the debt of the colony by the purchase of Native land.

Sir R. STOUT.—Hear, hear;—out of borrowed money.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Perhaps the honourable gentleman will indicate how he could avoid creating this debt in perpetuity, if he insists that the freehold land shall not be parted with by the State.

Mr. G. W. Russell

Sir R. STOUT.—Take the Native Land Act of 1886.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—That did not mean that the Crown was to buy Native land at all; the Crown was to act as agent for the Natives, who would still remain the owners of the land. The honourable gentleman must see that that is altogether inconsistent with the land-nationalisation which he supports.

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Well, if the Natives are to remain the owners of the land, I cannot see how the State can at the same time be the owner. The honourable gentleman would then have a system of landlordism under the Natives in the same way as if the Government parted with the land to Europeans, who would afterwards let it to farmers, as is the custom in Great Britain. As regards the roads-and-bridges section of the Bill, as a representative of the North Island, what comes home to me is, if the settlers in a bush district are to pay their way and make homes for themselves I cannot see how they are to establish dairy factories and settle as they ought to do upon the land unless they have roads to carry their produce. I hope the Minister will take my criticism in no unfriendly spirit; but when we had £30,000 allocated in 1891, I think, for roads and bridges without any schedule whatever, he was severely condemned, and rightly so; and now we have no less than £250,000 under this Bill. If the honourable gentleman were on this side of the House he would be the first to criticize and condemn such a system of uncontrolled expenditure as this.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—You will have the estimates for all these roads.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Unless there is such a schedule it leaves the distribution of the money to the sweet will of the Minister, exposing him to accusations of all sorts, which in many cases may be justified, of allocating this money according to the "colour" of the applicant. Then I come to the remarks of the Premier where he condemned the dribbling system that had obtained in the past in the settlement of lands, and he read to the House a telegram he had received from Auckland as to the large number of people who had departed to Australia by the steamers he mentioned. I am glad to say we have now an opportunity of saying to the Premier, and to the members of the Government, that their own chickens have come home to roost. How often, both inside and outside of this House, on every platform throughout the colony, have we heard them denounce the Atkinson Government for the exodus of our population about four or five years ago! He pleads the Coolgardie goldfields and cheap steamer-fares as the loadstones that are withdrawing our population by the hundred; but what about the public-works expenditure which was going on in Victoria and New South Wales during the years of the Atkinson Government? Are we not aware of the millions of public and private money that were being poured into those colonies during that time, and that the returns from Coolgardie are but a drop in the bucket compared with them? We shall now see what the present Government—the Government that was to cure all labour troubles, that was to find employment for all the unemployed, that was to inaugurate an era of prosperity that would be a landmark in the history of the colony—with Parliament sitting and a strong majority at their back, we shall now have an opportunity of seeing what they can do with the exodus and the “unemployed” difficulty. The honourable gentleman has already done a great deal of harm to the colony by suspending the sword over the most enterprising settlers in New Zealand, and utterly destroying all confidence; and the working-men are the greatest sufferers. We have inquiries now from Sydney and the Australian Colonies generally as to what the effect of the honourable gentleman’s policy is, and the reply can only be in one direction. The Premier told us that we had thousands of men willing to work, and that all that was required was to open the lands to these people. What are men without money to do upon the land? With only their swags on their backs, and nothing to commence the arduous work of settlement, what can they do? They can do very little until they are first able to save some money and make a commencement. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) was good enough to describe in piteous terms the hardships of settlers in the bush; but the honourable gentleman himself has never had much experience in the bush or in the real work of settlement. I have myself gone through a little of it in an experience of nearly forty years in the colonies, and I never thought life in the bush to be a miserable life, and I deprecate the idle talk of men whose experience is altogether confined to the towns. I have mislaid some evidence that came before the Labour Bills Committee during the last few days, but the purport of the evidence given by one of the witnesses—Mr. Allan Ward, the president of the Trades and Labour Council—is that “he would be very sorry indeed to send his boy out to a country district to go cow-spanking, and work for sixteen hours a day.”

Boys in factories who are apprenticed for a term get in most cases something like 5s. or 6s. a week to commence with, their wages increasing very slowly during the term of their indentures, and their food and lodging cost much more than that, even although they live with their parents. My experience of country boys is that they start at 5s. to 10s. with board and lodging, and their wages increase as they grow to be more useful; and they are thus able to save money from the very beginning. I should like to know how a boy in the towns is to save money out of his 6s. a week, after finding food, clothing, and lodging. Then, Sir, we had a ludicrous attempt by the Premier to deny that the £500,000 to be raised under this Bill was in any sense borrowing, because it was to be used for roads and bridges and the purchase of Native lands. The enormous borrowings of the past have been to a large extent used for the same purposes; yet we never think of separating the sums so used when totalling up the amount borrowed in the past. That the Premier, with the responsibility attaching to his office, should calmly get up and talk such nonsense as this is really most extraordinary.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—That is unparliamentary.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Is it? When did it become so? I agree with the honourable member for Palmerston and the honourable member for Riccarton in their opinion that clause 4 is a very dangerous one. I can understand that good use might be made of it if modified, but I shall be compelled to vote against it as it now stands. I do not think it is a power that should be vested in any Minister of Lands.

Mr. WILLIS.—As my own district is very much interested in this question of acquiring Native lands, it might not be out of place for me to say a few words on the subject. We have heard from various members the expression of opinion, with regard to these intended loans the Government are proposing to raise, that when the people of the colony hear of these proposals they will be very indignant indeed at money being borrowed in this way. In regard to myself, I may state that, if members think the country is opposed to loans for the purpose of promoting settlement, I say in my case it is altogether different. When I stood on the platform at Wanganui I advocated strongly that if ever there was a time when the Government should borrow money for the purpose of opening up the lands of the colony it was the present. So it cannot be urged that I am one who would be afraid to face my constituents when I advocate that it is necessary that money should be borrowed for the purpose of acquiring Native lands and the construction of roads and bridges for the promotion of settlement generally. For a long number of years—forty or upwards—in the district which I represent, we have been confined to a narrow strip of land; we could not go back a distance of fifteen or twenty miles without being in the midst of Native land. While we have seen other parts of the colony progressing—roads being made, and settlement taking place—we have been in the unfortunate position of knowing that by no possibility could settlement be stretched away back, and settlers planted on the back-country. I am glad to say that times have been changing. The Government have seen the necessity of purchasing lands; they have succeeded in purchasing the Waimarino Block and various other blocks, and land-settlement is going on: but it has been going on too slowly, the Natives holding land in large quantities, but it could not be acquired because the Government have not had the money with which to make the purchase. By this proposed loan of a quarter of a million for the purchase of Native lands—which I consider altogether too small, but it will still give the Government the means of assisting settlement to a large extent—by means of this quarter of a million, large numbers of people may be placed on lands that are at present useless alike to Europeans and Natives. You can go over miles of land and see nothing but bush—very beautiful for scenery, but useless for a people to acquire a living upon. When this money is raised, matters will be changed; the Government will have the means to buy land from the Natives, and plant people upon it. We were told by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) that this was a profligate scramble for borrowed money. I resent this language altogether; it is not a profligate scramble, but an honest effort to see that the people of the country are properly settled. The honourable gentleman went on to say that people were leaving this colony in enormous numbers because the Government was not giving them employment. The Government is twitted that it is not spending money in legitimate employment. I say, if money is to be spent in legitimate employment, it should be in opening up these lands. The charges made by the honourable gentleman utterly fall to the ground. The Land for Settlements Bill has been discussed at great length, and I am glad to say it received a large measure of support, the object being to raise money by which large blocks of land could be bought back for the people. The part of the colony that will benefit by that measure most is the South Island. And rightly; I do not grudge the large sums of money being spent there. But I say that members from the South Island should be glad to see the North Island members having opportunities of getting lands purchased from the Natives for the same object for which they themselves desire land. I very much regret that Native lands are going through the Land Court so slowly. I should like to see the Government using more energy in the way in which land is put through the Court. Whether there is a difficulty in getting Judges I cannot say; but, no doubt, it is going through altogether too slowly for settlement purposes, and I do hope greater efforts will be made in the future to have titles defined more quickly than they have been in the past. It has been urged that the price paid for Native land is too small—that the Natives have been robbed. But it has not been taken into consideration that the small price paid is on account of the land being situated away from centres of population: the roading that has to take place, and the surveys having to be done in a most expensive manner, necessarily causes this land to be of very small value indeed as compared with land near settlements. The Premier said to-day that it should be the object of the Government to buy lands near settlement, not to have them so far away. I only wish the Government were able to do that, but I am afraid they will not be able. The land is far back, and far away from where people can get those comforts they should be able to get. But I do not think the country people want all these comforts. A deplorable picture was painted by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) about their miserable life. I have been among them and have seen them, and, though their hardships are very great, I have never met a class of men more cheerful, more hopeful, in looking forward to making homes for themselves. The picture painted by the honourable member was altogether different from what I have found the circumstances to be. What can be happier than for a man to look forward to the time when he has got the timber off his land and the grass down? If he has only a little whare, no matter how small, he feels he has got a home where he can look forward to living happily, instead of being oppressed by the strikes and struggles that take place amongst those in the cities. Therefore, instead of looking at this as a gloomy picture, it is quite different from what the honourable gentleman pointed out. Of course the position of some of them might be a great deal improved, and I do not think it is altogether the success it should have been. I think a mistake has been made in planting these settlers all together in a mass, where they have not opportunities of getting employment. I should like to see the larger holdings mixed up with the smaller, so that these men might get employment. I think the Government, before placing men on these sections, should, in the first place, improve the sections—at any rate of, say, twenty-five acres—by cutting the bush down, and thus save time, so that these men could go to work at once, instead of having to wait a long time before they get the bush down and the grass on. If this were done the Government would be improving their own freehold, increased value would be given to the land, and they could afterwards get the increased value from the tenants. It would be the means of assisting, to a large extent, a number of settlers who are only too anxious to help themselves if opportunity is given. Every opportunity should be given to assist land-settlement; and, in my opinion, this scheme of borrowing a quarter of a million of money is as good as many of the other schemes which the present Government have introduced. Why, even the approval of the honourable member for Wairarapa ought to be sufficient to prove to honourable members that these are good proposals.

Mr. BUDDO.—I am bound to admit that I have very little sympathy with settling small settlers on bush-land. I consider that a man without capital, except under special conditions, cannot thrive on bush-country. I am somewhat surprised that in this Bill no provision is made for the leasing of Native lands. I think that would be a much easier way of acquiring those lands, and it would also safeguard the interests of the Natives, who we know are, as a rule, not thrifty, nor do they take care of money, especially when they get it in large sums. In the debate on the Financial Statement I indicated very clearly that I should not approve of the large sum of half a million being borrowed for this purpose. I consider half of that sum, in the present state of our finances, quite sufficient for the purpose. Am I to understand that the Government, in introducing this Bill, intend to inaugurate a progressive public-works policy? If so, I think it will be the duty of the House to determine whether there is a necessity for such a policy; and also if it is judicious, in the present state of the labour-market, to attract large numbers of men from the other colonies, who when these works are done will be thrown on the labour-market of this colony. As to the necessity for roads and bridges in the North Island, I believe that every one who has travelled in the North Island will admit that many of the roads are in a wretched state, and that bridges are urgently required. But to build bridges in remote districts, and attract a population there that is not at all likely to be a settled one, is, I think, inadvisable in the present state of our finances. What is wanted is land-settlement—giving the settlers the right to make their own roads, and so provide for their present wants until their land becomes reproductive. I am not going to traverse the public-works policy of the past; but the general consensus of opinion is that a large proportion of those works were entirely unnecessary. In regard to our position, I may point out that there is not a single export of the colony which has a ready market at payable prices, if we except dairy produce. The finest wheat in the world can be had f.o.b. at Adelaide at 2s. 1d. a bushel, and at the same time we have news that the Argentine and India have enormous increases in their wheat yield over last year's. In wool at the present time there is a small improvement: and I think we must admit there is very great room for improvement, considering the low prices which have been ruling. Dairy produce is expected to be at least 25 per cent. cheaper in the coming season than it has been during the past season; while our frozen-meat industry, although it is paying its way, cannot be said to be yielding a profit. This Government is quite strong enough not to add large sums to our public debt. I think we shall have to run the colony more strictly on business lines, and I consider our policy should be to increase the amount of settlement on improved land, giving to the settlers the right to make their own roads. I have always been strongly against putting settlers without means on bush-land. If we do as I suggest we shall lay the foundation of a sturdy yeomanry, and keep the labouring population away from the towns, where they cannot get anything else to do at the present time but purely relief-works. I shall vote for the second reading of the Bill, but in Committee I shall do my best to get the amount to be expended reduced by at least one-half.

Mr. STEVENS.—The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) led the House to infer that it was he who first advocated the opening-up of lands by roads before settlement takes place. Why, that policy has been advocated not only by that honourable gentleman, but it was also advocated by myself twelve or thirteen years ago. I have always been of opinion that in settling a block of land the most economical way of proceeding is to drive an arterial road through that land.

In the matter of bush-settlement, I have always held the idea that it is absolutely necessary, before placing men on bush-land who are not possessed of money, that certain things should be done. Say, for example, that a man is going to occupy a hundred acres of land: it is a great benefit not only to the Government, but to the intending occupier, that at least 25 per cent. of the bush should be felled and burned, and the land sown in grass, so that the occupier may live in a proper and comfortable condition, as compared with what he has to do if he has, upon entering on his land, to cut away round the root of some huge tree before he can get a sufficient clearing in order to establish a home for himself, or pitch a tent for himself and his wife and family. That occurs in a great many instances in the settlements which are now progressing. I would also impress upon the Government the necessity of having these improvements made in accordance with the experience of bush-settlers who have had twenty or thirty years' experience of felling bush and sowing it with grass. Instead of practising the improper system of felling only trees of a certain diameter, and allowing the others to stand—which is a great mistake—I think the Government would be consulting their own interests, and the interests of every one who goes on the land, if they caused every tree to be felled, with the exception of some trees such as the rata and totara. The latter tree may be required for fencing and other purposes, and should not be burned; and the rata will often burn down without being felled. I can assure honourable members that if I were offered land with the bush standing, or to have the bush partially felled, I should prefer to have the standing bush. I speak from practical experience in this matter, because I have had a great number of acres of bush felled, and have seen it done. I have heard it said that clause 4 of this Bill will give such powers to the Minister as will enable him to permit his friends to go on to the land in the North Island, and either gridiron it or take the eyes out of the blocks. That is putting a wrong construction upon the Bill. Let us take this position: We have the North Island Main Trunk line: hundreds of men are employed there with their families. They are constructing this line of railway through Crown lands. Many of them have been there for two, three, or four years, and they have not yet been able to acquire a small piece of land upon which to found a home for themselves and their families. I say, while they are working in the locality of Government land, it should be the privilege of these people, who are the pioneers of the country, to have a sufficiency of land upon which to make a home; and, whether the land be surveyed or unsurveyed, the Minister or his officers will carefully see that they are not permitted to monopolize or take any undue quantity of good land. If the Government wish to encourage settlement of good land in small areas they must offer every possible facility for it, and not allow red-tape to hinder such settlement. There are at the present moment a very large number of people in my electorate who are anxious to go upon the land, and take up any area of land almost, in order that they may make a home for themselves and their families, instead of being compelled to live in tents on the roadside, just as if they were so many gipsies. That is not the manner in which the people of this country should be treated. From my own point of view,

7.80. what the Government should do in the matter is to carry out the law which is intended to be provided by the Bill now under discussion. It is contended, Sir, that the Government should acquire Native lands by lease, and sublet it to the people of this colony. Now, I have the most decided and positive objection to any such course being adopted. We have on the one hand given effect to legislation for the purpose of preventing the moneyed people of this colony from becoming our landlords, and we say the Crown should be the only landlord. If this applies to the case of Europeans, why should it not also apply in the case of Maoris? The honourable gentleman says we have not the money with which to buy land. I say, without much fear of contradiction, that the Government have already acquired from the Maoris, and have in their possession, as much Native land as it is possible to settle, and settle judiciously and properly, within the next five or six years without acquiring another acre. But wherever land is offered for sale, and at such prices as the Government can acquire it, it is their duty from time to time to acquire land; but they need not expect that they are going to extinguish the Native title over the lands of the colony within one, two, or three years. Therefore it is the duty of the Government to utilise with every reasonable expedition the land that they have already purchased. And, if the Government do as they intend to do under the Native Land Bill that is before the House, I say there will be little fear indeed of the land being taken up by private individuals. The Government can proclaim any block of Native land as being under negotiation for purchase, and so prevent any private dealings, without any legislation other than that which we have at present. But on that head I would say this: There has been a very great deal of noise made in this colony, and especially in this House, for purely party purposes, not by the present Opposition or by the present Government, but for the last twenty years, and the outcry that has been made has been very like demanding the locking of the stable-door after the horse is lost. Now, what do the Native lands consist of, or, rather, that portion which still remains in Native hands? They consist chiefly of forest; and lands which are not forest lands can only be occupied with any prospect of profit whatever in areas varying from two thousand to twenty thousand acres. But there are honourable gentlemen who talk as if any one acre was equal to another. Such is not the case, and I do hope that a reasonable and fair estimate will be made of the present situation as compared with what the situation was some twenty years ago. Providence bestowed down upon us one of the greatest blessings any colony in the world ever had, especially on the coast where I live, when it clad the whole country with forest. Had it not been for that, the whole of the land would before now have been mopped up and monopolized in runs varying in extent up to a hundred thousand acres. Where now thousands of people are living there would only have been as many sheep; and what the Government should do is to offer every possible inducement for people with capital to come and make their homes and settle down amongst the people who require capital to utilise their labour. It is a physical impossibility for a country to prosper with capital only or with labour only. One of the greatest political economists has laid it down that capital and labour must run hand-in-hand. Let us take the millions of acres in the back-country along the west coast of this Island especially, and I venture to say it is a positive wrong, and an absolute absurdity, and will retard the progress of the country, to have any such legislation passed in this House as would prevent men with £5,000, £6,000, or £10,000 from investing their money there for the purposes of bonâ fide settlement, which would give employment to people who are only able to occupy small areas, but require work. That is the way to settle the remainder of the bush-country, and, if the bush-country is only to be settled in small areas up to two hundred acres, we shall have placed ourselves in a situation which will render it necessary to bring down further legislation in the direction of permitting the holders of these small areas to acquire a sufficient amount of land in order to live upon the soil without outside assistance. At present there are only two classes of industry which are suitable for our bush-country. They are the growing of sheep and cattle and the dairy industry. These are the only industries. There is a great deal of talk about fruit and many other industries that might spring up if they were only fostered and encouraged; but I say that, owing to the geographical position of the colony, it is impossible we can profitably utilise our lands for any purpose to any extent other than those for which they are now utilised. Let us see what amount of profit one can make out of, say, five hundred acres of land that is suitable only for running sheep or cattle. Why, Sir, about £400 per annum, under the very best circumstances, is what one would get from five hundred acres of land. Such being the case, for a man with a family of five, six, or seven children I say that is not sufficient, especially when those children have grown up. If he chooses to subdivide his land he should be permitted to do so, and he would therefore require a greater area. With respect to the very terrible state in which the bush-settlers live, as described by the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Ball), when he said that they live in unhappiness and discomfort, I should be very glad if the honourable gentleman had visited perhaps the most outlying settlement in my electorate, or, indeed, on the west coast of this Island, as some honourable members and myself did the other day, when there were forty children drawn up in a line, who would do credit to any country or colony. These children, I can assure him, are equal in happiness, in health, in intelligence, and in every other way to any of the children in the cities. And what is required for the purpose of making these settlements prosperous is that these children shall have the fairest and best opportunity of obtaining an education that will fit them for any calling in life. This should be done, but I regret to say that in the past such has not been the case. This colony has looked to the larger centres for educational institutions, and the advantages of this education are only available in the educational institutions that exist in the large centres, but these large institutions are not available for the children placed in the position of those of whom I have just spoken. It was only twelve months ago that those settlers began to move out to the locality in which they are now living; and at their own cost and expense they are erecting their own schoolhouse, and providing their own teacher, and they are not in the position at present of waiting for promises to be fulfilled by the powers that be. I say that the Government should make every possible provision, and not mete out to Boards of Education a specific sum for educating the children in the back-country. It may be there are thirty or forty families assembled or set down probably in two or three months, and the Board of Education has no opportunity of knowing anything about them, and it can make no provision; and therefore I say the Minister of Education should be in a position to grant a special vote at any time it may be required, rather than allow children in these places to go for six or twelve months without education. Now, Sir, the object of this Bill is a very desirable one indeed. It is one which I believe will bear good fruit, but it is one which ought to be administered with the greatest possible liberality. There should be every liberty given to the bonâ fide working-men who are working on public or other works, and who, on account of what work is likely to be done in the vicinity in improving the land, need sections for themselves. I say these men should have a fair opportunity of making their selection if they choose out of the particular block, and of settling upon it, without the necessity of having to wait for several years, as they have had to do in a great many cases. I assure honourable gentlemen these are men who are as able and willing as any man in the colony to hew out homes for themselves in the bush, and live and prosper upon the land. Very small pieces of land will suffice for the purpose while they can receive wages from the Government for their services on public works; but immediately these public works cease it is an impossibility that they can make a living upon ten acres of land—nay, upon fifty acres of land. I say they should be permitted to acquire such land as will enable them to live within the four corners of the district where they find their work, without troubling to run all over the colony to obtain work for the support of themselves and their families. Now, I hope the Government will carry out what it is intended by this Bill to effect, and not merely put it on the statute-book. If we are to enact laws in this House for the benefit of the people, they should be active laws, and not dormant laws; and I am sorry to find that a great many of the laws that we have made are dormant laws and not active laws; and I am under the impression that we might even have done without some of these provisions in connection with the Bill before the House, which honourable members on this side of the House, and occupying the Ministerial benches, have put in, wishing to place themselves beyond the suspicion or derision of those who are opposed to them. But any Minister of the Crown who exercises that which he believes to be reasonable justice in cases which come before him at once finds petitions laid before the House from those who are supposed to be injured, and honourable members on the other side of the House characterize the Minister as anything but of the purest water. And therefore it is necessary to have a great deal in our laws which would otherwise be unnecessary for the purpose of giving effect to the desires or requirements of those to whom we must look for the future prosperity of the country, and those people who are going to hew out homes for themselves in the bush. I would draw the attention of the honourable member in charge of the Bill to this: I do not think it will serve any good purpose to have the whole of the improvements made upon the land by the Government before asking those people to occupy them. I say, if one-fourth of those improvements were effected on the land, the occupier could then utilise his time in making the remainder of the improvements while he is out of work. This is really what they desire. What they really require is the nucleus in the shape of clearing and good roads before they are asked to take possession of the property. I know there are a number of honourable gentlemen in this House who think that it is impossible for people to go and live in the bush. That is quite a fallacy. And it is also a certain fact that there are a great number of people who have left a most admirable locality for future settlement because up to the present time they have been unable to acquire the land they desired, though they have been walking over it every day. It is held back for the purpose of carrying out the red-tapeism of the Act, which I think quite unnecessary. Now touching again on the subject of Native lands, I contend that any person who wishes to acquire a piece of Native land of an area laid down by the land-laws of the colony should be permitted to do so, provided it is intended for bonâ fide occupation, just in the same way as Crown lands are intended for bonâ fide occupation. I know in many places in this Island there are sons of desirable settlers who would be glad to acquire lands from the Natives, and pay even a higher price for it than the Government would pay. And, Sir, I ask, in the name of Heaven, what objection can there be against two settlers, both of whom are citizens of New Zealand, both understanding the nature of their undertaking, entering into an engagement? It is simply because a cry has been got up to the effect that any one who deals with a particle of Native land is a speculator or a land-shark, or is dishonest. Now, I hope the Government will remember my views on this subject, and, if I should have the pleasure of being here two or three years hence, or probably longer, I feel as certain as possible that, if the Natives are prevented from disposing of their lands to Europeans under the system I have described, settlement in this country will be very much slower indeed than it otherwise would be. With these few remarks I will conclude, in the hope that this Bill will become law, and, having become law, that the Government will make it an active measure and not a dormant measure. And, notwithstanding all that has been said with regard to clauses 4 and 5, it is my humble opinion that these clauses only give a Minister of the Crown that liberty to which he is entitled as a Minister of the Crown. It is surrounded with the greatest possible safeguards, because not one of those transactions can be ratified until ratified by Parliament. It states here most particularly that authority of Parliament is to be obtained,—in section 4. Therefore, if anything that may be done by the Minister is done unjustly or unfairly, his action may be reversed by a vote of this House.

Sir R. STOUT.—No.

Mr. STEVENS.—Well, that is my view of it, and, if it is not so intended, I hope the senior member for Wellington City will, in his generous kindness, assist this House to make it as good a measure as this House and the honourable member, I am sure, desire to see it.

Mr. THOMPSON.—Before the Minister replies, Sir, I should like to say a few words on this Bill. We have had two or three very extraordinary speeches this afternoon, but we have heard very little about the Bill. The honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) gave us a lecture on bush-settlement. He evidently sets himself up as an authority on everything pertaining to farming, and he drew a very doleful picture of a settler's life. If we have many speeches such as his in this House it will probably prevent a great many of our young men from going into the country and becoming settlers. Sir, that honourable gentleman has taken very good care to divest himself of all his own property, and he is now an extreme Radical so far as the land-laws are concerned. In speaking of the life of a bush-settler, I take a very different view from that expressed by the honourable gentleman, and I venture to say that it would be much better if a large number of those young men who now remain in the towns, and go into factories and such places, and eke out a very miserable existence, where they get half-poisoned with foul air, were to go into the back-country and become bush-settlers. They would not find it at all the miserable life depicted by the honourable member for Wellington City this afternoon. Any man who has spent a few years in the bush-settlements in this or the neighbouring colonies will admit at once that there is not a class of people who enjoy a pleasanter life and better health than the pioneer settlers of our colonies. It will be a very bad day indeed for this or any other colony when our young men become so effeminate that they will prefer to loiter about the street-corners of our towns and spend their time in frivolity and amusement instead of going back into the country districts and becoming settlers. However, I will pass from that to the few remarks of the honourable member for Riccarton, who gave us a lecture upon gridironing. I have no doubt that that honourable gentleman, like some others in Canterbury, has got gridironing on the brain. I believe it is a very popular subject in Canterbury; but any one who uses that term in reference to the North Island does not know what he is talking about. To imagine for a moment that anything approaching gridironing could take place under the control of the present Minister of Lands is a great stretch of imagination. The system under which these bush-settlements are formed is this: A number of men can apply for a number of sections under this system, and, so soon as the Minister can acquire a block of land suitable for that class of settlement, the block is surveyed in sections by the Survey Department, and the applications are received publicly from those who are prepared to take up the sections. As for anything approaching gridironing, the very idea of such a thing taking place is the utmost nonsense. I am not prepared to say I am greatly in favour of that particular system of settlement. It is a new experiment, however, and has not had a fair test yet—that is, improving bush-lands first, and letting them afterwards to the men who fell the bush. I would suggest to the Minister of Lands that he is now entering upon a class of settlement with which he can have had very little experience. He has been accustomed, principally, to the opening-up of lands in the Middle Island, and when he comes to deal with the bush-lands under this system he will find that it is necessary to exercise the utmost care and caution; else very grave mistakes will be made. For instance, a number of men may be employed to fell bush at a good rate of wage, and, unless this bush is properly felled, in our wet districts in the North, it will be impossible to get a good burn; any one who has had anything to do with that bushfelling or clearing knows by experience that, unless the undergrowth and everything else is properly felled, and everything done in a proper way, it is impossible to get a good burn, with the result that the land on which the bush is felled may have to lie for a number of years before you can get it burned off. Another thing I should like to state to the Minister is that this class of work should be confined entirely to six months of the year. No bush should be felled in the summer months in the North Island, because in the dry season the chances are that some one may drop a match accidentally, and the fire may be carried through the bush, which may not be burnt out properly; and the result may be that a lot of trees may be there for years before they can be properly burned, and the cost of felling the bush is practically lost. So in dealing with this class of settlement I would suggest to the Minister that he will require to be very careful indeed, otherwise very grave mistakes may arise. Then, coming to the proposal which is to give a man who fells the bush the pre-emptive right of selection, I think that is a very good proposal, in this way: If the man who is felling the bush intends to take up the land he will have a particular interest in felling it properly, and there is no danger of the work being slummed. In this work it is impossible for any inspector to be appointed by the Crown merely to visit the blocks to tell whether the work is done properly or not. The only safeguard by which they can secure that object would be by compelling the man to go through the bush first and fell all the under-scrub. If that is not done it will be impossible to tell whether the work is done properly or not. So that the Minister will need to be very careful. In reference to what the honourable member for Wellington City said in criticizing the amount of £20,000 as the probable sum to be expended on this class of settlement, the honourable gentleman argued that there is a large expenditure proposed in this Bill for road-works,

8.0. independent of bushfelling altogether; but, in fact, I myself would sooner see the whole of the money spent in roading the land than even in felling the bush; for this reason: We have any number of farmers' sons in the country—practical men, who understand how to farm bush-land. If the Crown will only road these lands there will be no difficulty whatever in getting these lands taken up; they will be taken up immediately. A great many persons will be in a position to take up that land, and they will be able to employ a great number of men who are at present depending upon the State for employment. If you put on bush-land a class of people who are not accustomed to bush-work, depend upon it those men will be a failure. Bush-farming cannot be learned in a day or two. It requires some years' experience to enable men to become bush-farmers, and I hope the Minister will be very careful in carrying out his system of settlement under this Bill. I hope it is not intended to establish the system of farming now established up at Levin. There the settlers expected to be provided for by the State as long as they lived; and the last speaker, I think, intended something approaching that in his speech. He said it was impossible for small settlers to get a living on twenty or even fifty acres of land unless the Government supplied them with work. My idea of settlement is this: that if a settler gets assistance for a few years he ought not to look to the Government for assistance any longer. I would not give a fig for the settler who is always looking to the Government for assistance. Unless they have sufficient self-reliance they will never become good settlers. Therefore suggesting that the Government should put on these bush-farms a class of men who expect always to fall back upon the Government for work is a mistake; no greater mistake could be made by any Government. If we want them to succeed we must put upon these bush-farms a class of men who possess a knowledge and experience of bush-farming. Now, Sir, in reference to the question of purchasing Native lands: that is perhaps one of the most important proposals that have been brought before the House this session. I do not know whether the Government are going to be successful in their operations or not. There is a strong feeling at the present time in the Native mind against selling to the Government. I do not think that for the last twenty years feeling was ever so strong or so intense as it is now in the North Island. There is an agitation going on amongst the Natives to this effect: that they should be allowed the pre-emptive right; and I believe the Government will find they will be able to secure very little Native land for some time. The Natives are agitated, and consider they have a grievance, and they object to the Government refusing to give them the right of free trade in their own lands; and that will be the great difficulty the Government will have to deal with. But I hope the Minister of Lands, in dealing with this measure, as I presume he is going to have charge of that department, intends to appoint a Land-purchase Board. If he wants to make this a success he must shake himself clear of the pakeha-Maori element—an element that we find hanging about every Native district in the North Island, and an element that seems to live and fatten upon the Natives. If he wants to make it a success he must shake himself clear of the pakeha-Maori element, and must set up a new Native Land Purchase Board, consisting of men who will be responsible to him for the valuation and purchase of Native land; and I hope he will, as far as he possibly can, bring to a conclusion the purchase of blocks now partially purchased. I understand that a large number of blocks in the North Island have been partially purchased for some years past, but until these purchases are completed it is impossible to deal with these lands and open them for settlement. If he succeeds in doing that, then he will receive the thanks of the whole of the people in the North Island. The whole system of Native-land purchase in the North Island for years past has been a system of bungling, and I hope the honourable gentleman will take a new departure in that respect. Then, Sir, I would suggest to the honourable gentleman that he should have a return prepared every year showing the operations under this Bill. I think we should know where the lands have been purchased, the quality of the land, the amount that has been paid for it, and when the purchase of the block is likely to be completed. I venture to say there is no one in this House at the present time who can tell what quantity of Native land we have purchased within the last five or six years, the number of blocks the purchase of which has been completed, or what position these blocks are in. I fear a very poor account could be given of the money that has been spent under that system. If the Minister will take a new departure and set up a new Native Land Purchase Board—I do not suggest that he should set up the same Board as is provided in the Bill for purchasing private lands, but there should be two or three gentlemen on this new Board in whom the Government could place the fullest reliance as to their good judgment, and these men should visit and inspect every block before it is purchased, and see that we get fair value for our money, because I believe that a number of blocks that have been purchased in this Island will never be fit for settlement purposes. In dealing with this question, I am sure the Natives are pretty well able to take care of themselves, although the honourable member for the Northern Maori District sometimes complains of their being hardly dealt with; I think in many instances during past years they have been able to hold their own in selling land. But I would suggest, when the Native Land Purchase Bill is brought down, that in all our settled districts—such as we have in the northern parts of Auckland, where the Natives own blocks of land not of any great extent—they should have the fullest liberty to deal with those lands as they like—that the Government should not claim the pre-emptive right over these lands. In that part of the colony for many years the Natives have been in the habit of dealing directly with the settlers. Most Native lands have been bought from the Natives by settlers. There has been no difficulty, no disturbance; the Natives and Europeans live upon the most friendly terms, and I think these people may be allowed to deal with their lands as they think proper; and, as land is always sold in small areas, there is no danger of the aggregation of large estates. I have great pleasure in supporting the Bill, and I cannot see anything in the measure which any honourable member could take any objection to. If the Bill is passed and the Minister gets the necessary powers to get the money to carry out the provisions of the Bill, I feel certain that under the honourable gentleman's careful administration the Bill will be a great success. It is very much needed in the North Island: in fact, at the present time we have scarcely any land open for settlement, and I am sure every settler in the North Island will be pleased when this Bill becomes law. I have no fear of any abuses cropping up under this Bill as long as the honourable gentleman has the administration of it. I am sure the Bill will be carefully administered, and I have therefore the greatest pleasure in supporting the second reading.

Mr. E. M. SMITH.—As this is a very important Bill, dealing with half a million of money, and as it traverses the public-works policy of the Government, I think it my duty to say something about it. This is the Bill of all Bills that I have been waiting for, because I think it will do more good for the North Island than all the other Bills put together. I am surprised beyond measure to hear any honourable member representing a constituency of the South Island getting up and speaking against this Bill, and I hope they will not be found voting against it. Did we not tell them this: that we supported the Land for Settlements Bill because we who represent the North Island knew that none of that money would be spent in the North Island, but that its expenditure would be confined strictly to the Middle Island, and that we did not wish all the money to be spent in the North Island? That is the sop in the pan we gave you to get your support to this Bill. We do not want to lure young men from the Middle Island, and bring them up to the North Island to settle on the bush-lands. But what we do want, and what the Minister is desirous of doing, is to settle these lands properly, and he cannot do that without roads and bridges, so he must have the money asked for in this Bill. Now, if honourable members were to go up into my district and I were to show them the deplorable condition of the country for the want of roads, they would come back to this House and support this Bill. I believe that the Minister will lay every penny of this money out wisely and well. I believe he will road the lands and bridge the most dangerous rivers, and then settlement must progress. When honourable members talk against this Bill it shows me they have not been on an electioneering tour through those districts, or they would know better. But I have; and what is the result? Some of these men have gone beyond the roads, and have taken up land in the Tanner and other settlements, and in the settlements up the Junction Road, and these men tell me they would not go back to Christchurch into the warehouses they worked in before if you gave them 10s. a day. These men told me that, and I know they are in an independent position. They feel proud that they see before them two hundred acres they can call their own, and can produce for themselves and their families all they require. When they want butchers' meat they can go out with their rifle. There is any amount of fish in the river, and what with wild cattle, and pigs, and pigeons there is no fear but that they will have plenty of food in the house—that is, men on the frontiers. And they work from daylight to dark; and what is the result? They have got a large amount of the bush down: but when they sow grass-seed, and know that they cannot get their produce to market without a bridge over the dangerous Waitara River, it is no wonder they are asking the Government to provide funds to build a bridge across this dangerous river. To show how the Minister is putting these people on the land, I will give an instance. A poor man and his family, brought up in the Old Country strictly as a farmer's man, sold out, and expended almost all the money he possessed in coming here. They burned this man's clothing, under the quarantine regulations. He intended going to Canterbury, but he had to come to Taranaki because he had not sufficient money to pay his passage any further. I heard, through a friend of mine, of the man and his family being in a deplorable state, having landed with only a few shillings, and he had taken a house on the outskirts because it was cheap. I went to the Crown Lands Commissioner, who communicated with the Minister, and the Minister gave instructions that this man should be taken on road-work in the place of a man who had given it up. He was taken on, and started work on the Mimi Road. They told him there was work, and if he liked to take it the conditions were that he should receive a small block of land where he could live with his family, there was plenty of firewood, and that he must put up a whare within a month. The man accepted the terms. They are now surveying a block close to the road, and this man will get a hundred acres. I undertake to say that within twelve months he will be in an independent position, and road-work will be found for him. This is going on all over the country; and while we have these good results and this kind of administration by the Minister we are in duty bound to back the Government up. We know they cannot make roads and bridges in addition to making other improvements. When the honourable member for Kaiapoi said he was in favour of these men being put on land and being asked to make the main arterial roads of the district, I was shocked to hear any honourable gentleman professing to have the interests of the settlers at heart seeking to do this. I know some of the roads are formed, and the metal costs £600 a mile; and the settlers have not only paid the Government for their land, but have gone in for two loans, and have taxed themselves. Some of the rivers in the district are not bridged, and it is impossible in some of the rapid rivers to have fords. I say, of all the things the Government requires to do in the interests of progress and the settler the main thing is to put up bridges and make roads. With regard to the purchase of Native lands, the honourable gentleman who last spoke gave some valuable hints to the Government, but I can give a few hints that are more valuable. He asked the Government to set up a special Board for purchase. I think there is no necessity for anything of the kind. All that is required is an expert or two selected by the Government to work in harmony with the Land Board, and to report to the Land Board on the blocks of land within the survey districts, and when one of these has got the sanction of the Natives to sell to the Government it should be for the Board to visit the land and from time to time advise the Government, and the purchase could be completed. I have a list of blocks of land which I will not weary the House by reading—some purchased, some partly purchased, and some waiting for the Government to purchase—and if these purchases are completed then the Lands Department will have large quantities of land during two or three years. I have here a map showing the Native lands, and I shall be willing to show it to other honourable gentlemen. I can show that between Auckland and Taranaki Provinces there are seven millions of acres waiting for settlement, and a large area that can be purchased. But how? Not without passing these policy Bills and giving the Government the sums they ask for. We talk about borrowing a few millions. I am surprised. I have always preached that this Government should borrow five millions, and ear-mark it entirely for the purchase of Native lands. I know the honourable member for the Northern Maori District will object to it, but I ask the House not to pay any attention to him. I think it would be in the interests of the Natives. When I was the pioneer of the Mokau we found blocks of land that the Maoris had never so much as shot a tui on. We got a lease, but before we got the lease the Government could have purchased it for 1s. 6d. an acre, but they had no money, and were not inclined to purchase it. And we are paying the Natives £150 a year: no matter whether we make a penny out of the land or not we have to pay the rent, and they take care always to get their rent in advance. We are paying them £150 for what was no good to them in the past, and what would be no good to them now but for the energy and enterprise of the Europeans, who came into the country and surrounded the Natives with the blessings of civilisation. I object to the Government having the pre-emptive right to deal with Native land. I am willing they should have the right to acquire blocks of land in districts where there is no European settlement. When I see hundreds and thousands of acres allowed to grow over with furze, and a nuisance to the neighbours, and know they are not subject to fencing or road-deviation, or anything the same as Europeans, it would be in the interests of the country if the Government did not surround these lands of the Natives, and did not attempt to acquire the pre-emptive right, and if they put less of these lands under the control of the Public Trustee. We should individualise these lands as quickly as we can. If the Natives came to the Government to say, "Give us the Crown grant and we are prepared to become Europeans, subject to taxes, and road-deviations, and fencing, and all the things required of Europeans," that would be the way to deal with the Native lands in the interests of both Natives and Europeans. I believe the day will never return when people will be able to get large blocks of a hundred thousand acres, and I for one hope it never will return, and will do my "level best" to prevent such large blocks from being acquired. I believe the greatest blessing ever bestowed on New Zealand was the bush. If it had not been for the bush these lands would not have been the storehouses of accumulated wealth they are now, because if they had been clear they would have been gobbled up like the lands on the East Coast. If we put a poor man on these bush-lands, at the same time giving him employment on the roads, we are giving him an independency he could not get in any other country. All we have to do is to legislate in the interests of the masses, and not of the classes, and to watch the Government, and support them through thick and thin. We are extending Liberalism, and administering the affairs in the interest of the nation. Knowing this, I shall support the Government in their policy Bills; and when I hear that the members of the Opposition are going to support this Bill I think how nicely we shall get it through. It amused me to hear the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) getting up and claiming that he drafted this Bill. He did not use those words, but said that was what he preached on the platform. I think he must have got hold of one of my old speeches when he spoke of the poor, degraded position of the bush-settler. I was thinking whether he thought of the bush-settler when dining at Government House. Ever since I dined there that is the reason I go in for the bush-settler, seeing the difference between the grandeur, wealth, and luxury there, and the miserable condition of the struggling bush-settler. When leaving that house I made

8.80. a vow that I would do my "level best" to equalise the condition of the people of this colony. Now let me turn my attention to the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). I really did think, when we got this Bill, that we should at last find the honourable gentleman supporting one of the proposals of the Government. The honourable gentleman says this Bill is badly drafted. The honourable gentleman has lived a long time in this country. He is a fine classically-educated man. He has the parliamentary history of the colony at the tip of his tongue, and there is no doubt he is a clever man. But what does he dream about at night? It is the policy of the Government. He sees he is left out in the cold. He has no portfolio. Then he asks, "How can I support these Bills? I must look at them from a lawyer's point of view, and in the light of the way I have been treated by the party." I have very great esteem for the honourable gentleman, and therefore am very sorry for him, and I will ask him to take my advice and, before the session closes, come back to the Liberal lines and adopt the liberal policy of the Government, and we will forgive him, and then we will offer him a portfolio when the next shuffle of portfolios takes place.

Ye friends of truth, ye statesmen, who survey
The rich man's joys increase, the poor's decay,
'Tis yours to judge how wide the limits stand Between a splendid and a happy land.

Hoist the Liberal banner high,

On to victory grand!

The old Conservative and Opposition schemes defy,

And support the progressive Minister of Lands.

Mr. BUTTON.—It has been said that money can purchase anything—that if we only have sufficient money we can obtain anything we desire; and that appears to be the policy now being pursued by the gentlemen on the Government benches. Of course we can have settlers if we are willing to pay the price for them. It is quite possible to produce bananas and pine-apples and other tropical fruits or semi-tropical fruits in Greenland; but, then, consider the cost of producing them: they will not be worth the expense of the fuel. And so with regard to the attempts of the Government to induce settlers to come to New Zealand and locate themselves on the land. I am one of those who desire to see settlers located upon the land. We all wish that, and we only differ as to the means by which that desirable end is to be attained. We have had the Land for Settlements Bill, and the Advances to Settlers Bill, and now we have the present Bill. First let us look at the Land for Settlements Bill in the light of the remarks I have already made in regard to the expense of introducing settlers. We have, first of all, a quarter of a million per annum—I believe it is to be per annum—devoted to the purpose of purchasing land in order that settlers may be placed upon it. I do not think any one objects to the principle of purchasing land when it is desirable; but I object to the Land for Settlements Bill on the ground that borrowing is required for that purpose, and also that there is no provision made for extinguishing the debt which we propose to incur. I ask honourable members just to look at what will be the effect of the Land for Settlements Bill with regard to the cost of each settler to the country. I believe one of the members of the Government stated that the Government expected to get 50,000 acres per annum for this quarter of a million. That would be at the rate of £5 per acre, and each settler would have on an average 100 acres of land. That means a cost of £500 a settler. But the colony is to be at the cost of £500 for each settler to be placed on the land under that Bill alone, and it is never to be repaid. There is the difficulty. It is not as if this land was to be sold and the purchase-money applied to reducing the debt; it is not as if the land was to be leased at a continually-increasing rent, as the colony progresses with rents advancing generally; but there is to be one fixed rate of 5 per cent. per annum for an everlasting lease—a rent which would never repay the purchase-money. So that the colony is to be committed to that expense under this Bill alone. I am dealing with this one only in the first place.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I rise to a point of order. Is the honourable gentleman in order in discussing the Land for Settlements Bill, which has passed this House?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honourable gentleman is at liberty to comment generally on the financial condition of the colony, but not to discuss the details of the various measures beyond their bearing on the proposed legislation which is now under consideration.

Mr. BUTTON.—I have referred to the Land for Settlements Bill only to show the position the colony is in, with these cumulative advances to settlers. Under the Land for Settlements

Bill each settler will cost the colony £500, which is never to be repaid, because under the terms of the everlasting lease no provision is made for that. Then we come to the advances to settlers. It will not do to put settlers on the land without any money at all and with no experience, and expect them to be a success; and, consequently, another provision has been made by which advances are to be made to settlers. I do not know to what extent these advances are to be made: this is an untried experiment, and we shall have to wait to see the result of it. But, at all events, the cost to the colony in settling these men upon the land will be cumulative. It may be that each settler will get £1,000, or perhaps £500. There is no provision made for a return of that. It will still be an increasing cost, so that if each settler gets £500 under the Land for Settlements Bill and £500 under the Advances to Settlers Bill, there you have £1,000 at once for each settler. I say, much as I desire to see settlers placed upon the land, I think the cost will be far greater than any advantage which could be obtained from it. In this present Bill, which is in the same direction, we have a provision made under which advances are to be made to those who have had no experience in farming—mere labourers, perhaps, who will go upon bush-land and fell the bush, and have advances made by the Government to enable them to carry on this work or bushfelling, and ultimately to become leaseholders, probably under this system of the everlasting lease. Then what will be the effect? These men are to have these advances. I do not know to what extent; but I know perfectly well that a small sum will not go very far, and we may expect that a considerable sum will be necessary to advance to each settler in order to give him any chance whatever of getting a foothold on the land. What is to be the security for this? Our own land. The land that belongs to the colony is to be taken as the security for this. But then, perhaps, honourable gentlemen will say, "But it is improved land, and the security is the improvements which are put upon it." But have honourable gentleman considered this: that the increased value of the land moreover is not in proportion to the expenditure upon it? We have known many instances—and I dare say this experience can be borne out throughout the colony—in which improved land has not been enhanced in value anything like in proportion to the amount expended upon it. For instance, if a piece of land is worth £500, and if £1,000 is spent in improving it, that property would not bring in the market £1,500. In this case we shall have the Government advancing money, and taking no security for it, because the men are not able to give it: they will only have these improvements, which are supposed to be a security; but if these improvements were put into the market they would not fetch the sum which the Government has lent in addition to the price of the land. One honourable gentleman complained that the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr.

Bell) had used as an argument against this Bill that no provision was made for a sinking fund, and he said, "Where could that come from except out of the produce of the settlers?" Of course, that is where we expect it to come from. If these settlers get the benefit of the money which has been advanced, surely there should be some provision made for an increase of the rent, which increased rent would make some provision for returning the debt. Are we to go on for ever? Are we never to make a provision for repayment of the money? Then, this Bill makes provision for the purchase of Native land. So far as that is concerned, we should have no objection to it, even if the Government honestly and boldly declared their intention of going in for a borrowing policy for this purpose, provided always that the land when obtained should be disposed of in such a way as to recoup the Government. But if the land is to be disposed of in the same way as land under the Land for Settlements Bill, then we shall only be creating trouble by buying these lands; we shall never have a fund to repay the money. I should have no objection at all to the Government going in for a policy of borrowing for the purpose of purchasing Native land if the land were to be disposed of in such a way that the money could be repaid, and the debt reduced; but on any other system I should certainly oppose it. It is the same with regard to roads and bridges. One of the members of the Government—I think it was the Premier—told us that we were not borrowing money. That is a foolish way of talking; we know perfectly well it is borrowing money. Honourable members cannot shut their eyes to the fact. We are borrowing money; and why not do it boldly, and say it is for roads and bridges? We have had works constructed out of loans, and the colony has benefited much by them, and if the works to which the money is applied are judiciously constructed it is far better that we should be borrowing for the construction of these works, and effecting permanent improvements for the colony that offer some security for the money, rather than, by these various schemes we have placed before us, attempting to raise money for the purpose of locating settlers on the land at such an enormous cost. To the principle of purchasing land from the Natives I entirely agree, but at the same time I should not be disposed to give to the Government the sole pre-emptive right, and take away the right of the Natives to dispose of land as they may think fit. But with regard to all the other provisions of the Bill, I object to them. I object to the advances to settlers made in this way, which is only plunging the colony further and further into debt without any security being taken for the repayment to the fund, and without any provision for sinking fund or anything of the kind.

Mr. McGOWAN.—I will not occupy the time of the House for more than one or two minutes. Indeed, I had not intended to say one word, and should not have risen had it not been for the speech made by the honourable gentleman who has just sat down. The remarks he has thought fit to make do not say much for his logic. He starts away with telling us the cost of these settlers to the colony, and he says that what we are doing is buying our own lands. Well, if we are buying our own lands we still have the money among us, because if the lands are bought from the Natives the Natives have the money. There is no change in the wealth of the country in the purchase of these lands. It is not going away. It is not going away to pay large contractors for carrying on public works, railways, and so forth, where the amounts spent on these public works represent so much capital that goes out of the country. In this case you buy the land, and you have the land and the money as well. Now, with reference to the statement of the honourable gentleman that it has cost £500 for each settler—honourable gentlemen may smile, and I am sorry they do smile; it appears to me they do not look below the surface, but simply take the statement made with reference to the cost of the land as being something which the colony has lost. But the price paid for Native land is never lost to the colony. The accumulated capital that is put into a farm in the way of improvements has not gone out of the colony by any means; it is recirculated, and it is by this means a country becomes powerful and wealthy, and is able to put an ever larger area under cultivation, and, by doing that, is increasing the wealth of the country by increased production. The honourable gentleman also referred to the continual cost that these settlers must necessarily be to the State. But the cost which these settlers are to the State will be represented by the increasing value of the land by the improvements they put on it. The honourable gentleman gave as an illustration a certain estate which a man bought, and for which, after he had put a thousand pounds' worth of improvements on it, he could not get a price larger than its original value. What kind of example is this? This is an example that is only too frequent when a land-boom is on. A man buys a piece of land and puts an expensive building upon it. For what purpose? In order to receive a higher rent, or to sell it at an enhanced value. But because this land-boom does not last, and the man loses by his speculation, is that an argument against the prime value of the land? He knows it is not an argument. If honourable gentlemen would simply occupy the time at their disposal by suggesting improvements,—if they would apply their minds to the Bill, and the features of the Bill, instead of each other's statements and of matters outside of the Bill itself,—it would be very much better.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I, too, should like to make a remark with regard to the speech of the honourable member for the City of Auckland (Mr. Button), because it certainly was a most extraordinary one, and was the kind of speech that was heard from the old Conservative party in the House, but which we very rarely hear now. The most extraordinary statement of all was that each settler placed on the Cheviot Estate cost the colony the sum of £1,000. He said, under the Act every settler cost £500, and this was never to be repaid. If he looks at the return under the Cheviot Estate Act he will find the amount of interest which the rents at present produce: I think he will find that it is £5 7s. 6d. per cent. per annum, and we pay 3½ per cent. for the money, so that I should like to know how we lose the amount the honourable gentleman stated for every settler put on the Cheviot. And then we had the statement that this £500 more which has to be advanced to this unfortunate settler who has cost the colony so much is never to be repaid. He has not read the Government Advances to Settlers Bill. It has been repeated so often that the payment of this loan was to extend over thirty-six years that I wonder the honourable gentleman is not aware of the fact. The advances to settlers are for thirty-six years, and at the end of that time the advances will be completely paid off.

Captain RUSSELL.—Lease in perpetuity.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—The honourable member (Mr. Button) said this £500 advanced to the settler was never to be repaid. I wish to show that not only is it to be repaid, but that a certain amount will be repaid every year; so that for the colony it is a perfectly safe and good transaction, and it will all be repaid in thirty-six years. The curious thing is that, while the honourable gentleman upbraids the Government for the purchase of the Cheviot Estate, and the Government policy in general, he approves of the purchase of Native lands. What difference is there in principle between the purchase of the Cheviot Estate and the purchase under this Bill of Native land? I fail to see the slightest difference in principle. In the one case the Government buy from the Natives, and in the other case from a private owner. It has been suggested to me that perhaps the difference lies in the fact that in the one case the land is near to Auckland, and in the other case it is not; and there may be something in that distinction. Had it not been for the speech of the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button) I should have been inclined to congratulate the member for Hawke's Bay on the tone of the Opposition towards the Bill. It has been a very pleasant feature first to see the honourable member for Eden and then the honourable member for Wellington City and others getting up and saying they approved of the Bill. It undoubtedly goes to show that the Opposition have recognised since the elections the wisdom of the policy of the Minister of Lands in his Land for Settlements Bill. That was what policy we were fighting for at the last election, and the country showed its approval of the Minister of Lands and his land-settlement policy, although the Opposition tried to show that the policy was a very bad one. It is very pleasing, therefore, to find that the Opposition now admit that the policy of the Minister of Lands is not a bad one, but a good one for the colony, and that some of them at least are supporting this Bill. With regard to the Bill itself, I would say that it is really two Bills. One part is that dealing with the purchase of Native lands, and the other is the part of the Bill relating to roads and bridges. Now, with respect to the portion of the Bill which relates to the purchase of Native lands, I entirely agree with it. It is exactly on the same lines as the purchase of land for settlement such as the Cheviot Estate. In speaking at the election I defended the purchase of the Cheviot Estate, and I hoped that more land would be purchased in the same manner; and therefore I feel perfectly prepared to speak and vote for that part of the Bill, especially so as I see there is a clause which makes roads and bridges payable out of the same fund as land that is bought. But, Sir, with regard to the first part of the Bill I do not feel so certain: not because I do not say it is a good thing, for there may be a necessity for it, but because when speaking at the elections I, in common with other honourable members, expressed myself against any description of borrowing. I dare say, if I had been asked a question on this point at the election—whether it was good to borrow for more roads and bridges for the promotion of settlement—I might have said I was in favour of it; but it was not suggested, and consequently I declared myself against borrowing. Therefore, Sir, I am not in favour of the first part of the Bill. This proposal, as I understand, is for roading Crown lands. Well, we still have a certain amount of money to the credit of the Public Works Fund. If I remember aright, it was mentioned in the Financial Statement that, after allowing for liabilities, there was a balance of some £48,000 last year; and it was stated, "We propose, as before, to transfer £250,000 to the Public Works Fund for construction of reproductive works, and in aid of the settlement of the land." Well, I had hoped that the Minister of Lands would be able to apply this £250,000 which I speak of in aid of the settlement of the land. I had hoped that that £250,000, together with the amount left over from the Public Works Fund, £48,000, would be sufficient to provide for the necessary roads and bridges. It would have been within £35,000 of what we spent on public works last year, and I am sorry it is not so. Now, with regard to particular clauses of the Bill, I must say I think there are a number of safeguards in this Bill which are particularly acceptable. There is, first, clause 3, which provides that estimates of each of the works are to be laid before Parliament each session. That is a very safe clause, and therefore a clause that I think the House will approve of. Then, with regard to clause 4, about advances to settlers, I entirely agree with the principle of advances to settlers with which to make improvements, and I am glad to see that is the policy the Minister of Lands has taken up. It is impossible for men to go on unimproved land and improve the land for themselves without having sufficient money to go on with, and I am glad to see the Minister of Lands taking up the attitude of helping them. At the same time, I think this should have been part of the Government Advances to Settlers Bill, and should not be in this Bill. We should have had regulations with regard to the amount that ought to be advanced, or the kind of property on which it was to be advanced, and on what improvements, and so on; and we should have known exactly how it was going to be used. I have no dread of its being used badly. I have every faith in the Minister of Lands as an administrator. I think he is the best land-administrator we have had in the colony, and that he has sufficient knowledge to adopt this policy. His settlements at the Chasland's, and in the North Island,—at Pemberton especially,—have proved successful; and I think that is the land-settlement policy of the future. I am also glad to see that we are going to have a separate account in this matter—the Lands Improvement Account. I have always believed in the policy of having a separate account, because it allows Parliament to see exactly what we are going on. It is provided for in the Consols Bill and in this case; and I should like to see a separate account provided for the Second Part of the Bill, which deals with the purchase of Native lands. I should like to see exactly the same provision in the two cases. I am told that it is so in the other Bill; therefore my suggestion is of no practical value, although it shows my opinion on the point. Then, with regard to 9.0. clause 5, which relates to a man having a prior right to the land, I hardly like to see it introduced in the Bill. I would rather it were made part of the regulations. I think it will tend to hamper the Minister of Lands in the distribution of the land if a man is to have a prior right. I should like to see him make regulations from time to time. I do not at all like this principle of priority of right introduced. Of course, on the other hand, we have clause 6, which makes it comparatively safe, and I do not see how any harm can come of it. Then, with regard to the proviso in clause 5, I hope that will be struck out, and that whatever has been done hitherto under the Public Works Act will be paid for out of the Public Works Fund. As it was begun in that fashion, it is only fair that it should be so finished, and, as has been pointed out by the honourable member for Wellington City, it is technically impossible to say that the work was begun under an Act that was not in force. I hope the Minister will consent to strike this out, though I do not attach very much importance to it. Then, this proviso in clause 9—

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I will explain that.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I am glad to hear the Minister will explain that in his reply. With regard to the debentures, I see they are to be raised in the colony, and they are to be made payable in any money-order office in the colony; and no doubt that is a wise provision. But, since we are to borrow by Consols and for advances to settlers, I think it would perhaps be better to go direct to the London money-market and call it a loan, and then we shall all know exactly what it is. I do not care about conversion, because it means, as we all know, that there will be a little more money provided under the Act. I have no objection to there being a little more money, but I should like to know what we are going to borrow, and I think the conversion clause should be struck out. I should like to see, in the case of the Native lands, a separate account kept, so that the rent could be set off against the interest, and so that we might be able to see that the taxpayers of the colony were not losing anything by the transaction. Then we should be able to go to our constituents and say, "The interest and rents are so-and-so," and one balances the other, and we could show the taxpayers that they would have nothing to pay. That is the reason I object to the money being borrowed on roads and bridges, because it is to form a charge on the taxpayers indirectly. Though they may get a part of it back, still for the time being it will be a charge on the taxpayers. I have nothing more to add, except that I am glad to be able to give a general approval to the policy of the Minister of Lands.

Mr. MCGUIRE.—Sir, we have heard a good deal about the late elections during this debate, and very little about the Bill. The honourable gentleman who has just sat down has taken the honourable member for Auckland City to task with reference to the difference between the Cheviot purchase and Native-land purchase. He could not see the difference; but there is a great deal of difference, as any one who studies the question will see. With reference to Native lands, those lands are paying no rates or taxation whatever, and they are yielding nothing whatever to our revenue; they are a bar to settlement in every possible direction: whereas the Cheviot had been paying both rates and taxes. It was adding to our exports, and yielding to our revenue; and if that is not a difference I do not know what a difference is. I shall support the Bill, as I think it is in the interests of the country, but it requires to be carefully looked into in Committee, and when it goes there I shall certainly do my best to improve it in every respect. With regard to the roads and bridges, I am very glad to see that the Minister of Lands is beginning at last to acknowledge that his settlements will be a failure unless he opens them up with roads and bridges. This is the first time I have heard him acknowledge it, and I have been trying to impress upon him from time to time the necessity of doing something for the struggling settlers, but the honourable gentleman paid very little attention to it. However, I am glad to see he now recognises that these paper settlements of his will be a complete failure unless there is money spent in opening up the country with roads and bridges. Here is a grand opportunity for the Minister of Lands and the Government to absorb all the unemployed in the country in a way that will be beneficial to the State. Unless the people get employment in opening up the country with roads and bridges, so as to make the land ready for settlement, they cannot get employment at all. I therefore hope the Minister of Lands, now that he recognises the necessity of roads and bridges, will without delay take action; and by so doing he will give employment to the unemployed, and necessary conveniences to the settlers. There is no difficulty whatever if the Minister of Lands is thoroughly in earnest in the matter. In the Public Works Statement I think it was stated that there was sufficient money to do this: and there will be no difficulty at all. Then, I trust that suitable people will be placed upon the land; because I must confess that since we introduced our system of land-settlement there has not been the same amount of settlement as there was under the deferred-payment and perpetual-lease systems in the past. Under them the land was taken up as quickly as it was surveyed. Some of it was bought for cash, some on deferred payment, and some on perpetual lease; and there was always a certain amount of money coming in for the purpose of making roads. Land was yielding in every way, and the Treasurer had no necessity to borrow for roading this land. The land was then self-supporting. But under our new system we have nothing but dissatisfaction. The roads are in a disgraceful state. Bullocks and horses have almost disappeared in some of the roads in the North, and the loss in this way to individual settlers has been very great. I shall be very glad indeed to assist the Minister in every way in this direction, because, if he is in earnest in his efforts, past experience should tell him what to do, and he would be able to place the settlers on the land and open the country in a thoroughly businesslike way; but I can tell the honourable member honestly and candidly, as I have on every occasion told him—and I never went behind his back to do so—that up to the present time the whole of the settlements have been a failure. I hope he will repair that by starting a system of roads and bridges, because it is absolutely necessary if settlement is to progress that the country should be opened up with good roads and bridges. With reference to the purchase of Native lands, it is a matter I am very glad to see the Government undertaking, because I can tell the Government and the Minister of Lands that £100,000 spent on buying Native lands will do much more for the settlement of the country than if you spent a million of money in repurchasing land already settled upon, as land purchased in that way will be found very expensive when it has finally passed a Judge of the Supreme Court, sitting as a Judge in arbitration. The thinking people, upon whom the brunt of taxation will fall, are against purchasing private estates before we settle the Crown and Native lands. The interest has to be paid yearly for this resettlement of country which is already paying rates and taxes. I think it is the duty of the State in an advantageous and economical manner to settle the Native lands, and I shall assist the Government in every way I can in the matter.

Mr. Montgomery

I am quite certain that the Minister will confess that what he has done in the past in the shape of settlement has failed considerably for want of a proper system. I know that special settlements here and there were forced upon him, and active agents were employed for the purpose of getting them up, and the Government were anxious to get the lands settled in some way or another; but they have made a complete failure so far. I dare say the Minister is desirous of settlement taking place, but he has not gone about it the right way. He must have obtained experience during the past three years. I intend to watch him very closely for the future, with the object of rectifying past mistakes and making better provision for the future. He has left out an element that was absolutely necessary, and that element was to open up the country thoroughly. Now, I am against borrowing so much money, as borrowing will mean increased taxation, and the burdens of the people are very heavy at the present time. There have been such large borrowing schemes introduced this session as to astonish me, coming as they do from a Government professing to be a non-borrowing Government. We seem to be drifting, drifting, drifting. So far as our finances are concerned, I am afraid our sheet-anchor is gone since the late Colonial Treasurer died, and the Government is drifting hopelessly away, and I am afraid we shall soon be on the rocks. However, it is perhaps not yet too late to turn over a new leaf, and see that the moneys expended in this country are expended in the interests of the State, and that fair-play and justice will be done to every section of the community, and that people will be treated fairly and honestly, irrespective of politics or anything of that kind. As far as the Bill is concerned, I do not intend to take up any further time in discussing it. I believe the Bill is in the interests of the country, and it will have my support. I will try to amend it in order to make it workable in every way.

Mr. HOGG.—I am very glad to learn from the honourable member opposite that he is going to support this Bill. It is quite true that he takes a rather despondent view of the situation. He thinks that we are borrowing too much money, and he expresses the opinion that the colony is drifting, drifting, drifting more or less to ruin. Well, Sir, I think the honourable member will be found, before very long, when the Public Works Statement comes before this House, drifting, drifting in a very hopeful direction; and, possibly, seeing the requirements of the district I represent, I shall be found drifting in the swim with him. He and I have the reputation of being two of the greatest beggars in this House in regard to roads and bridges: that is the reputation we have enjoyed for the last two years; and there is not the slightest doubt the requirements of the district I represent in the matter of roads and bridges are exceedingly great, and nearly as pressing now as they were some years ago, because, although a large amount of public work has been done, the number of settlers has increased proportionately, and the requirements, if anything, so far from being met, have simply been augmented. The honourable member has referred to some of the roads in his district, and, by way of illustration, he has assured the House that, in consequence of the boggy condition of those roads, bullocks and horses have disappeared altogether. I am glad to say the condition of the roads in the Forty-mile Bush, in my district, is not quite so bad; but, although bullocks and horses do not occasionally disappear, it is said that they get so imbedded in the mud as to require rope-and-tackle to drag them out, and that when they are pulled out they sometimes appear without their shoes. That is a very bad state of affairs. However, what I wish to call attention to is the very illogical address delivered by the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button). He deprecates borrowing, even for the purchase of Native lands, yet in the very same breath he tells the House he could believe in a Government introducing a bold policy and going in for buying and selling these Native lands. Well, I should like to know what this Bill contemplates, if it does not contemplate the very thing the honourable member has been advocating. The only thing he, apparently, finds fault with is that the policy is not sufficiently bold, and that instead of spending a quarter of a million the Government did not go in for several millions. His opinion evidently is that, instead of raising money by an easy method that will not injure any one in the colony, the Government should go in for further plunging in the London money-market, and should resume the system, indulged in for so many years with great disadvantage to the country, of raising foreign loans, a system from which we are now suffering very severely, having every year to pay nearly two millions to the foreign creditor on that account. He tells us in so many words he has no faith in the settlers to be placed on the land under the Bill now introduced. He alleges that the money proposed to be advanced to these settlers will never be repaid; yet each of these Bills that he refers to makes ample provision for the payment of substantial interest on every shilling that is expended! The Advances to Settlers Bill, as the honourable member for Akaroa remarked, provides not only for payment of interest, but for the repayment of the capital within the period of thirty-six years. Surely, Sir, when the honourable member for Auckland City referred in that way to this and some other Bills he could not possibly have read them, or, if he read them, cannot have understood their provisions. Then he talked of "mere labourers, men of no experience" being placed on these bush-lands and being unable to prosecute bushfelling. What kind of persons would he like to see placed on bush-lands? Who are the men who are likely to improve bush-lands and make homes on bush-lands for themselves? I say they are the labourers of this country. Would he select those gentlemen who exist in Auckland, called the National Association?—a very proper name to give them, because they are always gnashing their teeth at everything in the shape of progress. They would go there to starve; they could not, as the honourable member for New Plymouth suggested, face even the wild cattle; they would hie up the nearest tree. A more illogical argument could not be used against the class of men the Government are endeavouring to place upon the lands. The class of men the honourable gentleman would perhaps select are known as remittance-men, with regard to whom it would have been well had the colony shut its doors against them; yet the honourable gentleman scorns the idea of "mere labourers" being placed on bush-lands! I have always understood that men of education have a different appreciation of the dignity of labour from that; because who are the men who are making this or any other country? I maintain it is "mere labourers." I maintain that "mere labourers" are about the best class of men we have in New Zealand at the present time. Then, he talks of growing bananas in Greenland, as if these labourers wanted to be sheltered under glass houses. Whatever may be said of the pensioners and remittance-men in Auckland, I am satisfied these labourers are men who are working out their destiny. I am going to support this Bill, and that portion of it with reference to Native lands, because I know, without travelling far from Wellington, it is calculated to do a great deal of good. For some time I have been endeavouring to get the Government to purchase a block of a thousand acres in the neighbourhood of Ekatahuna. It is splendid Native land, but not profitably occupied, and yet it is bounded by a good main road, can be easily settled upon, and has a township at each end of it; there is the Town of Hawtwell at one extremity, and the Town of Ekatahuna at the other extremity. It has a creamery at each extremity, and lots of settlers are wishing for an opportunity of getting upon the land. The reason the Government have not been able to acquire it is that the Natives—sagacious individuals—are waiting for the unearned increment. The land in its unimproved state they value at about £3 an acre. That land is paying little or no rates—I am not aware that it is paying any rates at all—yet all round that land we have improvements going on, and population concentrated. It is a shame that land of that character is not acquired for settlement, when in the townships there is a large amount of destitution, and "mere labourers" are willing to work, but are unable to find employment on the soil. Now, how many would that thousand acres maintain? Divided into forty-acre allotments, it would maintain twenty-five families; if you allow four for each family, it will mean a hundred souls placed unquestionably beyond the reach of destitution; not only that, but they will be placed in comfortable circumstances. If the Bill was to do nothing more than provide homes for men of that class it ought to be passed; but we find this Bill is only one of a number of policy Bills that have been introduced this session, and undoubtedly interlaced or dovetailed together. It is, on the one hand, intended to relieve the labour-market and to find investment for capital that is now locked up, and on the other hand to improve the condition of things. It is alleged that owing to the depression that prevails there is great room for improvement, and I say no more effectual method for improving the condition of the colony can be found than the method contained in Bills of this character. The Land for Settlements Bill, which has been passed by this House, is intended to open up for settlement unimproved private lands. The Advances to Settlers Bill, on the other hand, is intended to assist the small capitalists or working-men of thrifty habits who are able to go upon the land and improve it up to a certain stage, and who then may require to borrow on their improvements. The Government introduced that Bill with the view of assisting a very deserving class of colonists; but while the Bill was under discussion we had it pointed out by members, one after another, on the opposite side of the House, who were hostile to the Bill, that it did not make provision for labourers without capital, and who could not go upon the land and make homes unless they received assistance from the State or from some one else. Now, Sir, this Bill has been introduced to meet the case of this very class of deserving individuals. It has been introduced to meet the cases of men who have their health and their strength, who are prepared to work for themselves and their families, but who have no capital whatever; and, if it meets the cases of these men, what effect will it have? Will it not ease the labour-market? Will it not diminish the cry of the unemployed? Will it not assist many of these families who are now on the border of privation? Will it not render assistance to those who greatly need it? Will it not lessen the demand that is continually made upon benevolent and charitable institutions? Is it not calculated to prevent poverty? Is it not calculated to remove destitution? And may it not be claimed that it is well calculated to build up New Zealand? I say no Bill more adapted to the circumstances of the colony could possibly be brought forward than the Bill now before the House. Not only that, but, as the Premier has remarked, this Bill is likely to stop the exodus from this country. It is perfectly true—owing to the temptations offered in a neighbouring colony, whose goldfields are exciting considerable attention—that a good many of our best colonists are leaving us; but that is only a temporary attraction. There is very little doubt that, no matter how wealthy Coolgardie may be, owing to the number that are rushing there it is destined to be speedily

9.30. worked out; and by the time Coolgardie becomes sultry, in the course of a few months, many of the venturesome ones will be returning to our shores; and when they do come back, if they come back with the gold they have earned, I hope we shall have some of the lands which are now in the hands of the Natives thrown open for disposal. This is one object the Bill is intended to accomplish. It is one of a few Bills that have been introduced this session for the purpose of providing land. Then, with regard to the question of roads and bridges, I am exceedingly pleased that provision in this respect is made in the Bill, for, notwithstanding all that has been done under the public-works policy of late years, the provision hitherto has been totally inadequate. In the district I represent, in one county—Pahiatua—they have borrowed under the Loans to Local Bodies Act close on £40,000, for which they are now paying about £2,000 a year interest and capital. I say this: that if the settlers of a district like that can manifest such enterprise, if they are not afraid to borrow to this extent, if they are able to respond to the demands of the Government, if they are able to pay this amount regularly into the hands of the Colonial Treasurer, they ought to receive more assistance than they do. Only a few years ago you would hardly find ten or a dozen families in that district. At the present time there are two or three thousand settlers on the land and more or less prosperously settled. I quite agree with the remark that the settlers' lot is not such a bad one. It is quite true they have a very hard task and an uphill battle, as a rule; but if they are only assisted by the Government in the way now proposed their labours will be considerably lightened; they will go cheerfully to work, and, though the work may be hard and the climate severe, they will carve out homes for themselves, and whistle at their work because they are not at the mercy of the private money-lender, and have a Minister of Lands who understands their wants and necessities. Because it is not the case, as has been represented by one honourable member, that the Minister is not aware of the requirements of the country. The Minister has always been aware of these requirements, and time after time, when I have applied to him, he has expressed regret that the means at his disposal were not sufficient to comply with the demands. Some remarks have been made about clauses 4 and 5 and two or three succeeding clauses of the Bill, which give the Minister power to arrange with the settler the conditions under which he is to settle on the land and improve it. I think these clauses are very necessary; they seem to me to be the essence of the whole Bill. If the Minister cannot be intrusted to make such arrangements he is unfit for the position he occupies. I know we have a Minister in the position who understands the requirements of settlers, whose heart and soul are bound up in endeavouring to get the country properly settled and the bush-lands of the colony improved; and he will take care, the remarks of the honourable member for Riccarton notwithstanding, that the land does not get into the hands of a few. His object is not to build up large estates, but to place a large population on the soil of New Zealand, and thus make it the place I hope we shall see it before many years. His object is a thoroughly patriotic one, and he ought to be allowed a free hand in carrying on the work of settlement. No Minister has ever occupied the position who has laboured harder or with more sincerity to place the people on the land, and I give him credit for that. If he has not done everything that has been demanded of him, it is because he has not had the means at his disposal, and we ought cheerfully to vote him this half a million for the purchase of Native land and the construction of roads and bridges, and for placing men in necessitous circumstances, with families depending on them, in situations where they can live in comfort instead of living in poverty. If ever there was brought before the House a Bill that ought to receive the assistance of members of all shades of political opinion it is the Bill now introduced, and I hope every honourable member will support it.

Mr. BUTTON.—I wish to make a personal explanation. The honourable gentleman has quoted me as if I had used the words "mere labourers" in a sense that would depreciate them, whereas the context clearly showed that I used it to show the inability of such persons, from want of experience, to make successful farmers.

Captain RUSSELL.—The honourable member for Masterton very properly eulogized the Minister of Lands as a patriotic man, and as desirous to do everything in his power to benefit settlers. We are all prepared to believe he is imbued with patriotic feeling, and has a great desire to do everything that lies in his power to secure the proper settlement of the land. But when he went on to say that on account of his patriotic feeling we ought to give him a free hand, there we may come to differ. It does not follow that because he is patriotic he is always wise, or that a man imbued with a noble spirit can carry his noble aspirations into effect. We could not all agree that he is always wise, nor should we all agree that he is the only Minister who has been patriotic, nor who has placed numbers of persons on the land. Statistics go to show that his efforts have been no more successful than those of his predecessors. But it is useless to discuss that. We may all agree that the desire has been great upon the part not only of all Ministers of Lands, but of all members of Parliament, to do everything they can to place people on the land. I was amused when the honourable member for Masterton said he wished to draw attention to the very illogical speech of the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button). It seemed to me, at any rate, to be one speech, out of many, which was not illogical. Whether he was right or whether he was wrong will depend upon the view honourable members take on the question, but he was certainly not illogical. He stuck to the point very closely and concisely; he had an opinion, and he expressed it very plainly, and not at all illogically. I venture to say that every speech, almost, that has been delivered on the Bill has been illogical. I have no doubt that when I sit down, if any honourable gentleman does me the honour to criticize what I am now saying, he will say that I have been illogical; though I will strive to be as logical as I can. We had a very good illustration in the speech of the honourable member for Ellesmere. He made one of those speeches which are now becoming characteristic of him. He approved of one-half of the Bill and condemned utterly the other half. It was a case of nature on the one part and art on the other; it was a case of the politician on the one side and the farmer on the other. He is more loyal than logical. He does not support any measure the Government bring in, in his address to the House, but he votes in a very Governmental manner when it comes to a division. That is the class of supporter every Government ought to wish for. No Government cares for a supporter who votes for them when they are right—that is nothing; they want one who will vote for them when they are wrong, and in the honourable member for Ellesmere they have a very good specimen of the desirable supporter. Referring once more to the honourable member for Masterton, he said this Bill was only one of a number intimately dovetailed. It is perfectly true. This is one of a series of Bills intimately dovetailed—a series of borrowing proposals unparalleled in the history of the colony; and no wonder the honourable gentleman has gone out of the House, because he is one of those who were intimately dovetailed with the non-borrowing policy. Yet he advocates a Bill such as this, which authorises borrowing a quarter of a million! I am not afraid to say I disapprove of the Bill myself entirely. I want honourable members to endeavour to put aside from their minds for a moment all the plausible rhapsodies about settling the people on the land. We are all anxious to settle the people on the land; we are all anxious that Native land should come into useful occupation; but that has very little to do with the provisions of this Bill. What we have to do is to consider whether it is a wise and proper measure, whether it carries out the policy of the Government that was enunciated with brazen tongues from almost every platform—namely, that this was a non-borrowing, self-reliant Government. Whether this is one of the true policy measures which every supporter on the Government side is obliged to vote for, or whether, as it is a direct traverse of the policy enunciated, every man will be allowed to go as he pleases, I do not know; but, if the latter is the case, there is no doubt the Bill will be rejected on its second reading. But I am afraid such is not the case—that once more the Government whip will crack in the lobbies, and that honourable members will troop in to vote against every promise made on the hustings and violate their own convictions, and do what the Minister of Lands—that very patriotic Minister—tells them to do.

Mr. SEDDON.—Perhaps you will give us another hand and move another amendment.

Captain RUSSELL.—The time may come when I might do so, if I had the same chance of helping a lame dog over a stile as I had the other night. The speech of the honourable member for the Thames was very amusing. It was a very short speech; it consisted chiefly in this: He told us we ought to speak on the Bill, and not comment on other people's remarks. He spoke for about ten minutes, and during that time he was too wise to follow the advice he gave to others. He did nothing but criticize other people's remarks, and sat down with an air of ineffable wisdom and self-satisfaction. That was another of the very illogical speeches made this evening. One word to the honourable member for New Plymouth. He scolded people for talking about land, of which, he said, they knew nothing. I wonder how much the honourable gentleman knows about land. Probably the honourable gentlemen who speak about land know more about it than he does. But why should we not speak upon subjects unless we have a professional knowledge of them. Have I no right to speak about anything other than sheepfarming. We all have liberty to speak on subjects of which we think we know something. What does the honourable member know? He knows a little stuff he calls poetry, and he knows precious little about himself, or he would not talk half so much about himself as he usually does. I was very glad to notice that we had a confession from the Minister of Lands this afternoon. We have been told during the whole time the Government have been in office that they are a self-reliant non-borrowing Government, and are going to carry on public works out of revenue, and are perfectly able to do that. But to-day he said to carry on public works out of current revenue is absolutely impossible. That is nothing new. It was exceedingly patriotic, for for years past he has told us an entirely different tale. But to-night he has really enlightened the country as to the true position. Of course we knew perfectly well that at the rate the honourable gentleman and his colleagues have been spending they could not carry on public works out of revenue. I have often said that to tax the many for the benefit of the few is improper. I still maintain that to tax the many for the purpose of creating roads and bridges for the select few is not the true policy for this country. It is a policy which ought certainly to be avoided, because at the present moment the people have to bear a greater weight of taxation almost than they can bear; yet we are to be told that a large portion of the revenue which is being raised from the poorest is to be expended—in what? In providing capital for the Minister of Lands, to a very great extent. He said that at no time were roads and bridges so necessary as they are at the present moment. That I do not agree with. I do not think there is the enormous necessity which the honourable gentleman seems to think for pushing on roads into some outlandish parts of the colony. But, as my time is limited, I will not venture on that subject now. As the Premier spoke, he also admitted that there was a little borrowing in this scheme.

Mr. SEDDON.—No.

Captain Russell

Captain RUSSELL.—I should be paying him a compliment if I called him a sophisticated rhetorician, but that is about the only phrase which properly explains the style of argument which the honourable members opposite have put forward in connection with this borrowing proposal. If they had the courage to say, "The country demands a loan, and we will have a loan," I should certainly give them my respect, though they certainly would not get my vote; but when they endeavour by a system of absurd argument to prove to this House that they are a non-borrowing Government, and that there is no borrowing going on at the present time, it simply is, to my mind, beneath contempt: it is not worth one's time dwelling upon such argument as that. The Premier said we were not borrowing—that it was merely an exchange of one value for a value somewhat better. That was said in reference to the purchase of land. What did he really mean by that? For instance, if I go into a grocer's shop, and there—I do not buy, of course, but—get 4lb. of sugar in exchange for a shilling which I give, do I or do I not go through the process of buying, according to the Premier's argument? According to him, I do not buy, I simply exchange one value for another value. That is just on a par with his argument about non-borrowing. The Government send to England and get a certain number of sovereigns, and they exchange it for a certain quantity of land; and he says that is not borrowing. But the Premier went on to say that we must not be aghast at the £250,000 which is asked for under this Bill, because under the existing Act they have power to get £150,000 during the next three years. Now we are to have £250,000, instead of £150,000 spread over three years! Surely under this proposal borrowing is being intensified, and that is in direct violation of every principle which the Premier has advocated for some years. I give the Premier, as leader of the House, credit for great astuteness, and for being able to get through business in a wonderful way. But when I consider him as Native Minister, there I lose respect for him entirely. He knows nothing about the Maoris, their feelings, their customs, or their traditions. He says the purchase of Native land would do the Natives an immense amount of good, inasmuch as they are now living a life of misery and degradation. The Natives living on their own land are living no life of misery and degradation. They may not live up to the high standard of European civilisation, but they do not live a life of misery or degradation. But when the policy of the Native Minister really comes into effect, when the Native people have been deprived of their lands, when they are made—as he apparently wishes them to be made—State pensioners, then their misery and degradation will be brought about. Then, the Premier told us about the exodus—about the 935 people who left lately for Australia; and he went on to say that we must at once grapple with this evil. This was an evil which the honourable gentleman was going to grapple with the very day the Ballance Government came into office. It was one of the main grounds upon which their predecessors were said to deserve ill of the colony. It was to be grappled with at once. And yet, by the Premier's own confession, he has not attempted to grapple with the question yet. He says we must grapple with this question at once, after the people have begun to go. I tell the honourable gentleman he can do nothing with it. The day will come for those people to return, and I sincerely hope the prophecies of the honourable member for Masterton will be correct, and that they will come back with their pockets full of gold from Coolgardie, and become settlers, taking up land, and paying for it with money which they have made in Australia. The Premier asked what this emigration pointed to. I think the Government is partly responsible. The "unemployed" difficulty is more serious than I have ever known it during my thirty years' experience. The reason why people are unemployed now is that from end to end of the colony—from the North Cape to Foveaux Strait—capital has been frightened to such an extent as to arrest enterprise and to cause industrial depression. That is the principal reason why the unemployed are going away to Australia. But the Premier went on to say, "You must place these people on the land," and within two or three seconds he contradicted himself flatly—he said, "There is no use putting men in the bush with nothing but their hands." There I thoroughly agree with him. It is not that I have not every sympathy with persons going on the land. I would do everything in my power to assist then going on the land; but I have always held the opinion—and shall never fail to express that opinion—that to put men on bush-land, unless they have £1 or £2 an acre saved up before going there, is simply putting them in a position in which they cannot possibly succeed—a position in which their work and time will inevitably be thrown away; and the speculator, whom everybody in this House is so fond of denouncing, is the only person who will reap the benefit of the labour of these poor men.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Did the early settlers have £2 an acre?

Captain RUSSELL.—The circumstances of the early settlers were entirely different, and if I had time to go into that question I could do so, because I was an early settler myself. Then, the Premier said, "The Parliament of the people holds the purse-strings." This Parliament of the people does not hold the purse-strings. The only persons who have held the purse-strings in this colony for some time past are the honourable gentlemen who sit on the Ministerial benches. And they have not held the purse-strings tightly; they have loosened the mouth of the purse and scattered the gold—and even the credit of the colony—in every possible direction. This Parliament has not attempted to hold the purse-strings of the colony, and I am happy in the belief that the colony will some day bring a sure, a certain, and, I hope, a speedy retribution on those honourable gentlemen, who have failed in their principal duty to the colony. I will not go into the subject of the life of misery of the bush-settler. It is no doubt a life of misery if he wants to trudge along muddy roads and hang about small bush townships; he may under these circumstances have a certain amount of misery; but if he sticks to his work, and remains on his property, and is not ashamed to show himself a working-man in the truest sense of the term, his life will not be one of misery. As I have only a few minutes left I shall now touch on a few points in the Bill. To begin with, I disapprove entirely of clause 2. I do not desire to make any reflection on the Minister of Lands, but I say under this clause he has power to make roads and bridges wherever he pleases in the colony. He may say that is not his intention. But I do not care twopence what his intention is: I say we must take the Bill and look within the four corners of the Bill for its meaning. There is no use trying to look into the recesses of the Minister's brain for what the Bill means. We must look to the Bill itself. Under this clause there is no question that the Minister has absolute power to make roads and bridges wherever he chooses. Again I say I have no desire to imply anything but the most straightforward and honourable conduct on the part of the Minister; but I object to such a power as that being placed in the hands of any Minister. Clause 4 surely contains a principle which is absolutely unjustifiable. The Premier, speaking on this clause, said that no Minister could deal as he chose with the land—that he would be pulled up by the administration of the Land Board. But such is not the case. Under clause 4 the Minister has power to allow any person he chooses to go upon land wherever he chooses, and take up that land before survey. Was ever such a proposal made in any reasonable Assembly before? It is in distinct contravention of his own previous professions. It is a principle under which those persons who are on intimate terms with the Land Department—I do not say with the Minister, but with the Land Department, or the surveyors—will have a chance of first finding out where the good land is, and they will get that land, to the prejudice of every other person who wishes to settle

10.0. in the district. The Minister may say "No." I hope he will be able to so amend the clause as to satisfy this House. Such is not the case at present. For my own part, I have no doubt the case is as I have stated: and then, in addition to that, the person who can squat in this manner on the land is to be found money to go and cut the bush down or improve it in the way he chooses. But this is not confined to bush-lands. In any part of the country a man may squat and get full advances on his improvements. My honourable friend on my left explained to the House this evening that there are very many instances where many years' labour has been spent in improving a freehold, and in which the property plus the improvements is not saleable for more than the owner originally gave for

it. Therefore the Minister must not imagine that in making improvements on bush-lands, when, perhaps, once in three years the settler may not get his burning done, he is not running the risk of financial disaster, or that he will not have grave cause to regret that any such advances have been made. In the 9th clause, also, there is a clear case of borrowing to supplement public-works expenditure; that is to say, that the money which has been expended prior to the 31st March last—before ever the Bill was dreamt of—is to be recouped out of this fund, and paid back to the Public Works Fund or Consolidated Fund; and so, as I say, you will see it is distinctly a case of supplementing that Fund with money that has yet to be raised. Then, again, one of the points to which the attention of the House has not been drawn is, that out of the sum to be appropriated for the purchase of Native lands the Minister will have the power of disposing of so much as he chooses in the purchase of Native land, and so much as he chooses in making roads. He will be able to take the money under the theory of purchasing Native land and, in reality, spend the money in making roads. There is another clause under which the Minister may hand over money to the local bodies: and I admit the local bodies would get better value for the money than the Minister. But, in spite of the assurances constantly made, it is a pity the Minister should have large sums of money at his disposal to hand over to the local bodies to spend, at, perhaps, the time of a general election, when they may be likely to influence votes. This is not a temporary advance, although in one clause it is apparently made out to be. Then, the money is to be borrowed at 4 per cent. Why we should borrow at 4 per cent. when we are to get money in England at 3½ per cent. I cannot understand. It seems to me to be bad business. Yet, in reality, this provision that the debentures shall only have a currency of fourteen years is merely a blind, for power is left to the Minister to extend these debentures after the fourteen years. He may in every instance obtain the loan for twenty-eight years, and not for fourteen years; and this fact ought to receive the attention of the House. I am against borrowing, and there is no necessity for such an enormous sum to be borrowed. It means the acquisition, at the rate at which the Government have been paying, of over a million acres of Native land a year. There is no prospect of getting such an area for some time to come, nor is it necessary for settlement purposes to buy to such an extent. If the Government persist in borrowing money it will inevitably have the effect of ruining the credit of this colony. Ministers may say that in alluding to this as injurious to the credit of the colony I myself am doing injury to it. Nothing, as I take it, will do more injury to the colony than the belief, now strong in England, that New Zealand is once more going into a plunging borrowing policy; and this Bill only makes another step in that direction, and will lead to disastrous results.

Captain Russell

Mr. EARNSHAW.—I should not have risen to speak on this Bill but for the speech which the Premier made this afternoon, and I have not been able before to get in my review of the remarks he made. There were three notable phrases he used, and I wish more especially to refer to one of them, because it is the keynote to the change that has taken place from the Ballance policy to the Seddon policy, and there is a reason why the House should consider the change. The words he used were: "departures from the colony"; "this is not a borrowing policy"; and that they "are not going to continue a dribbling policy." It is upon the phrase "dribbling policy" that I wish primarily to speak. First with regard to the departures. From this is seen the change the Government are taking in this matter. Now, as far as the present departures are concerned, I am of opinion that the cheap fares owing to the competition between the shipping companies, and the demand for free, non-union labourers and shearers in Australia, are largely responsible for the exodus of the people from New Zealand at the present time. But, Sir, I think it is only well that the Premier's remarks to an interviewer should be brought before this House, because they show clearly how his mind changes; and in to-night's Post—that paper which, along with others, the Government would like to compel to say who it is that writes its articles: and in this connection, if they had their way, it would be necessary also that the names of the persons who send the telegrams should be printed at the foot of them—in that paper, I was going to say, there are some very remarkable statements. They are contained in what is supposed to be an account of an interview between Miss Krout and the Premier.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Who?

Mr. EARNSHAW.—I thought you knew her. I had the pleasure of making that lady's acquaintance. I think she was quite a capable representative of the Inter-Ocean newspaper and the other newspapers in America for which she has been writing. And the Premier did not delude that lady, and I do not think that the remarks she has conveyed to the Press of the States will delude the people there, for, though undoubtedly the people of America like to be humbugged, yet they realise the humbug when it is given to them. Miss Krout also refers to the Hon. Mr. Ward, to whom she was introduced. She says, "He is the Colonial Treasurer, and was selected to fill this important post from the ability he had displayed in the management of his own private enterprises." Why, Sir, the honourable gentleman was not at all selected for that reason; I am very glad to see him there, but he is simply occupying that position because there was no one else in the Ministry capable of taking the position. Then, Miss Krout says she met both the Minister of Education and Mr. Tregear. Of the former she expresses no opinion, but the latter she considers "an intelligent and well-informed man." I think the House will quite recognise that Miss Krout was not humbugged at all—that she was quite able to discern the characteristics of those she came in contact with. But now we come to the Premier, and when Miss Krout interviewed him,—

"He had just returned from a mission of pacification to the still hostile Maoris in the centre of the North Island. They had withdrawn to the mountains, and were poverty-stricken and suffering."

Then, the Premier goes on, after telling a good yarn about the chief Kereru, and the "taipan" he had got from the Natives,—

"The chief gave it me," said Mr. Leaddon, 'as the head of the Government, telling me he realised that it was useless to resist any longer, and he asked me to be a father to his people and to protect and aid them.'"

Well, Sir, I pity the Natives when they have got into the clutches of the honourable gentleman; a very good father he will make to them. Then, the article proceeds,—

"It will be satisfactory to the people of this colony to know that the Premier some time ago solved the 'unemployed' difficulty in a fairly satisfactory and practical manner. This is how he told Miss Krout it was done: 'A few years ago we found that we were losing our population at an alarming rate. There was a decrease of 14,000 within a very brief period. It was because no employment could be found for skilled workmen in shops and factories. We finally gave them employment upon the public roads—not paying all alike, but giving the able-bodied, those capable of doing the best work, the highest wages, the second- and third-rate less, according to their earning-ability. Then, when they learned to use tools, we induced them to take up Government lands, which could be purchased for £5 an acre.'"

It would be very interesting to know how many men who have been employed on the public works of New Zealand have been placed on the lands of New Zealand; it would be interesting not only to the House but to the people of New Zealand. I fear, so far as that is concerned, these works have been a signal failure. Then, the honourable gentleman told this lady, "We have absolutely stopped borrowing money, and have resolved to become an independent and self-supporting colony. We have had a period of severe depression, but times are improving." This is the one point I want to come to. The Premier declares they are a non-borrowing Government. We have certainly had a change of front since the House met. I am coming to the interesting part now.

Mr. SEDDON.—Rather sour grapes.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—The honourable member is feeling rather sour now. I am going to show that he has left the lines of his late chief, whom he has talked so much of in this House. He talked about "a dribbling policy." Who was it introduced in this House what the Premier now contemptuously calls "the dribbling policy"? Was it not the late Mr. Ballance? What was that "dribbling policy"? It was the expenditure of £50,000 for lands for settlement and £50,000 for Native-land purchase. That was the extent to which our late chief thought fit to go. It was on these lines of moderation he gathered around him the strength of the late Parliament, and captured the country, instead of having it hostile to the Liberal party. These were the lines on which the Liberal party captured the country, and these are the lines from which the present Government are departing. Let me quote an extract on this question from the Financial Statements of the late Premier in 1891 and 1892. In 1891 the late Mr. Ballance said,—

“If we are to maintain our credit and financial independence, borrowing in that [the English] market must cease; while any local borrowing is likely to be confined to the absolute necessity of carrying on those essential works of colonisation, such as the settlement of the people on the land, on which depends so directly the prosperity of the community.”

That was in 1891. Then, Sir, he said in 1892, on borrowing,—

“I have propounded in other places a financial policy of self-reliance, and shown the necessity for weaning this colony from a servile dependence on foreign dealers in money. I do not think it would be wise, even were it feasible, to attempt to raise another loan in the English money market at the present time.”

And then, speaking upon the question of raising money in the colony, he said,—

“I believe it possible to place a moderate loan at a reasonable rate of interest.”

This is, no doubt, foreshadowing to a small extent the proposal of the present Government with regard to Consols. That was the policy of the late Premier. What, Sir, is the policy of the Government on this same question? It is a series of loans—£250,000 for lands for settlement, £250,000 for Native-land purchase, £250,000 for roads and bridges. The former was a self-reliant policy; the present is a plunging policy. That is the difference between the two positions. Now, the 4th clause in this Bill is, in my opinion, most objectionable. Not only do the Government propose to allow a man to go and pick out the eyes of unsurveyed Crown land—or it can be surveyed Crown land—but they are going to lose money by this scheme, because, if we advance money to settlers on improvements, it must necessarily follow that they will lose the survey-fees that are at present demanded from persons going on to unsurveyed Crown lands. And they are to be allowed to pick out the eyes of it. In this respect the Government are going to lose still further money; and I altogether object to that. Even as it is now, in our bush districts the Government are opening block after block, and before one block is fairly settled they allow the settlers to go on to the next block that is opened and pick out the eyes of it. It simply means that there is twice the amount of money spent on getting a block opened than if the Government determined that the blocks should be reasonably occupied before further blocks are opened. This Bill is like another Bill that is before us—namely, the Railways Bill—in that it is a double Bill. On the other measure, of course, the Government said, “If we cannot carry one part of the measure we will carry the other.” And so in this Bill. The First Part of the Bill is to get a loan of a quarter of a million authorised by this House to carry out their public-works policy. There can be no doubt about it. And the continual conflict there is in the Cabinet between the Minister of Lands and the Minister for Public Works is as to the allocation of moneys, as to whether they shall be spent on railway-formation, or roads and bridges; and the Minister of Lands has determined that he will have a large sum of money to use for his own purposes—to be entirely outside the jurisdiction of the Premier. But with regard to that Part of the Act relating to roads and bridges, that Part should be introduced by the Premier, because it belongs to his department. There can be no doubt that member after member who has spoken on this question has been afraid to give full expression to his opinions, because he well knows that if he spoke against it the Minister of Lands would take care that very little of that money would be spent on roads and bridges in his district. And, what is more than that, the Government would be able to reduce the public-works expenditure; and they are very careful to keep the Public Works Statement back until they have got their policy measures through. They will then be able to say what they will do in regard to railway formation, and, as this is done under the distinct banner of a loan proposal, things will not be so rosy as they seem in that respect. Now, the Premier stated that there was not a word said about borrowing for the Cheviot purchase. That statement is incorrect, because there were many members who spoke against it distinctly. I know that I myself and others said it was a borrowing proposal, and not only was it a borrowing proposal, but the moneys coming in from the rents and from the sale of those sections are not going to redeem the debentures for the purchase of that estate. That debt has been incurred practically for all time, and the money we are getting for the sale of that land is being used for the prosecution of public works. So that the borrowing for the Cheviot purchase was distinctly borrowing, just as the raising of money under this Bill is borrowing. I understand that many members of this House will vote for this Bill, not because they believe in the policy of the Government, but because they see that the measure will be inevitably rammed through by the majority on the Government side, and if they offer any resistance to it they will get nothing for their own districts. The Minister will simply say, “If you do not want the Bill there can be no necessity for the expenditure of money in your district.” If the Middle Island members think they are going to get anything out of this they are very much mistaken. The bulk of the money is going to be used in the North Island. It is the southern members who have so much to gain by a self-reliant policy of living, and, if they could only see that, when the time comes that we must raise a loan they might get a fair share for the southern end of the colony. But I am very much afraid that under this policy the Minister of Lands is determined that the moneys, instead of being spread all over New Zealand for the opening of land, shall be used to push settlement mainly in the North Island. I do not suppose there will be a division on this question, but if there is I shall vote against the second reading. I might say the financial proposals of the Government are not receiving support from the very men whom they have stroked down the back. During the present and last Parliament the Government have had much to say about the Knights of Labour, a body which is quite able to give an opinion on these questions. I have said time and again in this House that we were returned on a non-borrowing policy, and a resolution has been carried by the Knights of Labour assembly in Dunedin against borrowing. That assembly is one of the most powerful assemblies in New Zealand, and it is a most active and representative body.

An Hon. MEMBER.—How many members?

Mr. EARNshaw.—The rules of the assembly will not permit me to tell you the number, but the honourable member will take my word for it that it is more powerful than any organization that had ever before existed in Otago since Otago has been a province. If I did tell the House the number of members belonging to it they would be astonished. This resolution, which is dated the 20th September, is as follows:—

“The Knights of Labour passed a resolution to-night protesting against the borrowing policy of the Government, on the grounds of interest coming from the pockets of the producers of the colony, and going to enrich foreign capitalists, and as the Government professed to be, and were elected as, a non-borrowing Government; also disapproving of the Advances to Settlers Bill, inasmuch as a State Bank Bill, similar to the one proposed in New South Wales, would meet the monetary requirements of the country without imperilling the national credit.”

Sir, I am very glad that I received this news after my declaration of yesterday. If I had got it before, it would have been said that I was trimming my sails to catch the passing breeze. But I am very glad that so large and representative a body of the electors of Dunedin, of all classes of the community, should so thoroughly indorse the position I have continually taken up in this House since we were returned to carry out a non-borrowing policy. The fact that they have passed a vote of censure on the present Government for their borrowing proclivities bears out the views I have expressed in this House with regard to the Budget proposals. But it is useless to occupy much time on this question, because no matter what measure is brought before the House by the Government it is swallowed by their supporters. If ever there was a time when the game of poker was played—“going it blind”—it is during this session of Parliament, for whether a proposal of the Government is a proper one or not their supporters are prepared to swallow it without reflection. It appears to me that they are determined to rely on the wisdom of the Government to promulgate a policy and not upon their own judgment. As to whether these measures are for the good of the country, or whether they are for the good of the workers of New Zealand, or whether they are on the lines to which members were pledged when returned to this House, they do not care to consider. They simply appear to believe, as members of the Liberal party, that every proposal that is put forward by this Government must be the right and proper thing, and they go and vote blindly upon it. Sir, I have opposed every policy measure this Government has brought in, because I honestly believe it is all the difference between the self-reliant policy of the late Premier and the plunging policy of the present Premier. I have already shown what was proposed by the late Premier, and the difference between the £100,000 proposed to be raised by him and what is now proposed. Here, without any great influx of population, we are asked to increase that £100,000 to £800,000. I say, if the Government had been honest to their supporters, they would simply have introduced these measures and then gone to the country to their constituents for their sanction before carrying them. I say that from the North Cape to the Bluff the country is not in favour of these measures, and the people will say that we should not have supported them.

Mr. DUNCAN.—Sir, in saying a 11.0. few words about this Bill, it is rather refreshing to me to note the change that has come over the Opposition. When these policy Bills were brought down they were attacked by almost every member of the Opposition as being huge borrowing policies; they were condemned to utter ruin, and those honourable gentlemen declared they should be kicked right out of the House, because they had departed from the policy as laid down by the original leader of the party—the Hon. Mr. Ballance—and, of course, departing from that policy, the Government had no right to occupy those benches. That was the dictum laid down by the Opposition; but now, on the top of all the borrowing Bills, we come to the last one, and that seems to be the one that suits the Opposition; therefore they go in bald-headed for it. With very few exceptions, they all support this Bill. And for what reason? Because they expect—no doubt it is very plain on the face of the Bill—the bulk of the money will be spent in the North Island. If we were to follow their tactics we should throw this Bill out. We have a chance of getting our Bills passed without this Bill being added to them, and it will save the country half a million to throw this Bill out; and, no doubt, for the South Island that would be a very good thing to do. But I have no such selfish intention in my head as to take that course, because I think what is good for one part of the country will not injure the other; and therefore, as we have required to get a Bill to acquire land for settlement in the South Island, and have got that Bill through the House, I think, in fairness, we should let the North Island have a Bill to acquire land there. I do not follow the dictum of the Opposition that this Government should be kicked off the benches because they have not adhered to the original policy. If you will look into the words that have been very badly quoted by the honourable member for Dunedin City it will be seen that the late Treasurer stated plainly that the money-market at that time was not in such a position as to warrant the colony in borrowing, but it was a likely thing that they might raise money in the colony. He showed that it was necessary that money should come from somewhere to replenish the finances at that time, or, at any rate, a very short time after. We have managed to get through a year or more since that, and we find the people of the colony, from one end to the other, to my thinking, have come to the conclusion that a loan well spent, and spent in the direction of settlement, is quite a necessary thing; and that is my opinion too. I believe that this money would do a great deal of good. I believe it would be a very good thing, in Committee, to see that the money derived from the sale of this land—the rents—should go towards paying interest on the loan, so that the colony would not be loaded to any greater extent than it is at present. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay stated that this was a policy for the purpose of putting patronage in the hands of the Minister of Lands. I think—and I believe most members of the House will agree with me—that the Minister of Lands does not require a policy for the purpose of securing patronage. He is as popular a Minister of Lands as we have had for a considerable time, and I do not think the policy of purchasing lands will add very much to his popularity, because up to this time I think he has earned his spurs as well as any previous Minister, and the fact that this House is willing to pass this Bill goes a good way to show the popularity of the Minister and the confidence this House has in him that he will administer these Bills to acquire land with even-handed justice and with a like regard for the colony as a whole. In the next sentence the honourable member for Hawke's Bay said he would have respect for the Minister if he went in for a loan. He would have respect for the honourable gentleman and his colleagues if they went in the wrong direction, if they went against the welfare of the country, if they got the country to turn against them, so that he would have some prospect of occupying those benches in future. That is the respect he would have for them in going in for a loan. To go in for a loan in the ordinary terms was generally to borrow money to carry on a policy of railway-construction, land-purchasing, and road-construction. Of course there is a portion of this money for that—land-purchase and roads—and the loan will be quite ample to carry them out in the direction they are going. Then, in the next portion of his speech the honourable member for Hawke's Bay said, "When the Natives have parted with their lands, then come the misery and the degradation." I believe the honourable gentleman is a better judge in regard to this matter than other members of the House, because, from what I am told—I am not in a position to say this from my own knowledge, but from what I am told—in the district he comes from the Natives had a large quantity of land there, and it was taken from them, and the honourable gentleman, I believe, holds a very large share of that property. If that is so it accounts for the misery and degradation of the Natives in that part of the country; and the honourable member for Hawke's Bay has contributed to the degradation of the Natives in the Hawke's Bay Province to a larger extent than any other member in this House. The honourable gentleman next stated that the reason the unemployed are going away is that capital has been scared away. I do not think it has been; but some people, with some truth, have stated that capitalists of the class of the honourable gentleman have been latterly tying up their purse-strings pretty tightly, and not allowing the capital to be expended in the way they formerly spent it. And it has been said—perhaps rather cruelly—that they have done this for a purpose, and possibly that purpose was to scare away the unemployed instead of scaring away the capital. It appears to me that that would be the most fitting way to put it—that the unemployed, rather than remain in the misery they are in, might be scared away. Then, the honourable gentleman went on to talk of settlements in the bush, and to his mind it was not such a hard thing to settle in the bush at all, because he had been an early settler himself. But I am not aware that he was a bush-settler. I am told the part of the country he comes from is open country, and not bush at all. If that be so the honourable gentleman had not very much misery or hardship to put up with when he settled upon land such as the plains of Hawke's Bay. The honourable gentleman said the Minister had the power to purchase as little land as he liked, so that he would not have to purchase a certain quantity. That is for the very good reason that it is almost an impossibility to lay down a rule as to the quantity to be purchased under the Bill now under discussion. It would depend upon the amount offered by the Natives that can be purchased, so that the purchasing-power of the Minister would depend entirely upon his opportunity and the advantage taken of it. No doubt the House has confidence in the honourable gentleman that he would purchase as much Native land as was sufficient for purposes of settlement. The speech of the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw) was something like the sermon of the "stickit minister." There was an old lady who went to church when the new minister came, but after hearing him she stopped at home for the next two or three Sundays. He called on her to see why she stopped at home, and when he asked her why, she said, "Oh, you read your sermon." "Is that a bad thing?" said the minister. "Oh, but you did not read it well," said the old lady. "Oh, that is worse," said the minister. "Well," she said, "your sermon was not worth reading." That is something like the honourable gentleman's speech. He read it; he did not read it well; and it was not worth reading. I do not know if any one understood what he was saying, but there was some interview between an American lady and the Premier; and it appeared that he was of opinion that American people like to be humbugged, but the Minister was not able to humbug this lady: so the honourable member for Dunedin City thinks the Premier is not fit for his position. I shall vote for the second reading of the Bill, but I should like the Minister to explain whether the Part of the Bill that applies to roads and bridges will apply to both Islands, and whether it will apply to railway bridges. I have no doubt that the money can be well spent on roads and bridges to open up the country, and, when we hear from all parts a cry for roads and bridges, and the settlement of the land, it is not a large sum to spend in that direction.

Mr. Duncan

Mr. MORRISON.—I may say briefly that, while recognising some of the advantages to be gained to the people of this colony by the proposals that are underlying this measure, I do not at all approve of some of the clauses in it. I find that clause 5 states,—

"Any person who settles on and improves such lands pursuant to any such agreement as aforesaid has a prior right to a license or lease, under Part III. of 'The Land Act, 1892,' of so much or such portion of those lands as may be defined by regulations under this Act, but not of any area greater than that prescribed by the said Act."

Now, Sir, I find "The Land Act, 1892," defines the tenure under which these lands are leased or sold for cash. Now, recognising that this is a Bill that is going to give the Minister power to borrow a certain sum to acquire Native lands to assist people to settle, and also to borrow a certain sum to make roads and bridges to open up and develop the lands, while agreeing that no more important duty can occupy Ministers' attention, still at the same time I should like to see the colony, which is really pledging her credit to the extent of half a million, able definitely to see that at some future time she will be recouped some of the money she is spending in that direction. I should have liked to see something in the shape of a proposal for a revaluation. I am not particular with regard to the time the lease should run—thirty, forty, or fifty years—so long as a terminating point is attached to the lease. I want to see the colony in the position that there shall be some given period for revaluation, so that the colony will be recouped some of her original outlay. Of course, I know that this is slightly inconsistent with the action I took in connection with a measure previously before the House. I supported the Land for Settlements Bill rather against my will, seeing that the land was going to be leased under the lease in perpetuity; but I was given to understand that there would be an opportunity before the end of the session for not only myself, but others who held the same views, to express our opinions with regard to this matter of the tenure of Crown lands, and that the Minister would take that as an indication, and, instead of dealing with the question this session, would bring down a measure next session that would deal with the whole of the Crown lands.

Mr. TANNER.—Happy is the man who knows his opportunity.

Mr. MORRISON.—I have now taken this opportunity to define my position accurately on this point; and I am certain that the Minister was perfectly honest in the statement he made to a large number of members some short time ago; and I think at no very distant date a Bill will be submitted to the House placing all the Crown lands in the colony under the perpetual-lease system with revaluation—that is, if a majority of the House are prepared to support the Minister in that direction. With regard to some of the criticisms advanced against the measure, I shall briefly touch upon one or two. And first with regard to clause 2, which the leader of the Opposition touched upon. He objected to the extraordinary powers the Minister of the day was going to hold under clause 2. He said that under the clause the Minister would have absolute power—those were the words he used—to make roads and bridges all over the colony, in any part he chose, and he spoke of the amount of patronage that would place in his hands. I do not think the clause gives the Minister such extraordinary powers as the honourable member claims, because it states, "The Minister may, with the approval of Parliament, . . ." He has to consult Parliament on these matters, to bring down estimates of works that might be done for the approval of Parliament, so that Parliament could put its foot down, and say, "We will have none of it." I think that does away with the argument of the honourable gentleman that the Minister would have absolute control. With regard to this much-debated clause 4, I do not see a great deal to object to in it, seeing that the Bill is drafted so particularly in the direction of assisting men without means to go on the land to make permanent homes for themselves. I say that is noble work, which should occupy the attention of the House and of every member in it. Great objection is made against the clause with regard to the amount of expense to assist settlers—spoon-feeding them for a certain time till they are able to help themselves. To illustrate the position, and put my point of view: say a man acquired a block of bush-land; it will be surveyed—and it should be surveyed—into alternate blocks of at least one hundred acres. I am not one of those who believe that you can put a man with a family on fifteen or twenty acres of bush-land removed forty or fifty miles from some large town, and dump him down and say to him that he is to hew out a home for himself. He cannot do it.

If we want to establish a successful race of permanent settlers on this land we must provide them with a sufficient area on which they may have some prospect of establishing a home; and if the block of land purchased by the Crown is surveyed into alternate blocks, and settlers placed upon each alternate block, the Crown retaining possession of every second block, and the settler is allowed so much per acre for clearing it, and after he has cleared a certain portion the Government makes some advances to him for work done, he can gradually acquire a home for himself. This money will keep him going, and after a year or so he will have sufficient land cleared to plant some crops or grass. If some such scheme were followed out, by the end of two years we should have assisted to place a very industrious class of people on the soil, and I have not the slightest doubt that 90 per cent. would remain and become permanent industrious settlers. Under our present system, the way we deal with the unemployed is not at all satisfactory. Certain reproductive works are carried on in various parts of the colony, and we cart our unemployed from the centres on to these reproductive works merely for a few months. There they remain any time up to nine months, and the result is, when the works are done, the men drift back into the centres, and in a month's time the men are as hard up as ever.

11.30. Under some such scheme as what I have, perhaps crudely, sketched out, I have not the slightest doubt that the Minister would be able not only to relieve the congested state of the labour-market, but to put some very industrious settlers on the land. A great deal of opposition was made to certain remarks which fell from the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). In my opinion Mr. Bell did not say anything which could be found fault with. I was really surprised to find so many honourable members drawing attention to his remarks and asking if he was competent to form an opinion in regard to bush-settlers. It is not the first time in my life I have heard such an objection taken. I say a man does not require to be born on a bush-farm, or to be brought up there, to be able to give an opinion as to how bush-settlements should be conducted. We know very well that in America, Canada, and in these colonies some of the most successful settlers—some of whom we have in New Zealand—are men who were not brought up to farming, but were drawn from all classes and professions. And these men have become successful runholders and farmers. They went into bush-settlements, and have made homes for themselves. These men have been drapers, shoemakers, tailors, lawyers, clerks, doctors: in fact, members of all professions have gone on the land and been successful. The honourable member for Kaiapoi advocated strongly, and with a certain amount of warmth, that it was not necessary to make roads and bridges until the settlers were on the land—in fact, that the Government should not make roads and bridges, but that the settlers should do so—and the honourable member calls himself a practical farmer! Imagine putting twenty, thirty, or fifty men in bush-country where there are no roads or bridges, where these men are supposed to be—men without capital, men who are there for the purpose of hewing out homes for themselves, and who are assisted by the Government with advances—imagine these men being placed there without roads or bridges to help them in developing the land! I am sure, if the honourable member had given the matter a thought, he would not have made the statement which he did. I only wish to say, in conclusion, that I am not at all satisfied with the tenure provided in the Bill. I may say that I shall be prepared, on any occasion which may arise in the future, to support the perpetual lease with a revaluation clause as against the lease in perpetuity, and I would very much like to see the honourable gentleman alter this Bill in Committee in that direction.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I think honourable members on the other side of the House are to be congratulated on the virility of their speeches in criticizing the measures of the Government. I cannot suppose that such criticism is comforting to the Minister of Lands, any more than his honourable colleague the Colonial Treasurer liked the very drastic criticisms which proceeded from his own side of the House upon the financial measures which the Government have introduced this session. Such experiences must have recalled to their minds the couplet which appears in the "Anti-Jacobin," where the invocation is made,—

But of all plagues, good Heaven, thy wrath can send,
Save, save, oh! save us from the candid friend!

The last speaker has indicated one occasion when he took a bold and independent stand. He has now added another. The Land for Settlements Bill was only got through this House on the understanding, as I am told, and as the honourable gentleman has corroborated to-night, that an opportunity would be given this session for reviewing the question of the lease in perpetuity. Soon after the second reading of that Bill I asked the Minister of Lands if he was prepared to give the promised opportunity, and he very candidly said that he did not intend to give any such opportunity. However, I desire to congratulate the honourable member for Caversham for having now in this Bill discovered the opportunity.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—You are not putting it quite correctly.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I am putting it perfectly correctly, and, in order to prove that, I will read what occurred.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honourable gentleman will not be in order in quoting Hansard of this session.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—A question and answer?

Mr. SPEAKER.—No.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Well, I state my recollection, after refreshing my memory with the record of what took place. However, I congratulate the honourable member for Caversham on having discovered the opportunity of moving in the direction of altering the lease in perpetuity, by introducing, as an amendment in this Bill, provision for periodic revaluations. I trust he will not permit any caucus which may be called on this Bill, as has been called on other Bills of a like character, to dissuade him from taking that course.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Will you support him?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Will I support him? Yes, I will pledge myself to support such a proposition, and, if the honourable gentleman will not adhere to the lines he has indicated to-night, I myself will take an opportunity of moving in Committee, on the 5th clause of this Bill, that the tenure shall be the lease in perpetuity varied by periodic valuations, so that an opportunity will arise, although it is probably not desired by the Minister of Lands, for testing the question this session. My honourable friend asks why I should support such a proposal. I would do so, as a lesser evil than the lease in perpetuity, though it must not be understood that I am at all in favour of that tenure under the Act of 1892. I prefer the old perpetual lease with option of freehold, but if we cannot get a whole loaf we will be content with a half. I shall be satisfied in this Parliament with having broken the lease in perpetuity, which is a double-edged fraud—a fraud against the settler and a fraud against the colony. I would ask the attention of the House to another deviation by the Government, as indicated by the provisions of this Bill, from the proposals outlined in the Financial Statement. In the Financial Statement there were three subjects of borrowing: there was the Land for Settlements Bill, which we have already passed, giving power to the Minister to raise £250,000 a year; then there was the proposal as to roads and bridges; and there was the proposal as to Native-land purchase. The two latter were by no means associated in the Financial Statement. On the contrary, I find that there are several paragraphs on various subjects intervening between the one and the other. They are both, however, bracketed in this Bill in so far as the raising of money is concerned; and this other significant thing occurs: that whereas the Land for Settlements Bill—which we have passed, giving power, as I say, to the Minister to raise £250,000 a year—repeals the preceding Act which was passed in 1892, authorising the raising of £50,000 a year, this Bill, in dealing with roads and bridges and Native-land purchases, does not propose to repeal either of the Acts which are already on the statute book relating to these same subjects, and which authorise the raising of £50,000 a year.

Sir R. STOUT.—It does repeal one Act.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I did not understand it so; but I accept the correction, and assume that this Bill will supersede the power to borrow £50,000 a year for the purchase of Native lands under the Act of 1892; but I should like to know from my honourable friend the Minister of Lands whether the power at present given under "The Government Loans to Local Bodies Act Amendment Act, 1891" to raise £50,000 a year is intended to be repealed.

Sir R. STOUT.—It is not touched.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Then, power is still retained under that Act to raise £50,000, in addition to the £250,000 for roads and bridges proposed under this Bill; so that, with another £250,000 for Native-land purchases, the borrowing proposals here are really £500,000 under these two heads, plus £50,000 more under "The Loans to Local Bodies Act, 1891," which is synonymous with the proposal here as to roads and bridges. That the colony may have some idea of what has been going on under the three borrowing Acts already on our statute-book—namely, the Land for Settlements Act, the Roads and Bridges Act (otherwise, but misleadingly, termed "The Government Loans to Local Bodies Act Amendment Act, 1891"), and the Native Land Purchases Act—I should like to place on record in Hansard a few figures—significant, Sir—from a return laid on the table recently on my motion, and which shows what moneys have been borrowed and spent under these several Acts:—

Under "The Land for Settlements Act, 1892."

1893-94.	Debentures issued ...	35,966
	Amount expended ...		37,542
1894-95.	Debentures issued ...	15,000
	Amount expended ...		618
April 1, 1893, to June 30, 1894.	Other amounts credited	896	...

Honourable members will thus see that under "The Land for Settlements Act, 1892," which this Bill, if passed, will repeal, there has already been raised this year a considerable sum of money in addition to the quarter-million authorised to be raised under the Land for Settlements Bill, now going through the other Chamber.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—No.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I say £15,000 has already, under the Act of 1892, been raised in the present financial year.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—No.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Then the return must be wrong. I say debentures amounting to £15,000 have been issued, and up to the 30th June only £618 had been expended.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—£15,000.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—£15,000? I am glad of the explanation, and I hope my honourable friend is quite serious in making it.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—That is, if we pass it.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Of course; but if this Bill does not pass you will still have power to borrow money this year to the extent of £35,000, being the balance of the £50,000 already authorised. Now I will pass on to the expenditure under the Government Loans to Local Bodies Act of 1891, which is synonymous with the subject of roads and bridges under this Bill. Here are the figures:—

Under "The Government Loans to Local Bodies Act Amendment Act, 1891."

1891-92.	Debentures created	...	£ 8,000	...	£
	Amount expended	...	...	...	8,000
1892-93.	Debentures created	...	29,833	...	...
	Amount expended	...	...	...	29,833
1893-94.	Debentures created	...	30,000	...	...
	Amount expended	...	...	...	30,000

It will be seen that in respect of roads and bridges the full amount raised last year has been expended, and that there has not been anything yet done this year.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—We have not gone beyond the limit in any year.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Quite so; but you expended last year exactly the amount raised. Now we come to the Native Land Purchases Act of 1892. The return gives the following particulars:—

1892-93.	Debentures created	...	£ 97,700	...	£
	Amount expended	...	...	...	19,575
1893-94.	Debentures created	...	73,000	...	...
	Amount expended	...	...	...	78,984
March 31 to June 30, 1894.	Debentures created	...	50,000	...	...
	Amount expended	...	...	...	14,356

So that already this year the limit under the powers of borrowing under the Act proposed to be repealed have been exercised. And, if I understood what my honourable friend has stated, it is intended under the present Bill to take power this year to raise in addition £250,000, so that, with the debentures already issued under the former Act, there will during the present year be £300,000 available for the purchase of Native lands. The point I desire to ask the attention of honourable members to is this: that, although the First Part of the Bill deals with roads and bridges, and the Second Part with Native land, the Third Part applies the raising of the funds for both these objects; that is to say, both sets of loans are to be raised in the same way, both are convertible into stock, and no doubt are intended as soon as possible to be placed on the London market. I ask the attention of the House to that fact, which should be borne in mind. Yet the two proposals are different in character. My honourable friend the Colonial Treasurer, in his Budget speech, had to admit that, as to the £250,000 proposed to be spent on roads and bridges, it was unmitigated borrowing. It was money going out, and not coming back, unless indirectly; but the money to be spent in the purchase of Native land was, he suggested, in a different category, because it was money going out for the acquisition of land that would be afterwards disposed of and make a direct return. If this distinction is to be preserved it is desirable that the money to be received for land so acquired should be ear-marked: that is to say, the revenue derived from the settlement of the land should be applied towards redeeming the loan.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—It does not appear in the original Bill; only certain clauses. You have not read the Bill.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Then, my honourable friend will not deal with the moneys to be received for the land, and which should be placed to a special account?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Of course.

Sir R. STOUT.—Such is not provided.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—It is left in considerable doubt; and I am glad to have these assurances from the Minister, and I trust he will take measures in Committee to make that perfectly clear. The Bill will be all the more satisfactory if that be done.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—You will find it in the original Act—20th clause, subsection (a).

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The original Act of 1892, is it?

Sir R. STOUT.—Yes.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—That only provides for a return being made to Parliament showing how the moneys are received and paid. It does not provide for the income from the lands being placed to a separate account and only used for the purpose of redeeming debentures that may be issued for the purpose of providing money for the acquisition of the land. That is the point which I desire to have made clear. I was glad to hear one or two honourable members who usually support the Government state distinctly that it was their intention to see that such a provision was inserted, and I trust my honourable friend, now that he sees the Bill is not quite clear on the point, will have it amended in Committee.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—It will be just so much the worse for the North Island.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I do not know how it can be so much worse for the North Island that there should be an account kept which would give information to the House as to how the moneys have been expended, and to what purposes the revenue from the settlement of the land is to be applied.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I have already stated that on the 12th July I tabled all the information the honourable gentleman wants.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honourable gentlemen must not carry on a conversation with one another.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I do not object, Sir, to these interruptions, because it is all in the way of getting light thrown on the subject. What we want, and, I believe, the majority of the House—

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—You are misleading the House.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—No; I desire to show how important it is that these moneys should be ear-marked, so that the revenue from lands which are to be purchased with borrowed money shall be applied to the redemption of the bonds. That is the point, and we will no doubt, with the assistance of the Minister, make it plain. I would now refer to one or two sections of this Bill, which, I agree with some honourable members, are curious in the matter of drafting. It is a matter of observation that these policy Bills, which are coming down so rapidly, dealing with finance and the raising of money, are very loosely worded indeed.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Not properly drafted, did you say?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Very indifferently drafted.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must request the honourable gentlemen to allow this conversation in the course of a debate to cease, and to let the debate proceed without such interruption.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—There is something difficult to understand in the drafting of the Bill. Here is the 2nd clause, for instance:—

“The works contemplated by this Part of the Act are the construction of roads and bridges, the preparation of lands for settlement, and such other works incidental thereto as the Minister of Lands, hereinafter called ‘the Minister,’ may, with the approval of Parliament, think necessary.”

How is the approval of Parliament to be expressed? Is it by resolution?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—By the estimates.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—Oh, well, you should say so. “According to appropriations to be made by Parliament” has been the language ordinarily used for the purpose.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—If you read the Bill you will find that.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I am speaking of the 2nd clause, which is novel in its construction.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Look at the 3rd clause.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—I am coming to that clause. It reads,—

Well, that advances us a little. Now I come to clause 4; it is most peculiar:—

“Any person may by agreement with the Minister settle upon any Crown land for the purpose of clearing or otherwise improving the same, upon such terms as to advances or otherwise as may be agreed on, and the Colonial Treasurer may, when authorised by Parliament, make all such advances out of moneys available under this Act.”

If that be intended as a reference to appropriation, I would suggest that it would be better to keep to the form of words usually used in dealing with appropriations. The 5th clause goes on to say,—

“Any person who settles on and improves such lands pursuant to any such agreement as aforesaid has a prior right to a license or lease, under Part III. of ‘The Land Act, 1892,’ of so much or such portion of those lands as may be defined by regulations under this Act, but not of any area greater than that prescribed in the said Act.”

I have referred to Part III. of the Land Act of 1892, and find that Part deals with the optional system: cash, occupation with the right of purchase, and the lease in perpetuity.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—What about licenses already purchased?

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—If my honourable friend means that, we shall be satisfied; but it would be preferable to employ the phrases used in the Act referred to. The whole thing is so ambiguous, one would suppose that the Bill was drafted in a thunderstorm. The 6th section affords the honourable member for Caversham an opportunity for introducing his proposed amendment with reference to periodical revaluations. I will not proceed further with a criticism of this Bill at this time, because I perceive there is a great deal to be done in the way of Committee work. When we have gone through that stage perhaps the Bill may better commend itself to the majority of members of this House.

Mr. O'REGAN.—I rise to endeavour to improve this Bill by proposing an amendment, which I will presently read. There is no doubt whatever that the Bill is part and parcel of a policy of borrowing. It is undoubtedly, as the honourable member for Selwyn said, a reversion to the policy put in practice many years ago by Sir Julius Vogel, and, as far as I can see, it is no improvement whatever upon the policy of that gentleman. I personally object to borrowing, but on certain conditions I would not object to it, and, in order to enable me to support the Bill conscientiously and to the best of my ability, I intend to propose this amendment. My honourable friend the member for New Plymouth, and also the honourable member for Marsden, were loud in their praises of this Bill this evening. It seems to me that the chief reason why Bills of this kind, which propose to scatter money broadcast in different parts of the colony, are hailed with satisfaction by some honourable members is that they see a good time coming, when money will be spent freely out of the public chest, and that the consolidated revenue is going to bear the interest. That certainly was the evil of the past, and that is why so much log-rolling was done, and why so many political railways and other public works were made in the colony. It is surely only fair and just that those districts which benefited by the construction of public works so largely should be called on to pay interest on those public works. It is manifestly unfair to make public works for certain parts of the colony, and tax everybody in New Zealand for the purpose of paying interest upon their cost. Dealing first with the Crown lands, let us imagine what will happen under the provisions of this Bill if it becomes law in its present form. Land will be taken under the lease-in-perpetuity system, under the provisions of which the present occupiers are allowed to hold the property as long as they live, under the existing valuation. Is not that an extraordinary principle?

The land is held for 999 years without revaluation, and the consequence is that all the increment accruing to the land after it is taken up will go to benefit private individuals. Here we are asked to expend an enormous sum of money to open up Crown and Native lands for settlement. In due course this land will be occupied by a class of, no doubt, very deserving settlers; but the roads and bridges which will have been made under the provisions of this Bill will certainly have gone to benefit them, and them alone. Yet the rest of the colony will be called upon to bear the interest. In regard to the Native lands, speaking personally I think the Maoris are being demoralised by the present system of Native-land purchase. Sir, I cannot, for my life, see why the Maoris should be bought out of lands in which they have no pre-emptive interest. It is utterly ridiculous, to my mind, to say that, because a few aboriginals happen to be scattered here and there in various parts of the forest, it cannot be reclaimed and settled without taking large sums out of the pockets of the taxpayers to acquire the title to it. Here we have a system of speculation on the part of the Natives, as their land cannot be settled without an enormous cost to the taxpayers, who wish to occupy it under the lease-in-perpetuity system. I have no objection to dealing with the Natives fairly, and there is not the slightest doubt that in the past they have been dealt with hardly and in a manner that is far from creditable to the Europeans; but of late years the tendency has been to indulge in too much sickly sentimentality about the Maori race. They are being demoralised by the indulgence observed by the Europeans towards them. There is no doubt whatever that up in the Rotorua district the Maoris are being really spoiled. They are like spoiled children—demanding excessive rents, which the people are obliged to pay to them, and people, have to pay heavily, I understand, for taking sketches, and for visiting certain localities in the district. My contention is that it has a demoralising effect for any people, whether they be white or black, to get sums of money they do not earn. Again, we talk about land-monopoly. My opinion is that amongst the Maoris we have land-monopolists as bad as any Europeans. And the Native lands will be increased in value by the public works, and by the money which is spent by the taxpayers of the colony. The Maori owners will receive the benefit, which is not, I think, a very creditable state of things. As regards tenure and taxation, there should be no distinction whatever in dealing with either Maoris or Europeans. However, I should have had no objection to vote for the Bill, and to sacrifice my principles as regards the Native lands, if the evils that at present exist in regard to land-tenure were not to be perpetuated. But under the lease-in-perpetuity system they will be perpetuated. Indeed, with regard to advances to settlers, if I may be allowed to refer to that, while giving all credit to my honourable friend the Minister of Lands for his intentions, I cannot help agreeing in the view taken by the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button). It seems to me that that gentleman was right in his contention. Strange though it may appear, and although he sits on that side of the House, I thoroughly agree with him that this scheme of advances to settlers is not really advances at all. It means the Government backing bills for settlers.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What about the Bank of New Zealand?

Mr. O'Regan

Mr. O'REGAN.—It is the same thing. The Government propose to back bills for settlers on their State security. And it seems to me that the remark of my honourable friend the member for Auckland City (Mr. Button), that we were paying too dear for our whistle, was quite correct. The Government are not advancing money on any security to be offered by the tenant, because the occupier's interest is not in the land itself, but in the improvements. The land is really the property of the State, which will be called on to advance money upon its own security; which seems to me to be a very curious way of doing business. I have no objection to support this Bill provided it is a little amended, which I think might be consented to by the Government, seeing there is a Betterment Bill on the Order Paper. At present it seems we are going to scatter money broadcast over the colony, and no provision whatever is to be made to pay the interest on it. I have been looking forward, in common with a great many of my brother-members in this House, to a time when the present Ministry would remit some of the Customs duties. I have been looking forward to the time which was spoken of by the late Premier and the present Treasurer when they promised a reduction of duties on the necessaries of life—a change which I consider absolutely necessary, and one that would benefit the working-classes far more than this so-called labour legislation which has occupied the time of the House to an undue extent. I have been looking forward with the greatest anxiety for this happy ideal to be consummated. But under the present circumstances it seems there is to be increased taxation in the future, because if you expend money as proposed under this Bill, without making provision to pay interest, the taxation must necessarily be increased.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It pays its own way.

Mr. O'REGAN.—There is no provision, as far as I can see, for making it pay its own way. The Hon. the Premier is, I know, a strong supporter of the principle of betterment, and he has embodied that principle in a Bill to give effect to it, which is now on the Order Paper. Whether it is going to be proceeded with or not I do not know. The amendment which I propose will have a most desirable effect, because it is only fair that those who have money spent in their district should pay for it.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Are you prepared to pay for what is done in the Inangahua District?

Mr. O'REGAN.—Certainly I am; and so far we have had but little to pay for. It is manifestly unfair to have special expenditure in one part of the colony when the whole colony has got to pay for it. I move, Sir, That the Bill be referred back to the Government for the purpose of introducing the principle of betterment, as I think that amendment would have the desired effect.

Mr. CARROLL.—Sir, with all the respect I have for my honourable friend the member for Inangahua, I object to his idea that the Natives should be experimented upon by us in regard to their lands in the direction he indicates. So far as his pet scheme, land-nationalisation, is concerned, I would suggest that he should apply that first of all rather to the lands held in large areas by Europeans or private individuals in this colony. I think if he advocated that policy he would be giving more support to the land-for-settlement policy which has been introduced by the present Government. He has been pleased to say that the Natives are being demoralised in several parts of this colony, and that they have no right to anything arising from their land because they have not worked for it. I beg, Sir, to say that they are no more demoralised—whatever may be their want of education—than are sections of the European population in our large centres. They have made the most of their lands under the exceptional conditions under which they have held them. They have fought for their lands; they have in the past disputed the right of the Europeans to their present sovereignty over their lands; and I think we ought to approach them now in a more civilised spirit, and make them one with ourselves. Referring to the question of the acquisition of Native lands, there are some members in this House who object to it. There are some, again, who, while objecting to that Part of the Bill which proposes to borrow £250,000 for roading and bridging the country and improving Crown lands, prefer, first of all, that the Native lands should be acquired by the Crown. Well, that signifies a selfish policy, to my mind. I was surprised to hear the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button) advocating such a principle as that, because I have always given him credit for being fair in a question affecting not only the Europeans, but also his dark-skinned brethren. Why should the honourable gentleman be so jealous regarding the lands and rights of the European population of this country, and yet advocate in the same breath that, if you want to buy lands, you should buy up the Native lands first? Is that generous?

Mr. BUTTON.—I did not say so.

Mr. CARROLL.—That is the only conclusion I could draw from the honourable gentleman's remarks.

An Hon. MEMBER.—That is a mistake.

Mr. CARROLL.—Well, I am glad to find out that I am mistaken; but there is that tendency on the part of honourable members to say, "Save the European lands, but buy up the Maori lands for settlement." Settlement is a very good thing, but they do not urge that it be applied to European lands. Now, that is unfair, and not only unfair, but ungenerous. The remarks of the honourable member for Patea I only noted with regard to their bearing on the land policy of the colony. He was in favour of the suggestion made by the honourable member for Caversham, that at a certain stage of this Bill the question should be decided as to the tenure that should exist under this Bill—that is to say, whether this House is to decide in favour of the eternal lease or of perpetual lease with revaluation. He openly declared, in the same sentence, that he was in favour of the right of purchase, but, as he could not get that, he would favour perpetual lease with revaluation, because it was going in that direction. I only refer to this to show there are two opinions held by two different sections in this House—the one section strongly in favour of perpetual lease with revaluation, because they say it is the fairer tenure and more to the advantage of the people of this colony by preserving a better revenue, and a better supervision of the land of the people in their hands; while, on the other hand, those of the persuasion of the honourable member for Patea go in for perpetual lease with revaluation, simply because it carries them nearer purchase. These expressions are very significant, and should be noted by gentlemen in dealing with this question of the land policy of the colony. Of those who criticized this measure there were some who would not openly declare against this Bill, but who were inclined to be against it purely because they are hostile to the Government. There were others, again, who spoke against the passing of this Bill on the pretext that it smelt too much of borrowing. The only member who openly spoke against it was the leader of the Opposition: he said he would have none of the Bill. The issue embodied in the Bill is this, and no one applied it so directly as the honourable gentleman: Are we to have roads and bridges throughout this colony? are we to improve Crown lands in this colony, for the purpose of encouraging settlement, by roads and bridges, or are we not? Many declare they are in favour of roading and bridging and improving the Crown lands of the colony in order that these lands may be fitted for settlement, but they are against borrowing for that purpose. In fact, all were in opposition to the Bill one way or another; but the honourable member for Hawke's Bay was the only one who openly declared that he did not see any utility whatever for carrying on roads and bridges. Now, I differ from my honourable friend so far as that is concerned. I only regret that, expressing as he does, with the merit of candour and with the courage of his opinions, his views upon this question, he is so far out of touch with the feelings and desires of the people of this colony. If there is one cry throughout the North Island—throughout his own district and my district—if there is one cry on the part of the people more than another, it is their cry for roads and bridges. I can refer honourable members to many rising settlements in the back-country of my district, situated in wild, rugged, and almost inaccessible parts, where settlers have gone up with their families, have taken up sections, are carving out homes for themselves, where it is a struggle from morning till night, and they vainly cry out for assistance. They want roads and bridges to allow them to have communication with the centres; they want roads and bridges to enable them to carry their produce to market; and they want roads and bridges to enable them to take up there what they need to obtain from the centres of population. They want roads and bridges, I say; and yet, in the face of that, my honourable friend says, "We do not want roads and bridges." I am speaking now not only of Wairoa, but of the Gisborne district. Now, he also said that he was against Native-land purchase. It was an open declaration on his part. Sir, has this country been against the purchase of Native lands? This is quite a new policy on the part of the honourable gentleman. The Governments that have been administering the affairs of this country for years past have had for their Native policy that they should buy wherever they thought fit for the public interest. We have affirmed the principle under the Land for Settlements Bill that the Crown can purchase private estates for the purposes of settlement. Then, if you give that power to the Crown to buy private estates, why draw a line of demarcation between lands held by Europeans and lands held by Natives in so far as the public welfare is concerned? I say the rights of the Crown should be paramount wherever the interests of the public are in question—it matters not whether it is buying European or Native lands. That is the principle we should advocate, and it is a fairer thing for both sides, and it is arriving at that union of the two races, placing them on the one footing, which I have always favoured. It is an important step towards that. I am in favour of the Government resuming the right of pre-emption. They hold it under the Land for Settlements Bill. If we give the Crown the right by special legislation to buy private estates held by Europeans, why make any difference as to the lands held by Natives? It is not reasonable; it is not fair. Not only that. Take our old chiefs in the past: what did they do? They entered into a solemn treaty, and they ceded the sovereignty of New Zealand to Great Britain, and in return were guaranteed that they should not sell to any one but the Crown, if they so chose, but, still, the Crown was the only one that could buy.

Mr. CARROLL.—Well, that is the pre-emptive right. I am in favour of anything that is fair, just, and honest. I do not think any one coming here should come in the position of a delegate, nor should he come here only to represent his own constituency; he should come here to represent the interests of the colony at large; and, if we are intrusted with the colonisation of the country, we must not be guided by individual views or individual inclinations, but must proceed on broad lines, and consider the advantage and progress of the country, and the mutual benefit of all concerned. Sir, there is another point I will touch upon. The honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button), although he did not mean it in an offensive spirit, endeavoured to show the thorough incapacity of those who toil to become settlers; and this was affirmed by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay. Now, in my experience in this colony—and I have visited a good many parts of it—I have witnessed settlements growing up and maturing into large centres; I have come in contact with the class of people to whom these statements have been applied, and I have found them to be of the thrifty class of labourers, who have saved a little money, and who have gone to face the wild country they come in contact with in the interior, and founded settlements: they are labourers. The inference from the remarks of those honourable members is this: that the labouring-classes cannot make good settlers; it is only those who are in the possession of capital who can make good settlers, say my honourable friends. Well, you will find even in that class that there are some not fitted to become good settlers; you will find thrifless people in all classes of the community: but, Sir, I take my own district, and I find in our settlements there some of our most sturdy settlers and well-to-do men starting at the lowest rung of the ladder. You do not require special training to become a settler. You require a good stout heart; you require zeal; you require earnestness and a wish for the improvement of the country; and if he has hands and a sound heart you have only to give such a person the opportunity, and he will become a good settler—we have many instances of the kind in this country—and he will make a living suitable to his wants. And that is our policy: we want to give every one a chance of getting on the land; we do not want to pursue a selfish policy; we do not want to pursue the policy of the past; we want to pursue a generous policy, and to give every man a chance of getting on the land and of showing to us what he is capable of doing. Sir, the honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House object to the pre-emptive right over Native lands being placed in the Crown. They mean this: that the Native lands should be thrown open to private dealing. Now, that is a thing we have to face the country with. If we are going to colonise this country we must observe very carefully indeed such principles as will bring about the desired good to the many. What will be the result if free trade with the remainder of the Native lands be allowed to creep in to-morrow? You will find competition. You will find several moneyed rings. You will find several persons having the command of capital or unlimited credit competing against each other for one block of land. Invariably in the case of large blocks of land you will find there are from a hundred to three hundred Native owners. You will find that one person will have obtained fifty signatures, another person sixty, and so on. And what does that mean? That means confusion, difficulty, fights among the Natives themselves, and it leads to the great blot upon Native-land purchase we have witnessed from time to time in the past—defective titles on the part of Europeans. They have to come and clamour to Parliament to pass legislation to validate defective titles. We should have the same thing over and over again. It is a most unsatisfactory state of things. Where a Native holds land like a European let him deal with it as a European would, but where they hold in large numbers individual dealing should be a thing of the past. It has led to more confusion, more litigation, more fighting, more discomfort, more ruin to all parties concerned, Europeans and Natives alike, than any other thing; and we should not perpetuate that state of things. Now, Sir, I notice by this Bill brought in by my honourable colleague that it should be read with the Native Land Purchase and Acquisition Act of 1893. There is one point I will say on the part of the Natives on which they have a just ground for complaint, and that is, according to the system of past Native-land purchases the Natives have never been able to get a fair and just value for their lands. Now, I quite agree with honourable members in their expression of opinion that, if the Natives sell to the Government or if the Government purchase their lands, they are entitled to a fair value, just the same as

12.30. Europeans. I should like to see the principle contained in the Native Land Acquisition Act of 1893 embodied in this Bill, so that any purchase of Native land engaged in by the Government should be based on this ground of valuation; that is to say, that the Native owners will be assured of the proper value for their land, deducting, of course, expenses and so forth. I should also, on behalf of the Natives, like to see some proposal adopted whereby the Government of the day can cut up the lands to settle the Natives on. I think we are forgetting our Native neighbours altogether in our zeal to push on European settlement throughout New Zealand, and in buying up Native lands for that purpose we are forgetting an obligation on ourselves—a sacred duty of doing what is right and just to the Native inhabitants of the colony; and I say we can do them justice if we take the same trouble with them as we do with Europeans, and settle them on their own lands and make settlers of them, make them producers, and contributors to the revenue, and, under these circumstances, let them share the same responsibilities as are imposed on the Europeans themselves. The lands left to the Natives now, in this colony, are not of the richest quality. They have immense areas, seven or eight million acres, but two-thirds of it is not of first-class quality; and the limitation of areas to be held by individuals, which is the principle running through our land policy with regard to Crown lands, should have a greater elasticity than it has at present. I take exception here to the remarks of the honourable member for Palmerston. His idea is that where the Crown acquired lands it should acquire them near large centres: he instanced the State farms at Levin, and other places, and said, if we want to push on settlement, we must restrict our purchases to the acquisition of lands near large centres, and cut them up into small sections, and then we should have a perfect state of land-settlement. He did not believe in the limit of 640 acres of first-class land to a settler, on the ground that it was too much. I hold a different opinion. I say 640 acres is little enough. Very few people who live in large centres know what a back settler has to put up with, and the balance of the land left for the Crown to acquire is not all plains or undulating hills, and not that class of land you can go upon and, with little improvements, make a home for yourself; but it requires a lot of work and industry, and, under these circumstances, I say it would be compatible with our desire to do good and advance settlement to have our limitations as regards area more elastic. I should prefer rather a value limitation. But I say we must take one step at a time, and I am quite satisfied, and all are quite satisfied on this side of the House, that the principle embodied in the Bill in charge of my colleague is the first and most important step. Let us secure this vantage-ground in the interests of settlement, and then, as other developments occur,—and in the near future some things will disclose themselves,—we shall be in a position to make a further step in the direction of settlement. I do not wish to say more. I think the policy of my colleague will bear good fruit, and will commend itself to the majority of the people in the colony.

Mr. HEKE.—Listening to the speech made by the honourable gentleman who has just sat down, I may say this is the first time I have heard the honourable member speak in favour, to a certain extent, of the rights of the Natives. But I wish to say this: that the speech of the honourable gentleman is most inconsistent with the opinions that he advanced a few years back on the matter of the rights of the Natives and of the Crown as regards the purchase of Native lands. I have here a little record of a speech the honourable gentleman gave in the year 1887, while contesting the Eastern Maori election with Mr. Wi Pere. Sir, a few days ago I observed, among the parliamentary items in one of our newspapers, a short paragraph stating that the Native members were strenuously opposing and stonewalling, before the Native Affairs Committee, the Native Bill wherein the Government propose to resume to themselves the pre-emptive right over Maori lands. With your permission, Sir, I desire to say something on this question—a question, I venture to say, too lightly treated, and a question that is not approached with the consideration and seriousness it is entitled to—for there is no subject before our legislators of greater importance, influencing as it does the two races, and with them the whole colony. But, first, allow me to preface my remarks with a little—I hope, pardonable—egotism. Firstly, I have never had, nor do I expect to have in the future, any connection with Native-land transactions; secondly, I am far from an opponent of the present Government, and but for abusing the secrecy of the ballot I could say more; and, thirdly, I do not believe the expressions of opinion I am about to give you because I write them, but I write them because I believe them. Now, to proceed. The Native members are strenuously opposing the resumption of the pre-emptive right by the Government, and I say to them, “Kia kaha,” for there is no more commendable struggle recorded in history for right and justice than theirs in blocking this cruel and cowardly proposition of a Ministry: cruel, because it is unjust; cowardly, because it is the strong treading on the weak. "It is excellent to have a giant's strength, but it is tyrannous to use it like a giant." Let us review Timi Kara's opinions on the Crown's right of pre-emption over Native lands. During the contest for the Eastern Maori seat in 1887 a very large gathering of Natives was held at Pakirikiri, near Gisborne, the chief topics for discussion being politics and religion. Both Mr. Carroll and Wi Pere dealt with the former subject, the text being the Native Land Administration Act. Mr. Carroll criticized the measure most cleverly and most adversely, saying, inter alia,—

"It was a law actually in existence affecting a large number of people and their lands. He was altogether opposed to the law. Some present may see great advantages in the Act. For his own part he saw none. . . . The principle of the Act is in itself bad. The control of the Maori land under the Administration Act passes into the hands of the Government. The desire of the Maori was that the mana of the land should rest with the Maori people. . . . Instead of the Natives being protected by the law they were placed at the mercy of the Government of the day. Once the people themselves lost control of their lands in the way he indicated, they had to bid Good-bye for ever to it."

Again, at Waipawa, on the 4th August, 1887, addressing a public meeting, he said,—

"The time has come when our aboriginal brothers should not be treated as children, and put out to nurse at the hands of the Government, but should be encouraged to act and think for themselves. It was but just that they should be placed on the same footing as the Europeans, and allowed to deal with their land as they thought was best for themselves, with ample protection afforded by legislation, and suitable reserves set apart for the different tribes. He could see no harm that would befall the Natives in dealing with the remainder. . . . The whole tenor of the legislation was to close up every avenue by which the Natives might be able to lease or sell their lands to persons outside the Government, and to place all power and authority over those lands in the hands of the State. The speaker urged upon his hearers to fight for justice, and show the powers that be that they (the Maoris) had reached a time when they could look after their own interests, and would not be placed in the position of infants or impotents; and, to do this, the most important step was to hold on to their lands, and, by strong pressure being brought to bear, have the Native Minister's nonsensical experiment obliterated and wiped out from among the laws of the land. . . . Again, he explained that, while the country was groaning under the burden of debt, the Government, instead of endeavouring to alleviate the trouble, retarded progress and kept out foreign capital by their selfish and blind tying-up of the land through their Native policy."

Once more, in the report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the subject of the Native land-laws, Mr. Carroll adds a special note, most truthful, logical, and interesting. He says,—

"Upon the question of the Crown resuming the right of pre-emption over lands owned by the Maoris, I cannot help feeling that such a step would be unwise and impolitic, while the legality itself of such a proceeding is, I believe, open to grave doubt. The Crown bases its title to land in New Zealand not on the right of discovery or conquest, but on the Treaty of Waitangi. By that Treaty the exclusive right of pre-emption over such lands as the Native proprietors might be disposed to alienate was yielded to Her Majesty, from the period of signing the Treaty of Waitangi until the sanction of Her Majesty was obtained to 'The Native Land Act, 1862': over twenty years that right remained in full force. Thus it will be seen that ample opportunity was afforded for testing the efficacy, wisdom, and justice of the prerogative so assured. In some vague way the Europeans have always regarded themselves as having an undefined reversionary interest in Maori lands; the Natives, on the other hand, have always failed to cordially acquiesce in the administration of their territorial estates by the various Governments that have from time to time controlled the destinies of New Zealand. And so, for the long stretch of time the Government retained the right of pre-emption over the Native lands, the period was fraught with many acts of injustice to the Natives. They called to mind the words used to them by Captain Hobson when the Treaty of Waitangi was signed—that the two races had become united under one Sovereign; but, in strange contradiction to this harmonious union, they saw millions of acres of their land passing from them, in some instances at $\frac{1}{4}$ d. an acre, secured nominally by the Government, but in reality for the more favoured subjects of Her Gracious Majesty. So unjust, indeed, were many of the Government purchases that they were condemned in Parliament by men holding exalted positions, and who were in every way capable of forming an unbiassed judgment."

I may here state that the honourable gentleman refers to private transactions between individuals and the Natives. He did not refer, as in his report on the Commission, to the fact that the Government also had a hand in some of the transactions that he names as a great injustice. Then he goes on,—

"Parliament at length was no longer able to conceal from itself that great wrongs upon the Native race were being perpetrated. It saw, as it expressed itself in the preamble to the Native Land Act passed at the time, that it would greatly promote the peaceful settlement of the colony and the advancement of the civilisation of the Natives if their rights to land were ascertained, and defined, and declared, and if the ownership of such lands when so defined and declared was assimilated as nearly as possible to the ownership according to British law. With a view of giving effect to the foregoing objects, Her Majesty waived in favour of the Natives so much of the Treaty of Waitangi as reserved to her the right of pre-emption over their lands. I entirely fail to understand how, as set forth in the preamble to the Act of 1862, the Government of New Zealand, having renounced the right of pre-emption over Native lands, can again acquire that prerogative without the assent of the Natives. Upon equitable grounds alone the Parliament should not attempt to regain the prerogative it abandoned about thirty years ago. Such a proceeding on the part of the Legislature would, in my opinion, intensify the mistrust the Native population too long have had in Colonial Governments. They would immediately discern an intention on the part of the Government to enrich the European colonists at the sacrifice of the territorial interests of the Maori subjects of the Queen. To the Native mind, unversed in the subtleties of the law, such a proceeding would be regarded by the present generation of Maoris as simply confiscation. They would feel themselves thrown back in the onward march of progress, hampered and shut out from the many advantages of civilisation that they now look so hopefully forward to, and regard as being within their reach. I think the resumption by the Crown of the pre-emptive right, restricting the Natives to but one market in which they could dispose of their lands, would retard instead of promoting the settlement of the country. Many of the more intelligent and prudent of the race are turning their attention to sheep-farming and stock-raising generally. They are possessed of the wholesome idea of becoming producers, and laudably desire to emulate their more experienced European neighbours in the art of agriculture and profitable stock-rearing. To attain this end, they fully recognise that it would be wise for them to dispose of such areas of their surplus lands as they are not likely to require for themselves, and from the disposal of such lands to obtain the necessary funds for clearing, fencing, and stocking the land retained for their own profitable occupation. With the Native mind running in this groove, dominated with the desire of becoming thoroughly useful settlers and adding to the productive powers of the colony, it may be reasonably expected that, with legislation of a judicious character afforded them such as will fairly meet their aspirations, little apprehension need exist as to their willingness to place the lands not needed for their own use in the public market. Evidence adduced before the Commission proved conclusively that where the Government interposed with its pre-emptive right, as was the case in the King-country, the Natives could not obtain a fair price for their land. The Government offered 3s. an acre: at the same time private purchasers were in constant communication with the owners, and willing to pay them £1 an acre. Need one wonder that a deadlock in Native-land transactions in that part of the country occurred? The inevitable result arising from such a condition of things is that, if the Natives cannot sell to the purchaser prepared to give them a larger sum than the Government, they will not sell at all; and it will be observed that not even the Treaty of Waitangi itself, or any law passed by Parliament, assumed the power of compelling the Natives to alienate their land. So that it comes to pass that large areas of excellent country, well adapted for settlement, remain locked up, because, forsooth, the Natives refuse to accept the 3s. an acre offered by the Government, when private parties are prepared to give them more than six times that amount. While still on the question of the pre-emptive right, perhaps I may be permitted to quote the words of Mr. Alfred Domett: 'In governing masses of men we must look upon a wrong really felt as a real wrong. It mattered not that on abstract principles of justice or theories it ought not to be considered a wrong: if it was really felt by them, then it must be treated as a real wrong. And this was the case with the Maoris, and their feeling about the Crown's right of pre-emption.' It is nearly thirty years since these words were uttered in the New Zealand Parliament, and they are as pregnant with truth now as they were then. Not only in regard to the exercise of the pre-emptive right should the Government interference with the Natives be avoided, but in many other respects. A race that has been in contact with the most civilised nation on earth during the past half-century, a race admittedly intelligent, and possessed of great territorial estates, may in reason be expected to have sufficient discernment to distinguish between governmental treatment properly and improperly bestowed."

With such an eloquent dissertation from such an authority before us, it would seem that the subject was exhausted; but it is not—there are other phases that require consideration. I have said that the proposed resumption by the Crown of the pre-emptive right was unjust; I now add that it is impolitic, and entirely opposed to the recognised policy of the present Government, wherein they claim, as the corner-stone to the colony's advancement, the opening-up of land for settlement. Let the pre-emptive right once again return to the Crown and so surely does land for settlement, in so far as Native land is concerned, receive its quietus. For the Natives will not sell their lands at the price offered to them by the Government. And, Sir, is it to be wondered at, judging by the past, and—yes, judging by the present? It is not too extravagant to say it is spoliation; it is, in fact, what might be expected from one holding letters of marque—a license to plunder. The speech which the honourable gentleman just now made is, in my opinion, very inconsistent. As to the quarter of a million proposed to be raised under this Bill for the purpose of buying Native lands, I think there is no need for any more borrowed money being used for this purpose. Past Governments and the present Government have been purchasing

Native land for a good many years. I fail to understand whether the Government are determined to open up these lands. If it is the intention of the Government to settle those lands as soon as the purchase is completed, I think it would be far better, and more in the interests of the colony, to adopt a different system from the present one. The way in which the purchase of Native land is being carried on at the present time I think is perfectly ridiculous. The colony will never receive even interest on the money which is thus spent. When do the Government intend to get this money back again? As far as I understand it, I do not think they will get it back again at all: if they do, it is in the far-distant future; and here we have the people of the colony groaning under the heavy burden of taxation, through no fault of theirs, but through the inconsiderateness of their Governments. It is merely throwing money away. The taxpayers of the colony have to pay interest on the money so expended, and I think every honourable member should gravely consider this matter, and reject the amount proposed to be borrowed for this purpose. If it were a matter of £50,000, as set out in the Acts now in force, there would not be a great deal of objection to a sum of that kind; but I do not think it is necessary that any Government should go in for the purchase of Native land. I think they should lease Native land. I think it is very unfair that honourable members should object to the disposal of Crown land, and then argue on the other side in favour of borrowing for the purchase of Native land. The Natives have every right to keep their land as far as possible; and, if they are not able to hold on to their land, it is the duty of their representatives in this House to try and bring forward a measure to prevent them from disposing of their land right out, and to urge Parliament to pass measures which will be of lasting benefit to the Natives. That would not retard settlement. I think something on the lines set out in "The Native Land Administration Act, 1886," is necessary in the way of Native-land legislation. I do not altogether agree with everything set out in that Act; but I think some measure on those lines would be more beneficial and satisfactory to the Natives, and it would also have the good result desired by every member of this House—namely, of settling the people on the land. The whole thing is set out in a Bill which was propounded by the Natives themselves at a meeting held at Gisborne a few months ago—I believe in April last. That Bill was introduced by the honourable member for the Eastern Maori District. I may inform the House that no Europeans had a hand in the propounding of that scheme; it was all Maori work. Such a Bill will not in any way retard settlement. The Bill recognises this Parliament and the Government to a certain extent: at the same time it sets out that the Natives themselves should have a greater voice in the administration of their lands, which is only fair. What I wish to contend is this: that if the aim of any measure brought before this House propounded

by the Natives themselves is to settle the Native land, and if that measure would be for the benefit of the colony as a whole, and for the benefit of the Natives, I do not think any Government which may be in power should ignore such a Bill. If this House tries to satisfy the Native mind, and takes the Natives into its confidence, it can easily get the Natives to work satisfactorily with the Government. Instead of, as at present, disturbances occurring, and obstruction being offered to surveyors, you would find the Natives working in harmony with the Europeans and the Government. There are some things here I wish to put before the House in reference to the different transactions between the Government of New Zealand and the Natives in their land-purchases. We have heard, in several cases, honourable members state that by allowing private individuals to deal with the Natives we should be doing that which in many cases would be a dangerous thing for the Natives, and also for the colony. What I wish to say is this: There have been several transactions between the Native and the Crown: I will quote a case in point, which was one of the most disgraceful purchases that were ever made by the Government from the Natives. I find, by looking up the old records, that the Natives were compelled to sell to the Crown for the sum of £25,000, and, by making inquiries, I find out that private individuals were willing to give the sum of £150,000 for the same block of land. I wish to say that it is not fair for any Government, or any Parliament, to pass any law that tends to deprive the Natives of their rights. I think the Natives should have every right in respect of the property they hold. I also agree with some of the statements made by honourable members, that where it is found now that private individuals will fairly buy the land open for purposes of selection a certain area should be named as the limit that may be acquired by private individuals. We have this in force in the Native Land Court Act of 1886. I think the area is set out there at six hundred acres. We could apply this to any Bill that is brought forward in respect to the buying of land from the Natives. But what I wish to urge upon the House is this: that the rights of the Natives should be recognised, and they should not be deprived of any of the privileges which are given the Europeans themselves. Now, there are several cases I could mention where the Government have actually offered 2s. or 8s. per acre, and where private individuals were prepared to give the Natives from 20s. to 30s. per acre for the same property. There is another point. I have here a cutting from the Auckland Herald, which I will read:—

"UNJUST GOVERNMENT DEALING WITH MAORI LANDS.

To the Editor.

"SIR,—I am the owner of two hundred acres of land within the Rohe Potae, at a place named Kakepuku, near Alexandra. I am offered £1 10s. per acre by Europeans for it, but cannot sell it to them, as the land is included within the Government Proclamation. Mr. Wilkinson, the Government agent, will only give 6s. per acre for it. I hear the Government are buying lands which they sold years ago to the pakehas, in the Middle Island, for £8 and £4 per acre. Why don't they give us the same price for our lands?—I am, &c.,

"TAKETIKA."

In conclusion, I wish to say this: that the remarks that fell from the honourable member for Waiapu are very inconsistent, and therefore it does not lead one to place any confidence at all in the administration of the present Government.

Mr. LANG.—It is not my intention to take up much of the time of the House at this hour, but, as this Bill is of considerable importance to the district I represent, I should like to say a few words on it. I think there is no measure to which we should attach greater importance than one to provide for the making of roads and bridges to open up for settlement the back-country. I may say that we cannot expect settlers to succeed if they have not the means of getting their produce to market. The difficulties of so many settlers arise from the fact that it is impossible for them to sell their stock or produce. A good deal has been said about clause 4, under which the Minister may allow persons to settle on Crown lands to improve the same. I think that is a very good clause, so long as proper regulations are made. I take it that by this the Minister intends to make it possible for people without capital to settle on the land, and to find work for them,—which, of course, means cash,—till they are in a position to get a return from the land. But there is one thing that should be guarded against, and that is, if the Government mean to pay a man the full value for clearing the bush, at the end of the time he might leave it and get another job elsewhere; and that would not be carrying out the intention of this clause. I think that such men should only be paid in cash to the value of half-wages in the first place, and the other half should be expended in paying for grass-seed, fencing, and other improvements. This would insure that none but bonâ fide settlers would take up land. Speaking to Part II. of this Bill, I may say that in my electorate there is a very large quantity of Native land. In one block there is an area equal in extent to a great many of the electorates of this colony. This land has remained unoccupied for a great many years, and I think that any one who approved of the Land for Settlements Bill cannot fail to vote for this measure, for this is superior, I think, in every way to the Land for Settlements Bill. These Bills have been compared, but I think they are very different, for the Land for Settlements Bill takes land from people who have the privilege of selling their land in the open market if they think fit, but the Native lands, at least those in the King-country, can still only be sold to the Crown. The Natives have not the privilege of having a voice in the valuing of their own land. I was very glad to hear the honourable member for Waiapu state that the Natives have been unfairly treated in the past, and I am sure I can bear that statement out from my own personal knowledge. I know a case in which only about a quarter of the price that could have been got for the lands if placed in the open market was offered by the Government. I think, so far as Native lands are concerned, it is altogether unnecessary to borrow money for the purpose of settling them, and I will endeavour to explain my views on that subject. If the Government were to sell the land they have acquired, and allow the Natives to have a free hand with their own land, the country would be settled in a very short time. That might easily be done in this way: The Government should act as agents for the sale of the land, and place the same conditions on it as on Crown lands, regulating the size of blocks that could be disposed of. I should like to give the opinion of a stranger on the way the Natives have been treated by the Government with regard to their land. To do that, I will read a small portion of a clipping from a newspaper. This is how it strikes an Australian:—

"An Australian, who has just made a trip into the King-country, sends an account of what he saw. One Maori chief whom he saw expressed himself as much annoyed that the Government had prevented him from selling land to Europeans. The Natives at that place had three acres cultivated, while they possessed miles of virgin land. Our correspondent then proceeds: 'The whole of the country I passed over was splendid limestone country, where no grass-seed has been planted, but here and there were patches of grass, the seed brought there evidently by horses. One can see how this grass is working the fern out and taking strong hold. . . . And all this great country doing no good to anybody! It struck me as very extraordinary that New Zealand should allow their Government to buy such a property as the Cheviot Estate, which would cost pounds per acre, whereas there are miles of grand country to be got for some shillings per acre. If the South Island is so thickly populated that there is no room for the people, why not open this country and send the Southerners up here? There is plenty of room without cramping the Native. Looking at the Cheviot Estate transaction, and seeing all the idle country south of Auckland, I can only put it down to a bid for political power, and it is a pity the North Island allows it. If the Government would allow the white man to deal with the Maori, holding the power of sanctioning all arrangements, there would be no such thing as the land-grabber getting in, and this country would soon be made remunerative to Government settlers and Maoris.'"

I may say the Government are very much to blame for not having done more to settle the Native lands. If they had used the same amount of energy in the North as they have used in the South the country would have been settled many years ago. Ten years ago the restrictions were placed on the land, and no settlement has taken place during that time, and, if things are going on in the same way, in all probability there will be none for the next ten years. But if the restrictions are taken off the land it will be settled in a very short time. It has been said that the Government have not acquired the land because they had not the means of doing so; but this is not correct, for they have not even expended all the money that they had at their disposal. If this Bill passes there will be no excuse then for Government not acquiring the land, and for that reason I shall support the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. PINKERTON.—At this late hour I shall not detain the House very many minutes. I had intended to speak somewhat on the merits of the Bill, but I shall now refrain from doing so. I should like, however, to make one or two remarks in connection with something that has been said, and to the point—to something that has been said not only to-night, but at other times and on other occasions. Up to the supper adjournment I think full approval of the Bill was expressed in the speeches made: there were only about four members who had offered anything like opposition to it. Those members were the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw), and the honourable the leader of the Opposition (Captain Russell); and then, later on, there was the honourable member for Patea. This is a measure dealing not only with the purchase of Native lands, but also with the disposal of them. As usual, the lease in perpetuity came in for some considerable attention. I dare say it is well known to members of the House who were here last Parliament that I was the only member on this side of the House who voted against the lease in perpetuity. I still believe, Sir, in revaluations; I have never changed my opinion on that; but I decline to be drawn into a lobby on any side-issue, or by persons who are doing this with ulterior motives. I shall not be drawn into the lobby at any time by anything of that kind, and if any attempt is made to do that sort of thing in connection with this Bill I shall be found voting against it. In 1892, when the Act was passed, I endeavoured to affirm that the principle of the lease in perpetuity was bad. I was defeated on that,—or, rather, the party with whom I voted were,—but I shall take another opportunity when the land-laws come up for amendment to vote so that the lease in perpetuity may be put out. At the same time, I very much question whether the lease in perpetuity or the perpetual lease is now the solution of the difficulty. We know that changes take place pretty frequently in ideas as to land-tenure. There was a time—not so very long ago—when no one thought of anything but a freehold; no one ever dreamed of anything but freehold. Then we had the land-nationalisation scheme propounded, and it went very freely all over the country, and was fully believed in by a great many persons, myself among the number. That shifted to what is known now as the single-tax, so warmly espoused by my honourable friend the member for Inangahua. But, after all has been said and done, there is another phase of the question coming along, and I am not sure but that it will be better than either of the last, and that is that the only right to land shall be the right to use it, and that whenever a person shall fail to use his land he shall have no right to keep it, and, if a person has two farms and leases one, that will be taken as sufficient evidence that he has more land than he can use, and has no right to have it. But, while that is so, I do not claim for one moment that the scheme we are now talking about carries with it anything like confiscation. The persons leasing the land have the right to purchase, and persons so purchasing will have also the right to pay a fair rate of interest. If a person has enough land it will be an incentive to him to improve it, and obtain for himself the right to own the land for all time with his successors on the understanding, of course, that they carry out the conditions imposed. That is no “fad” of mine; I am simply expressing what is now a phase of thought which perhaps before long may lead to a better solution of the land difficulty than either the lease in perpetuity or the perpetual lease. I have several other matters I shall pass over, but I wish to refer to the remarks the honourable member for Wanganui made as to his constituents. The honourable gentleman said that he was not afraid to face his constituents in regard to a borrowing policy. It would be amusing to know, and some day I shall take the trouble to find out, how many times the words “non-borrowing policy” and “non-borrowing Government” appear in the debates this session. They have been repeated so many times that they must occupy a considerable space in Hansard. The honourable gentleman said that he was not afraid to face his constituents re borrowing. I hope that no member in this House is afraid to face the electors for anything he has done here. I dare say the electors of Wanganui are like the electors in other towns, and are intelligent enough to know that when they send representatives to this House they send representatives—they do not send delegates merely; and I would refuse to come to the House as a delegate were I expected to do so. But there is another very refreshing thing. It is a very encouraging sign that we have certain persons who think they have sufficient brain-power not only for themselves to assist in everything that may be proposed—not only are they able to think for themselves, but they actually claim the right to think for other people too. Last Parliament we were told what would happen when we went back to our constituents. I was to be politically buried, and my coffin was ordered; but, notwithstanding this very large order, I am still here, and most of those who were loudest in prophetic utterances of this kind are not here now. So I think that, notwithstanding we may have men amongst us believing that they possess massive brains and giant intellect, and are able to guide the thoughts of others, they had better reserve their strength, because they may yet need it all. And those of us who may not be so fully gifted, and who may be unable to fully appreciate the good offices of these individuals, prefer to follow our own thoughts and take the consequences of our own acts, and have no wish to burden our friends with our shortcomings; and it may be that the country knows what we have been doing, and that, under the circumstances, we have nothing to fear there. I shall not refer to what was said regarding last Parliament, as some honourable gentlemen are aware that there was a great deal of that kind of thing. My coffin was once ordered, but I am still here; but the honourable members who made those statements are not here; and, as threatened men live long, I will simply advise honourable members who have brains enough to use for their own purposes to resent the motion. I would also say, in regard to the amendment of the honourable member for Inangahua, that, to be logical, he ought to follow up that amendment by proposing to confiscate all land—Native and European.

Mr. ALLEN.—I think the title of this Bill should be, "The New Zealand Half-million Loan Act, 1894," and that it should contain a clause repealing "The Government Loans to Local Bodies Act, 1891," because that Act provides already for the allocation of £50,000 a year for the roading of lands. The Bill should also contain a provision that these loans shall be ear-marked, and that this loan especially shall be ear-marked for the Minister of Lands for any purpose he thinks fit.

Mr. O'Regan's amendment negatived.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Sir, in rising to reply to the remarks made in connection with this Bill, I regret that it is only at such a late hour of the night, or early hour of the morning, that I have the opportunity to reply to the various statements made in connection with this measure, because there have been statements made that would deserve a great deal more attention than I can possibly give with the time at my disposal. I am sorry the honourable members who made these charges and statements are not present to hear what I have to say on the subject. It seems to me that some honourable members have not read the Bill. That is quite evident so far as the member for Inangahua is concerned, who moved the amendment which has just been disposed of, because, in reference to this particular Bill, the "betterment" system that the honourable member referred to is introduced so far as the lands which are to come under the Bill are concerned. I regret very much that the member for Inangahua is not here, because I have to say to him that it would be very much better that he should not allow himself to be flattered into the position of being made use of by members on that side of the House. If the honourable member for Inangahua expects to retain the respect of a large number of members of this House, I tell him quite plainly that he will have to alter his course in this Assembly. I hope he will go to the other side of the House, because that is the proper place for him. The honourable gentleman cannot claim to be a supporter of the Government. He last night voted for a no-confidence motion against the Government, and he moved the amendment this evening in a light and airy way quite like any schoolboy; and, if the honourable gentleman wishes to trot out this principle of his in connection with the single-tax on every conceivable occasion, then the members of this House will very soon get tired of his single-tax. We are quite prepared to give him one night every session to discuss such a measure, and to give him the whole night for himself, and then we shall see how many members he will be able to get to assist him. The honourable gentleman will be able to go throughout the colony during the recess; he will then have time to preach single-tax throughout the Colony of New Zealand, and to see if he can get some members of the present House to assist him; but the honourable member knows there is not a single member of Parliament who is prepared to support the single-tax, and that he should trot it out on every occasion is to me extraordinary. The honourable gentleman should have sufficient common-sense to see that he cannot hope to carry that tax in this House for fifty years to come, and if he wishes to get it carried in his lifetime he must take a very different course from what he is taking at the present time. I advise the honourable gentleman to consider the matter, and, if he finds any opinions on the other side of the House congenial to his views, probably that is the proper place for him. I come now to another honourable gentleman, the leader of the Opposition. I regret to say that he told us to-night that the Native policy of the present Government was pauperising the Natives; but I ask, does not the private purchase of Native lands throughout the colony go far more in the direction of doing that than the fact of the Government purchasing under proper conditions?

Captain RUSSELL.—No.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I say it does; and I say that matters have come under my knowledge during the time that I have been a Minister of the Crown in this colony which, if the daylight were properly thrown upon them, would reveal the fact that transactions of the most flagrant character have been carried out in the private purchase of land from the Natives. If you throw the Native lands open to applicants for private purchase there are lawyers in this City of Wellington who would have every acre in the Provincial District of Wellington in the next twenty years; they would be the owners: and on that account no private individual should be allowed to purchase Native lands. Why did the residents of Hawke's Bay purchase the whole of that beautiful country from the Natives? Why did they bleed the Natives, if it was a bad thing to do? The honourable member believes in the principle of the Bill, and so do all the people who oppose the Bill,—although they pretend to favour these principles while really opposed to them. Then, the honourable gentleman went on to say that the present Government have scattered the sovereigns throughout the colony, and scattered the credit of the colony and our securities all over the world. Yes, we have scattered our securities and our credit.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Hear, hear.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—We have scattered our credit and our financial policy all over the world, and it has brought home a beautiful result. Let me tell the House and the honourable member that we have received a telegram this morning from London showing the position of our bonds to-day. Our 4-per-cent. bonds now stand at 109 and 109½; so that, in scattering our securities and our sovereigns all over the world, we are bringing good to the Colony of New Zealand. We find our 8½-percents standing at 102½ and 102¾, and a dividend was paid only a month ago. That is the position they stand in at the present moment in the London market; that is the result of our Financial Statement; and I think we have not anything to be ashamed of, and nothing to deplore, so far as the credit of the colony is concerned. Let me now refer to another gentleman, whom I am glad to see here, because I have something to say to him. I refer to the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button). For a long time I have not heard the honourable gentleman speak, but to-night we had a speech from him of the good old Tory style. We are not used to that sort of thing from that side of the House, although we know they are all Tories, of course, but they are afraid to express their opinions in the same bold manner as the honourable member for Auckland City did to-night. But I am told that the honourable gentleman was inspired to-night by the presence in the House of the secretary of the National Association, and so he made the speech he did. The honourable gentleman said, "We do not object to the principle of the Bill, but we object to the Bill itself." Then, again we had this "bad drafting" trotted out. Of course, whenever a lawyer gets up in this House he condemns the drafting.

Mr. BUTTON.—I never referred to drafting.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I took down the statement the honourable gentleman made in his speech, which was to the effect that the principle of the Bill was right enough, but the Bill itself was all wrong, and was not properly drafted. What is the principle the honourable gentleman would like to see carried out in all measures in this colony for the purchase of land from the Natives? He told us the proper principle was to sell all the land, as soon as possible after being bought by the Crown, to those who can pay cash for the same,

1.30. and not to allow labourers to get on it, but only those who are supplied with capital.

That is the principle of the honourable gentleman. We have had a lot of these people with capital: and what would they do? They would lead us to another financial catastrophe such as we narrowly escaped the other day. They buy for cash, and borrow the cost of improving the land, and get themselves into debt. We believe that more settlers can be got on the land by leasing the land to them, and assisting them to get on to it by our system. When the honourable gentleman disapproves of these people he calls labourers, and says they are not fit to go on the land and make good settlers, I tell him that if he will go with me I will bring under his notice farm after farm owned by men who came to this colony twenty-five years ago merely as labourers. Those men are in many cases in a good position to-day, and are quite able, many of them, to buy a portion of the Globo Assets estates when sold. Then, we had trotted out to-night by the honourable gentleman the Land for Settlements Bill and the advances to settlers, although these things have nothing at all to do with the Bill now under consideration. Why did the honourable gentleman refer to them? He told us how much each settler on the Cheviot cost us, and how much each settler would cost us under the Land for Settlements Bill, and then he made a calculation as to the cost of each settler under the Advances to Settlers Bill. He ought to make a further computation,—and no one is more competent than he to do it, because, I understand, he is the legal adviser of the Bank of New Zealand. He might have told the House how much each of the thirteen hundred shareholders of that institution gained by having that bank backed by the colony. Was that done to save the bank or the pockets of its shareholders? Not at all. It was done to save the colony. Nor does the Government, in making advances to settlers, or in proposing this measure, intend to benefit private individuals, but the benefit is for the people of the colony as a whole. In the action which the Government took in connection with the Bank of New Zealand, by which we backed the interests of the thirteen hundred shareholders of that institution to the tune of £1,539 each, did we do that in the interests of the shareholders? No; we did it to save the colony from the catastrophe which the failure of the bank would have occasioned. The honourable gentleman should not have overlooked that two-million guarantee to the Bank of New Zealand, of which, I understand, he is the legal adviser. Now I have something to say to the honourable member for Patea. The honourable gentleman handled this Bill very skillfully, from his point of view, but I am quite sure he had not read the measure when he started to speak, but before he finished, owing to the information I was able to give him, he certainly was able to get some grasp of the Bill. The first mistake he made was in saying that we did not keep a separate account of land purchased from the Natives. The honourable member for Marsden fell into the same error. Now, I find that I laid on the table, on the 12th July, a return showing the whole of the land-transactions and of the land purchased from the Natives up to the present time. He will find there each year's transactions, and the amount of money that has been expended. The honourable gentleman very skillfully trotted out to the House the amount of money to be spent under the Native Land Purchases Act, but he did not tell the House how many acres of land were purchased by the Crown during that time. You will find here that during last year the colony was able to buy over 350,000 acres. I think the expenditure last year upon land bought from the Natives was something like £80,000. Now, included in that amount is the price of the Awarua Block, and the Awarua Block has an area of somewhere about 142,585 acres, which we purchased from the Natives. Will the honourable gentleman say this is a loan, and that the colony is not to receive any result from that purchase—that the money spent is to become an addition to the permanent debt of the colony, and the colony will have to pay interest on the money? I venture to say that for that Awarua Block we could get to-morrow £300,000, and yet it only cost us £80,000; so that the colony could now make £120,000 on that purchase; and when we have roaded and bridged it, and put people upon it, it will yield a large profit. On this subject, I may say that to a large extent the settlers in the South Island will not participate under these two Bills. But we have got the Land for Settlements Bill for the South Island, and we thought it only right that the North Island should, as a quid pro quo, get this Bill for the purchase of Native lands. Then, in the £250,000 for roads and bridges both Islands will participate. There are some places which will not participate to such an extent as others—Canterbury, for instance, which was referred to by the honourable member for Kaiapoi (Mr. Buddo) this evening. I am very sorry for the attitude he took up, because I have always looked upon him as one of those members who brought a good deal of common-sense to the House. But had the same rule been applied to Canterbury in the early days that some members wish now to apply to this Island, had the people there been called on to make their own roads and bridges, they would not have the roads and bridges they have at the present time. Did they not get for very many years the whole of the Land Fund for that purpose? And, after the Land Fund was abolished so far as the provinces were concerned, did they not get millions of money spent upon public works? Some road districts there received more money in one year than we now ask for the whole colony. Put a number of settlers on the Awarua Block to-morrow, and give them the proceeds of the block, and I venture to say they would not come to the House for one penny for roads and bridges. We must distribute the money to the best advantage for the colony. I must come now to the two honourable members for Wellington City, and I regret very much to notice that neither of them is now in the House. Both of them condemned the Bill; yet there are no people more directly interested in the purposes of the Bill than the constituency of Wellington, which those two honourable gentlemen represent, because a large portion of the land to be purchased from the Natives will be land in this provincial district, and a large proportion of the amount to be spent on roads and bridges will be spent in the Wellington District. Does not the putting of hundreds of settlers on the Crown lands of Wellington benefit the City of Wellington, which those honourable gentlemen represent? Do they want us to leave them without roads and bridges? Now I come to the question of what is improvement on land. The honourable the senior member for Wellington City, and also the middle member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell), told us what were improvements on land. I have this to say to honourable members: No doubt the felling of bush, the burning of bush, and the grassing of land are all improvements; but all these improvements put on a block of land, without the means of improving it further, would be valueless to the country. Roads to a piece of land add more to its value than anything you can do to the land. We have members in this House, apparently, who do not want settlement, and who do not want roads. These honourable gentlemen, possibly, would be quite satisfied to dispose of the Awarua Block in ten-thousand-acre blocks. If we must do so, I have no doubt the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button) will find us six or seven gentlemen who would buy the block, and they would be quite satisfied to pay for it much more than the money it has cost us. That would be a capital thing for them, but it would be a very bad thing for the colony. Instead of affording homes for hundreds of thriving settlers, it would be given over to sheep, and all the improvements would consist of a very little bit of roading to the nearest woolshed, to allow them to get their wool to market. That is not what we want. We want settlers there, and we want to settle them on two-hundred-acre allotments if possible, and in areas up to three- and four-hundred-acre allotments. To do that demands roads, because each man requires the means of getting to and from his section, and if he has not that means the land is of no value to him. That is the difference between our policy and the policy which those honourable gentlemen would go in for if they had the opportunity. Then, we were told that the lands purchased under this Bill from the Natives would not pay interest on the cost or sinking fund to repay the loan. But honourable members must see that the whole of the rents derived from the lands to be purchased from the Natives will be paid into the consolidated revenue. All land purchased by this Government will well pay the colony for its purchase; and when critics go over the money spent in that way—£50,000 a year, or whatever it may be—since we took office, it will be found that the colony has got full value for it in the shape of land. No one can say that is borrowing such as previous Governments have gone in for. With reference to the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), when his Government was in office did not his Government borrow? Why, they borrowed for the district railways. I have a return here of what they cost. In the year 1886 the Stout-Vogel Government borrowed £188,300 for the purpose of buying district railways; and in 1887, £166,187: making a total of £354,487 with which to buy district railways. Can you believe for one moment that these railways were worth 20s. in the pound on the price we paid for them? Are they paying interest? A number of them are not paying the grease used on the wheels of the trucks running over them. We have no interest from them, and the railways themselves are not worth the money the colony paid. When we find that the honourable gentleman, when in office, went in for borrowing money with which to buy rotten district railways, instead of leaving the large landowners with these white elephants—

An Hon. MEMBER.—Did you not support it?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I do not remember at the present time; possibly I did.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh!

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—But, Sir, that is nothing. It does not matter how I voted; I was not responsible by occupying a position on these benches at the time. I should not say anything about the district railways to-night were it not for the fact that an honourable gentleman who was in office at that time and borrowed so largely himself accuses the present Government of "borrowing, borrowing, borrowing for everything." Honourable gentlemen on that side of the House may, of course, say it is borrowing. But if we are to consider it as borrowing—which, like my colleague the Premier, I do not admit,—if honourable members of this House choose to insist that it is borrowing—then I say it is borrowing for a good purpose, and a very different one altogether from previous borrowing carried on in this colony. Then, we had the usual tirade from both honourable members for Wellington City as to the drafting of the Bill. Now, I will tell the House a story as to the drafting of a Bill. Honourable members must not think that I drafted this Bill. I do not pretend to be a legal draftsman myself. All I can do is to give the principles I wish to be embodied to some one else, who drafts the Bill; and I believe this Bill is as well drafted as any of the lawyers in this House could draft it. Well, the other day I wanted a certain clause drafted in a way that I thought would be acceptable. I gave the same subject to three different lawyers in Wellington, and I requested them to draft a clause for me, but I did not tell any of them that I had given it to the others. Well, I got the three clauses drafted by the three different lawyers, and I took them to a fourth lawyer—a member of this House—and asked him what he thought of them. He replied that it was the same subject, only put in different language. They were done by three different draftsmen, but the object can be attained by either of them. The form of drafting is a question of taste entirely. One man drafts in one way, and another in another way. Then, when we get a Bill down here, the senior member for Wellington City finds fault with the drafting of it, and the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell) finds fault with the senior member for Wellington City. Then, the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button) finds fault with the drafting of them both. As I said, it is impossible to draft a Bill to please every member having different views. I have a great many notes here, that I shall not have time to refer to to-night; but I must say one or two words in connection with the Bill itself. Honourable members will see that clause 5 entirely provides for these improved-farm settlements. This House last year voted a sum of £3,000 for the purpose of carrying out this class of settlement, and we found, after all, that we had not power to carry out what the House desired. What we want is to be able to say to a number of working-men, "You go and clear the bush, and improve the place, and you will be able to get a section of land there." If you take away that power we shall be in the position of sending the men there with their wives and families, and, when they have improved the land, we cannot give them the sections, because we have no power to give them priority of choice, with the result that a man may be sent there to do this work and carry out all the improvements without any guarantee that he will get a section of land he has himself improved. That is the whole object of this clause. Then, Sir, we are told to look at the handle of corruption this would place in the hands of the Minister of Lands. Well, I am beginning to think that those people who are continually looking out in the different Bills for some corrupt objects must be very corrupt themselves. I say, if you have to tie a man down by Act of Parliament to keep him pure, then that man should not be here, because I venture to say that any Minister sitting on these benches has any amount of opportunity of corruption under the Acts at the present time, and if a Minister is not sufficiently honest without being tied down by Acts of Parliament he should not be here at all. But if honourable members will only read this through they will see that there can be no corruption about the matter at all. The land is to be disposed of under Part III. of the Land Act, and the improved value will be added by the Land Board, and the Land Board will work the whole of the business in connection with the Minister of Lands; and if this is not passed you will have to stop this class of settlement. The Bill will then have to be thrown out, and there can be no improved farm-settlement such as is going on at the present time. We have now three or four of them going on since the Act was passed last session, and one of them is so far advanced that there is already a school there. We got the men to go there with their wives and children, and they commenced work the very next day, on the assurance that they were clearing the land for themselves. Unless you give them that assurance you cannot get them to go. They are not going there for two or three months' work, unless you assure them that they will get a section when they have improved the land. If members are not prepared to give this power to the Minister of Lands, then they must put somebody else in my place in whom they will have more faith; but I venture to say that any Minister without this power will be quite useless, and unable to carry out the wishes of the House. If honourable members wish any improvement to be made in the clause to make the Bill more clear, then they can propose it in Committee; but to do away with it altogether would simply mean that this class of settlement could not be carried out. With regard to the proviso in section 9, a great deal has been made out of that. The position is this: Members will be asked to vote this £250,000 when the estimates come down; and, if they are not prepared to vote the money, then it will have to come out of consolidated revenue, and that means that there will be less money for roads, schools, and other public works. If members are prepared to raise the taxation of the country to make these roads and bridges without such provision as here provided, the Government will no doubt be prepared to comply with their views on this matter. If they are not prepared to do that, they must pass this Bill.

The House divided on the question, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Bill read a second time.

Mr. PARATA explained that he had called for a division to test the feeling of the House. He had voted with the "Noes," though he had intended his vote to go with the "Ayes."

Mr. O'REGAN, by way of personal explanation, said there appeared to be an impression amongst some honourable members that he had been put up to move the amendment that evening. It had been said that he had been put up by the honourable member for Patea, the honourable member for Auckland City

(Mr. Button), and by the senior member for Wellington City. He desired to remove that erroneous impression. He hoped honourable members would take his word that he was responsible to none but himself for the action he had taken.

The House adjourned at two o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, 24th September, 1894.

Bank of New Zealand and Colonial Bank—Government Advances to Settlers Bill—Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

BANK OF NEW ZEALAND AND COLONIAL BANK.

Mr. WARD.—Sir, before you call on the orders of the day I wish to ask the leave of the House to lay upon the table the correspondence which has passed between the Government and the representatives of the Bank of New Zealand and the Colonial Bank in connection with the amalgamation proposals which were forwarded by those two institutions to the Government. A printed copy of the correspondence will be placed in the hands of honourable members at once. I should like, while asking leave of the House to lay the correspondence on the table, to state, in the first place, that the terms of the communications which have passed between the Government and the two banks have been unanimously arrived at by the Government. I further desire to say that the idle rumours which have been current outside, to the effect that there have been strained relations between the Premier and myself in connection with this important matter, are entirely without foundation. To show the untruthfulness of those rumours, we have not even had a dispute on the question. There has not only been no diversity of opinion between him and me, but the Government have been in perfect accord upon this important matter; and I may say that the Government have unanimously arrived at the conclusions which are embodied in the memorandum which I now desire to lay upon the table of the House. I wish also to take this opportunity of saying that, while honourable members naturally have been anxious that an investigation should be made into the affairs of these institutions, I think it will be seen from the correspondence how difficult or how impossible it would have been to have had this matter, as has been suggested, referred to any Committee—whether the Public Accounts Committee or any other Committee—before the Government had dealt with it. The responsibility in an important matter such as this is devolved upon the shoulders of the Government; and to have intercepted the action, if any, which the Government might recommend to the House, and in reference to which the Government was collecting information before we arrived at a decision,—to have intercepted our judgment or conclusions by the reference of an important matter such as this is to a Committee,—would simply have been, if the Government had assented to it, asking the House to place a buffer between the Government and the country. I need not state that this has been a very important and a very difficult matter for the Government to deal with. We have endeavoured to obtain such information as would guide us to reasonable conclusions, and, having got that information, it was necessarily impossible in a day or two to have so fully considered matters as to be able to place the information before the House. I may say that, while the Government recognise all the advantages which would accrue to this colony by the amalgamation, if it could be brought about, we took up the position that the first consideration for the Government to weigh was, What was best in the interests of the colony? And, in that respect, it will be seen by the replies which have been communicated to both institutions that we regarded it as essential, and placed it in the first consideration, that the interests of the colony should be conserved and safeguarded before everything else. I merely now desire to say that the correspondence will disclose the fact that the proposals which have been made to the Government by the two banks have been regarded by the Government in some essential features as not being of a character to warrant our assenting to some of them. I have no further remark to make than this: that I hope honourable members, when they see what has been done by the Government, will give the Government credit for doing what on a former occasion I pointed out they intended doing—namely, acting in this matter in what they believed to be for the best interests of the colony. I move, That the papers do lie upon the table.

THIRD READING.

Gisborne Harbour Bill.

LABOUR BILLS COMMITTEE.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG, in moving the motion standing in his name, said he thought it would commend itself to members of the Council. They already had in another place a Labour Bills Committee, which went over all the labour Bills previous to their coming before the Council; and some of the witnesses who were examined before the Committee in another place, and spent a number of days before that Committee, and were desirous also of coming before the Council, were put to much trouble and inconvenience owing to that Committee not being a joint one. If this motion were carried the result would be a saving of time and expense, and it would also have the advantage that the promoter of the Bill would be present, and would be able to throw some light on questions that at present gave the Council a considerable amount of difficulty to determine.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That, in the opinion of this Council, it is desirable that the Labour Bills Committee should be a Joint Committee; and that the necessary steps be taken to give effect to this expression of opinion."—(Hon. Mr. RIGG.)

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN said there was more than one consideration which arose in this matter. It was quite true that in many cases it was advisable that there should be a Joint Committee on important Bills, and that it would save considerable time and trouble. But he held that this particular class of Bills should not be relegated to a separate Committee in future for ever. A tendency had grown up to call a certain number of Bills labour Bills, and to treat them as separate from anything that would benefit the community at large; and this seemed to him most mischievous. He thought all Bills should be dealt with as affecting the interests of all. A particular Bill might require a special Committee, and in that case should be referred to one; but it was a mischievous thing to classify a certain amount of legislation as legislation affecting the interests of only one part of the community. It was creating a feeling which ought not to exist—that the interests of the different parts of the community were at variance with those of others—and he thought a great deal of the mischief and evils that were now occurring in the country arose out of that misconception. It might have been well intended originally, and possibly when these Bills first came down there was some reason for relegating a certain number to one particular Committee; but he hoped that the nomenclature of "labour Bills" would not be perpetuated, and that no sort of Bills would be branded with a particular stamp, and sent to a specially-constituted Committee, as if we had different classes of people, whose interests must necessarily clash with one another.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI did not see that they would gain anything by having a Joint Committee on Labour Bills any more than a Joint Waste Lands Committee, a Joint Local Bills Committee, or any other. He would ask the mover of the motion whether he was himself satisfied with the Bills that came up from the other Chamber, or whether the Council had not always to rectify them. They were sent up from the other Chamber in an imperfect state, and when they came to the Council the Council devoted a great deal of time and attention on the Committee to try to make the best of them. If there was a Joint Committee on these Bills there ought to be Joint Committees on all other Bills. He would therefore oppose the motion.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE would like to say that all progress in parliamentary life was the result of compromise, and it was only by an elaborate system of sifting that they could arrive at what was really in the interests of any particular class or section of the community. The method of having separate Committees for each House best served the end sought, and the interests of all sections of the community were thus best served. He admitted for himself—and he had been in the Council for over twenty years—that, no matter how long they might take in the consideration of measures involving any fundamental principle, he never, at the end of the session, was thoroughly satisfied that he had really done the very best by the measure that was possible. It must be remembered that their legislation was nearly always more or less experimental. Their intention was clear enough, their willingness to effect reform was admitted, and the uniform desire to do the best was a quality that was constant amongst them. But the difficulty of eliminating from measures the non-essential, and seeing clearly where the point of practical interest lay, was very great. Under these circumstances he thought his honourable friend would not gain anything by having his motion carried. He admitted that, on the surface, it would appear as though there was a great deal to be gained in the saving of time and the loss of friction. But it must be remembered that friendly friction was a means by which they arrived at the best results. On the whole, it would be better to proceed by the ordinary rule which had hitherto guided them, and if at the end of their deliberations they succeeded in doing material service he would be satisfied, because very often the result of their best efforts was not in the best interests of the country.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG said the objections taken to the motion were not really against a Joint Committee, but rather against having a separate Labour Bills Committee—in other words, having such a Committee at all. He did not anticipate the discussion taking this form when he moved his motion, so that he assumed that, supposing they were to have a Labour Bills Committee at all, it was desirable that it should be a joint one. He thought that was a fair assumption, considering that no argument had been adduced against the Committee being a joint one. As regarded the necessity for a Labour Bills Committee, the Hon. Mr. Bowen had opposed the present Committee, but had told them it was desirable to have special Committees to deal with special subjects.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Special Bills.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG said that was exactly the position. These Bills were special Bills and required special knowledge to understand them. It was to deal with these very Bills that special appointments had been made to the Council: so that the whole contention brought forward against the constitution of the Labour Bills Committee was altogether in favour of it. That being so, he trusted that the Council would see its way to agree to the motion, and that they should have a Joint Committee, for the reasons he had given.

INSPECTION OF MACHINERY BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said the object of this Bill was a very simple one. At present the Act was, and had been for the last few years, administered under the Commissioner of Trade and Customs, and it was now proposed to transfer the administration to the Minister for Public Works. The other point in the Bill was the granting of certificates to men at present engaged in the working of machinery, such as traction-engines and other classes of machinery. Experts would say that it required much more skill to drive a traction-engine than an ordinary railway-engine. He was not in a position to say whether it was so or not; but it seemed probable, seeing that in the one case the engine had to be driven over an uneven track, while in the other case it ran over smooth rails; and, at any rate, the object was to give certificates to men engaged in work of this character after the passing of the necessary examination. Complaint had been made that the employment of inexperienced persons to drive these engines was very dangerous, and that the person driving them ought to pass an examination; and for this purpose a Board of Examiners was to be set up. This was the object of the Bill, and he now begged to move, That the Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND said this Bill appeared, on the face of it, to a large extent, to bear hardly upon country settlers. In the country they did all sorts of work by machinery on farm-stations, and in bush settlements much work was done by steam, and it was a kind of work that was attended with very little risk to life or danger of accident, and might be done by fairly-skilled persons, who might not be able to pass such an examination as was here set forth. It was not prescribed, as far as he could see, what the examination was to be; and that was the difficulty. He put it to his honourable friend that at present at these establishments any intelligent man could learn in a very short time to drive an engine for the purpose of cutting up firewood on a farm, for crushing corn for horses to eat, or any other food; and if they were compelled to obtain the services of an engineer for work of this character it might be extremely difficult. At any rate, there was nothing prescribed to show what was the class of examination these persons had to pass, and, he took it, it was meant that the person employed for the purpose should be an engineer. If that were so, he simply said this Bill would be a very great incumbrance and difficulty in the way of persons who used these engines for all sorts of purposes on farms, stations, and such places.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY quite agreed that there was very great necessity for an examination for drivers of locomotives or large engines, in order to insure protection of life and property; but to apply it generally seemed to him to be absurd. So far as concerned the class of engines employed on farms or dairies, an ordinary farm-labourer, with a week's instruction, would be competent to take charge of an engine. Now, this man might not be able to pass such an examination as was intended; he might be required to know all the properties of steam, and to have all the theoretical knowledge connected with the working of steam-engines. That was surely not required for the working of engines generally in use upon farms. They might as well say that before a man should be allowed to drive a horse he must be a professional anatomist or a veterinary surgeon, and have a thorough knowledge of the bodies of animals. He saw no definition in the Bill of what knowledge was required from candidates for examination. If it was meant that a candidate was simply to have a knowledge of the practical working of an engine, that was quite right and proper, and any person of ordinary intelligence would pass such an examination; but if he had to pass an examination as to the properties of steam, and to show theoretical knowledge of mechanical powers, it would be impossible for persons who ordinarily drove such engines to do so; and this would prove a great drawback to the persons using these engines, and would certainly tend to limit their use.

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON did not see that the Bill went so far as the Hon. Mr. Ormond supposed. It appeared to him that it was mainly intended for the protection of life. The main section of the Bill was section 4, which said,—

"Every person employed or acting in the capacity of engine-driver who is in charge of any engine or machinery in which steam, water, or air is used, or any two of them, as a motive-power, by means of which respectively persons are brought up or passed down or along any shaft, pit, or inclined plane or level in any mine or coal-mine, . . ."

Surely it would be proper to insist upon a certificate being obtained for purposes like that; and the only other occupation was that in which any engine was propelled "or moved from place to place by its own motive-power and machinery"; and, he took it, this simply referred to engines that were driven upon the public roads, and he thought it was necessary that capable men should be in charge of these engines, so as not to endanger the lives or limbs of the travelling public. Of course the subjects of the examination were not prescribed in the Bill, and he did not see very well how the details of the examination could be prescribed in the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN noticed that clause 6 gave the Governor the power to make regulations. It said,—

"The Governor may from time to time, by Order in Council, make, alter, or revoke regulations prescribing how and under what circumstances engines used for agricultural purposes only may be driven by uncertificated persons."

It would therefore be a great deal at the discretion of the Government, and they might be trusted not to do anything that would injuriously affect the public interest.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said that was the intention.

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON said that, in reference to the Hon. Mr. Ormond's objection, he thought clause 6 would meet any such case as mentioned. It might be true that any intelligent man could drive an engine used for agricultural purposes, but it was also true that at the present time a large number of traction-engines and the engines used on farms were a source of danger through the utter inexperience of the men taking care of them; and the farmers themselves ought to agree that something like this was necessary. A certificate could be very easily got by the person desiring it simply going before the Chief Inspecting Engineer of Machinery. It was a very necessary matter to compel these men to get certificates, and he thought the farmers themselves, as a matter of safety and economy, ought to be pleased at this regulation.

Bill read the second time.

SCHOOL-ATTENDANCE BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY, in moving, That this Bill be now read the second time, said this was a short Bill of considerable importance, the object of which was to make attendance at schools more regular, and to provide that children who were now without instruction should have the means of instruction placed within their reach. The first paragraph of clause 3 said,—

"Subject to the provisions of the principal Act, every child between the age of seven years and the age of thirteen years is hereby required to attend some public school at least six times a week, morning attendances and afternoon attendances being separately counted."

So that six times a week meant attendance on three days of the week. He thought it would be considered that it was only right that that extent of attendance should be exacted from them. Then, there was the proviso:—

"Provided that this section shall not apply to any child whose place of residence is more than two miles from the nearest public school, the distance being measured by the shortest road, or who cannot conveniently reach a public school by railway."

The first part of the subsection was in accordance with the Act now in force, but the last part was new. Free railway passes were given to these children, so that with these free passes those children who lived at a distance of more than two miles away on a line of railway could reach the school. Then, the next paragraph was in accordance with the Act—namely, that referring to examinations. He would read it:—

“Provided also that the parent of any child may apply for and receive a certificate from the School Committee of the district in which such child resides, exempting such child from attendance in whole or in part at school, upon satisfying the School Committee of the existence of any one of the following grounds, namely:—

- “(1.) That the child is under efficient and regular instruction elsewhere:
- “(2.) That the child is unable to attend school by reason of sickness, danger of infection, temporary or permanent infirmity, or other unavoidable cause:
- “(3.) That the road between the child's residence and the school is not sufficiently passable:
- “(4.) That one of the Inspectors or the headmaster of any public school has, by writing under his hand, certified that the child has reached a standard of education prescribed by any regulations under the principal Act as the standard of exemption.”

This was in the Act. Then, clause 4 defined “parent” to include the guardian and householder in whose family a child resides. Clause 5 was a re-enactment of the present law, except that the word “may” was changed to “shall.” It would read in this way:—

“The School Committee of the district in which such child resides shall give the parent of such child notice in writing, in the form or to the effect of the Schedule hereto, calling upon such parent to send such child to school; and if such parent, after receiving such notice, refuses or neglects to send such child to school, such parent shall be summoned before any Stipendiary Magistrate, or any two Justices of the Peace, who shall order such parent to send such child to a public school.”

That was the alteration in clause 5. Clause 6 was in accordance with the Act. Clause 7 was a new clause, namely,—

“When any child required by this Act to attend a public school has been enrolled in the register of a public school, and being in good health does not attend at least six times in any week in the course of which the school is open nine times, the parent of such child shall be liable to a penalty of 2s. for every such week in which such child shall have attended less than six times: Provided that proceedings for the recovery of any penalty incurred by reason of insufficient attendance during any part of any month cannot be instituted except during that month or during the next following month.”

It would be a great hardship to allow months to elapse before the offence, if it was an offence, could be judged in a Court and a penalty enforced. Then, the 8th clause dealt with penalties: “All proceedings for orders to send children to school and for recovery of penalties under this Act may be had and taken in the manner prescribed by ‘The Justices of the Peace Act, 1882.’” The 9th clause stated that any person appointed by the Education Department as truant officer might conduct prosecutions on behalf of the School Committee. That would not prevent the Committees from doing it themselves, as the Committees could do it, and did it now. It was an addition. The 10th section was a re-enactment of a clause in “The Education Act 1877 Amendment Act, 1885.” Then, clause 11 stated—

“Every penalty recovered under this Part of this Act shall be paid by the Clerk of the Court to the School Committee of the district in which such penalty is recovered, and shall thereupon become part of the School Committee Fund.

“This provision shall be deemed to be a sufficient appropriation of any money recovered as aforesaid, and a sufficient authority to the Clerk of the Court for making the payments aforesaid.”

He wished to have an alteration in this clause—namely, that the words “of the district in which such penalty is recovered” be struck out, and these words inserted in their place: “at whose instance the prosecution has been made.” Then, there was an important clause in Part II. It was very necessary; and from what he knew of the Maori children, and the means of education placed at their disposal, he thought they should be compelled to attend school just the same as the children of Europeans were. Part II. therefore dealt with compulsory attendance at Native schools; and clause 12 provided that the following expressions should have these meanings assigned to them:—

“‘Native school’ means and includes any school carried on as a school for native Maoris and half-castes under the direct control of the Minister of Education:

“‘Committee’ means a Committee for a Native school elected under any regulations from time to time prescribed by the Minister of Education for the conduct of Native schools:

“‘Chairman’ means the person from time to time elected by a Native School Committee as Chairman of such Committee.”

Then, clause 13 stated,—

“Every Native or half-caste child who, if not a Native or half-caste, would be required by this Act to attend a public school shall attend a Native school at least six times a week, subject to the same provisos and conditions as to exemption and penalty, and in all other respects, as are expressed in the First Part of this Act, except as follows:—

“(1.) The functions assigned by this Act to Primary School Committees shall be performed by the Committee.

“(2.) Prosecutions on behalf of the Committee shall be conducted by the Chairman.

"(3.) Penalties recovered shall be paid to the Public Account and be placed to the credit of the vote for Native schools.

"(4.) The passing of the Fourth Standard of the Native School Code shall be a sufficient ground for issuing a certificate of exemption."

He would move at the proper time to strike out the word "primary" in subsection (1), because it was not necessary. Then, there was the schedule, which was merely a formal thing. He thought this Bill was very much needed, and that its provisions were an improvement on the present law. He himself had considered, for very many years, that something in this direction in education matters was required. He had considered that there was a necessity for some more drastic measure than they had had; but, then, there was an objection in the way, which he had recognised to be very strong. He had thought that the mode of proceeding should be this: that the school should be open to the inspection of the police, and if the schoolmaster found that there were any children not attending school—some of those on the roll—according to the Act, he should immediately notify to the police that such and such a child was not attending. Instead of that, the Act originally passed left a great deal to the Committees. Now, the members of Committees did not like to prosecute their neighbours—they did not like to take the initiative; and so he would place the initiative on the police. People did not like a policeman to come up to their doors, especially in the country districts, where every one knew his neighbours' business rather better than the person himself; and, if they saw a policeman coming to any one's door, they would think something was "up." Under the circumstances, he thought this was the best Bill they could bring forward.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN said the question of compulsory school-attendance was a very delicate one, and had been very difficult to deal with from the first. There were a large number of children, as they knew, especially in populous places, whose parents, from selfishness or profligacy, neglected their education; but, on the other hand, it was considered a very dangerous thing to make the educational system distasteful and even hateful to parents, especially where they were obliged, through family exigencies, to keep their children from school. It was a very difficult question, and the clauses referring to it in the Act of 1877 were a compromise between those who were anxious to have compulsory clauses at all risks and those who thought there might be considerable danger in the matter, especially on the first introduction of a national system of primary education. He had looked forward to the Bill with some anxiety, but he was bound to say he did not see, as the Bill came before them, any marked difference between the law as it stood, and that now proposed. There was a marked change in the law proposed by the Bill as introduced in another place, which he was glad to see the good sense of the representatives of the people had rejected, and that was the provision taking the administration of the compulsory clauses away from local Committees. If there was anything a local Committee ought to see to more than another it was this question. Who knew the circumstances of their neighbours better than the local Committees? Certainly not the Education Boards. And it was not a question only of insisting on education, or of providing against neglect, but a question of inquiring into and appreciating the circumstances under which children were attending school. He knew cases where it was far better morally for the child to be kept from school to help a destitute parent than to be sent to school and leave his parent in absolute indigence. There were cases of this sort which ought to be considered, and there could be no doubt that the local Committee was the body to best consider them. He did hope, whatever might be done about education, they would never allow any interference with the local element in the system. There was always a strong tendency towards centralisation in education as in other matters. It must be remembered that one of the chief dangers lay in this: that the more intelligent the central body was, the more it interested itself in the question of education, and the more it had studied the question the more apt it was to think that it alone ought to absorb all the powers. They ought to be very careful to watch the centralising instinct, because its tendency was to destroy the local interest taken in the work of education in the country, and thus destroy a great part of its value, and certainly a great part of its efficiency. It must be remembered that the blunders of a local body could be more easily rectified than, and were never so far-reaching as, the blunders of a central office. He was therefore glad to see the alteration that had been made in this respect. One little matter had been overlooked—he thought, accidentally—by reason of an alteration in the other House. When the Bill was brought down originally it was proposed to leave the granting of exemption certificates to the Boards; but that was altered, and it was given back to the Committees—quite rightly. But in the original Act there was a provision for giving an appeal from the Committees to the Board; and there ought to be an appeal in a matter of this sort, which might, perhaps, be very important to a family. That had been left out in the Bill now before the Council. When the Bill came into Committee he would move that there be added a proviso to clause 3 that any person dissatisfied with the decision of a Committee in refusing to grant an exemption certificate might appeal to the Education Board, which might overrule or confirm such decision. He happened to know one or two cases in which appeals had been made with very good reason and justice. There happened in one case to be some local prejudice; and in another he was afraid it was a religious question which led to the controversy as to whether a child was being properly educated or not; but when the matter came before the Board there was not a shadow of a doubt that the child was being educated quite as well as it would have been in a public school, and was therefore reasonably entitled to an exemption; and that was so held by the Board. Cases of that sort were sure to arise occasionally, and some provision should therefore be put back into the Bill such as at present existed in clause 90 of the Act of 1877. With regard to Native schools he hoped that before very long these schools might be placed under the Education Boards, or that some special system of local superintendence should be established. However, in the meantime he dared to say there was very good reason for keeping them still under the central authority. He was not sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances of the Native districts to be able to say. He would be glad to support the Bill, although, as he said before, he did not see any very great difference between it and the law as it stood at present. But machinery was now provided which would facilitate the enforcement of the law where the Committees found it necessary.

The Hon. Mr. KELLY said that School Committees had the same power at present as they were to have under the Bill. His experience was that School Committees, as a general rule, would not take the initiative. The Committees in his district had requested the Board to take action, and wished to divest themselves of the responsibility. He thought a provision should be inserted in the Bill that, when the Committees wished to confer on the Board the power of taking action under the Bill, they could do so. Unless the Board could so act the Bill would be practically a dead-letter in most country districts, and only be operative in boroughs or town districts.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY was understood to say that he entirely agreed with the Hon. Mr. Bowen that power should not be removed from the Committees, as they could not expect people in a district to give their attention to these matters without having a certain amount of power. At the same time, they had always felt great difficulty in compelling attendance. This was not so much the case in town districts where they had a truant officer; but it was impossible to have such an officer in many country districts. He also agreed that, if the Education Act was made oppressive on the people, instead of being the means of advancing education people would have a distaste for it, and it would fail in much of the benefit that should be derived from it. A great deal must necessarily be left to the good sense of the people. It would be noticed by the Council that clause 5 said they "shall" do so and so—"they shall take action to compel children to attend the schools."

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—What is to be done to the Committees if they do not?

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY said, as the honourable gentleman knew, they could not force the Committees to take action, and a good deal must be left to the good sense of the Committees. With regard to the appeal to the Board, he thought it was very likely, as the Hon. Mr. Bowen had said, that clause 90 of the Act of 1887 had been omitted because it had been intended that the Board should manage things altogether. He would look into the matter carefully, as he thought some such provision should be restored. With regard to the matter of Native schools, he entirely agreed with the principle of having Native children educated along with others; but that was a matter requiring time—it could not be done all at once. He knew a Native school in the district in which he lived which was uncommonly well taught, and a great many European children went there. He would gladly welcome the time when the children of the Maori race and those of European origin would receive their education in the same schools; but this could only come about after some time. He believed, however, that the time was coming when the Natives and Europeans would be brought together. In the meantime, this was a move in the right direction: that the children of the Native schools must attend and receive education when the means were placed at their disposal.

Bill read the second time.

RAILWAY CHARGES ON FRUIT, ETC.

On the motion of Mr. W. HUTCHISON, it was ordered, That a return (if obtainable) be laid before this House giving a comparative statement of the charges on our railways for the carriage of fruit and agricultural and dairy products for long distances—say, from ten to a hundred miles—with the charges for the same class of goods on the Australian railways.

WORKERS' UNIONS.

Major STEWARD asked the Government,—(1.) Whether workers' unions come under the provisions of "The Mining Act, 1891," in the same way as mining associations, County Councils, and Road Boards? (2.) If not, what steps are required to be taken to effect this? He had been asked by the secretary of a workers' union to put this question. Some months ago an advertisement appeared in the Government Gazette under which County Councils and other authorities could come under the Mining Act. A number of the members of this union who resided in the Waikaiti district were very desirous to come under the provisions of the Act.

Mr. SEDDON said the term "workers' unions" was not known, but there was nothing to prevent any number of persons from combining together to form a mining association, if they desired to take advantage of the regulations under "The Mining Act, 1891," for granting aid towards prospecting. The first thing to be done was for the local body to pass a resolution adopting the regulations. Then it was for these persons, jointly and separately, to apply to be treated as a prospecting association and as a party for prospecting purposes. Then, when the local body gave them assistance, the Government had also regulations to provide the pound for pound and its distribution.

POHANGINA ROAD BOARD.

Mr. PIRANI asked the Minister of Lands, Why deferred "thirds" are not handed over to the Pohangina Road Board in respect to the endowments disposed of by the Wanganui Harbour Board, and which are not specially exempted by law from such payment? He would like to point out to the Minister of Lands that under "The Wanganui Harbour Endowment and Borrowing Act, 1877," it was enacted that these lands must be disposed of in like manner to other waste lands within the district. Under the Waste Lands Act of the same year this clause was enacted:—

"59. One-third of the price of any block of land disposed of under this Part of this Act shall be handed over to the County Council or Road Board of the district within which such land is situated, to be expended in the construction of roads within, or to open up, the block for the benefit of the selectors. And the payments made by the selectors shall from time to time, until the amount of such one-third be reached, be paid over to such County Council or Road Board, as the case may be. The plans of proposed roads shall in all cases receive the sanction of the Waste Lands Board of the district."

An almost exactly similar clause was enacted in the Land Acts of 1885 and 1892; and in "The Wanganui Harbour Board Endowment Sale Act, 1892," an exception was made with regard to the lands disposed of for a special settlement under that Act. Not a single penny of the thirds had been paid over to the local body. The Board in question—the Harbour Board—had certainly spent some money in making roads, but not in any way under the provisions of the Act, and he would like the Minister of Lands to explain why the Receiver of Land Revenue had not acted in a similar manner in this case to what he had done in connection with other Crown lands.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE was afraid the honourable gentleman's view of the matter was not correct: at least, according to the information he had received it appeared that section 4 of the Wanganui Harbour Endowment Act, under which most of the Wanganui Harbour endowment was disposed of, provided that after deducting the cost of survey only the whole of the proceeds should be paid to the Wanganui Harbour Board Fund; and section 8 of "The Wanganui Harbour Endowment Sale Act, 1892," specially exempted the block taken up by the special-settlement association from the payment of "thirds." That was the information he had from the department on the subject, and, if the statement of the honourable member for Palmerston were correct, then this must be wrong. However, he would take an opportunity of comparing the honourable gentleman's statement with that of the department, and see which was right and which was wrong.

Mr. PIRANI would like to ask, further, did not the Minister think, if it was necessary to exempt certain portions of land under "The Wanganui Harbour Board Endowment Sale Act, 1892," from payment of these thirds, that proved his contention, and therefore there must be some obligation to pay these "thirds" on the other lands? or why exempt one portion?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said it was not for him to judge. There was an officer who had to decide whether the "thirds" should be paid or not. It was not in the hands of the Minister of Lands, but that officer interpreted the law. Of course he could not say that the officer was wrong, but he would look the subject up.

KIRIKIRI TELEPHONE.

Mr. HOUSTON asked the Postmaster-General, If he will establish a telephone at Kirikiri, on the Main North Road, in the Bay of Islands? His reason for asking this was that in the district of Kirikiri, situated on the Main North Road towards the Bay of Islands, there was a store which was a calling-place for a great number of commercial travellers. This was fourteen or fifteen miles from the nearest telegraph-station, and the telegraph-line was running right past the place within a few chains of the store. It would be a great convenience to have a telephone-station there. There were a large number of people employed in the neighbourhood, and it was necessary that they should have the latest information possible from the large centres. He hoped the Minister would see his way to give the settlers this assistance. He had had the pleasure of handing in a petition on the subject a few days ago.

Mr. WARD might say he was advised that the estimated revenue was £12 per annum, and the estimated deficit £22 per annum. To open this office would cost £200, and the difficulty was, the report stated, that there was no likelihood of the revenue increasing. If the residents were very anxious to have the line, and would pay a reasonable subsidy, the matter could be considered. The amount that would be required would be about £80.

CHINESE PREMISES.

Mr. COLLINS asked the Premier, Will the Government issue instructions to have the premises owned and occupied by Chinese more efficiently inspected, that the public may be safeguarded from the overcrowded and insanitary conditions which now menace the general health of our large cities? He would scarcely have made the matter of this question a subject to bring before the House had he not felt that it was of very considerable importance. He might say that since it had appeared on the Order Paper he had received communications both from Christchurch and Wellington, distinctly proving that there was great necessity for attention to be called specifically to this matter. It was well known that the manner in which Chinese herded together in premises totally unfit for human habitation, and their manner and mode of life, were such as really to seriously menace the health of any community amongst whom they might reside. He hoped the House would receive an assurance that the attention of the proper authorities would be called to the matter, so that the evil spoken of might be redressed as speedily as possible.

Mr. SEDDON said there was no power given to the Government to make the inspection that the honourable gentleman had mentioned. The premises occupied by the Chinese would not, of course, come under the factory laws, and he did not know there was any law they would come under except the municipal law. Under the municipal law the local authorities had power to make an inspection; and he would send a copy of the question and of the honourable member's remarks upon it to the local authorities in Wellington, Christchurch, Auckland, and Dunedin, and ask them courteously to make inquiries and to attend to the matter. He himself thought it was a question that should be looked to, and looked to at once.

CIVIL SERVANTS.

Mr. HOGG asked the Premier, If he will consider the desirability of amending the conditions under which the youth of the colony are admitted to the Civil Service, so that young persons who have passed the whole of the standards in the public schools, and who are sufficiently educated for the duties which they will be expected to discharge, may not be precluded from receiving employment in the departments of the State? He might say he thought it was only fair to the youth of New Zealand that, whether they belonged to the town or the country, they should have an equal opportunity of entering the public service of the colony. If the examination for the Civil Service was unnecessarily severe, some attention ought to be devoted to it. If the curriculum of the public schools was not sufficient to fit a youth to pass the entrance examination for the Civil Service, either that examination should be reduced or the curriculum of the schools should be raised. He considered that, with regard to obtaining employment in the departments of the State, the child of the country settler and the child of the city merchant should be placed on fair and equal terms.

Mr. SEDDON said there was no doubt whatever that the Civil Service Act was somewhat defective as regarded the admittance of cadets, and an expression of opinion, he thought, had been given by the House as to the direction which reform should take. He questioned very much whether this session he would be able to bring down a measure dealing with it; but at as early a date as possible next session he would be prepared to submit proposals which would widen the scope for admittance into the Civil Service. He thought the Service should be open to youths of the whole colony, instead of the advantages being given to those youths whose parents could afford to pay for private tuition. He thought every district in the colony should have a chance, but whether such districts should be the education districts or the provincial districts he could not quite say.

Sir R. STOUT said the honourable gentleman was raising debatable matter.

Mr. SEDDON was only indicating the way in which there might be an amendment, by taking the youths from the head of the lists of the respective districts he had named. He thought there was room for reform.

TURANGARERE—OHINGAITI ROAD.

Mr. STEVENS asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether the Government will place a sufficient sum of money on the public-works estimates for the purpose of completing the metalling of the North Island Main Trunk Road between Turangarere and Ohingaiti? He did not wish it to be understood that he referred to only the portion of the road that had not been metalled; it was the portions that had already been partially metalled. Many portions of the road had been insufficiently metalled, and the consequence was that the drays had cut it up during the present winter; and, if the work were not attended to, next summer the road would become absolutely impassable. During the next twelve months there would be a great deal of heavy traffic in this direction, and he hoped the Minister would see his way to prevent this road from getting in the same position as the one running from Birmingham to Pemberton.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said that in a few days the Public Works Statement would be brought down, and the honourable gentleman would then be informed as to the various sums of money that would be provided for roads. The honourable gentleman could not expect him to anticipate that document.

AWAROA SURVEY DISTRICT.

Mr. LANG asked the Minister of Lands, if any portion of the £500 voted to open land for settlement in the Awaroa Survey District, Raglan County, remains unexpended; and, if so, will he permit it to be expended under the direct supervision of the Settlers' Thirds Committee?

Mr. J. McKENZIE said that out of the sum of £500 voted last year for these local roads there remained unexpended about £50. The other portion of the vote was expended through the Chief Surveyor at Auckland. There was no provision in law which would permit the balance of the vote to be expended under the direct supervision of the local body mentioned. The Government was only authorised to expend votes of Parliament through local authorities. As to what money was left, he would give instructions with regard to it to the Chief Surveyor.

MAINTENANCE-MEN ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON asked the Premier, if he will bring under the notice of the Railway Commissioners, with a view to provide a remedy, the long hours of the maintenance-men on the railways, these hours occasionally extending to twelve and rarely to less than ten hours a day; and, in connection with these hours, will he call the attention of the Commissioners to the rule which states that if men have to work more than ten hours they shall, with the approval of the Inspector, be paid overtime—a rule which has become practically obsolete? He did not know whether the Premier had had any communications with the Railway Commissioners on this subject, but, if he had, no doubt such communications would be in the nature of the usual formula upon the subject, which might mean anything, but yet meant absolutely nothing. He submitted the maintenance-men were really deserving of consideration at the hands of the House. They worked away from home, and were deprived almost entirely of social intercourse with their families. They left their homes early in the morning, and they did not get back until late at night; in many cases occupying ten hours a day. He thought the fact of there being so few accidents indicated a vigilance deserving of great credit, and he hoped the Premier would interest himself in the matter, and that some consideration would be shown to these men.

Mr. SEDDON said the reply of the Railway Commissioners was that the working-hours of the maintenance-men were fixed at eight per day, or forty-eight hours per week of six working-days. The ordinary working-time was from eight to five. There was no rule which provided for working up to ten hours before overtime was paid, and never had been one. Overtime was paid under certain regulations for work in excess of eight hours a day. That was the reply of the Commissioners, and if it was incorrect he regretted that the Commissioners had given a misleading reply. Probably the information the honourable member had received was not in accordance with what was stated in the reply of the Commissioners; but there might be some explanation of that. The Government could only say that the reply was in accord with the Commissioners' determination with regard to the eight-hour system, and on the payment of overtime when the men worked over eight hours a day.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON thought if the Premier would make inquiry in some other form, not through the Railway Commissioners themselves—supposing he sent some one to Aramoho to make inquiries from the men themselves—he would hear a different story.

Mr. SEDDON said, if the honourable member had any information, which, of course, would be confidential, he would be quite prepared to consult with him, and to ascertain whether such information was credible or otherwise.

LAUNDRIES, ETC.

Mr. G. J. SMITH asked the Minister of Labour, whether the Government will place all laundries and other institutions which are partially supported by grants of public moneys under the provisions of the Factories Act? He wished to bring before the House the fact that certain laundries and other businesses that received help by way of grants of public money were entering into competition with outside people. The particular institution he referred to was the Mount Magdala laundry, near Christchurch. That institution had received a grant-in-aid, and it entered into competition with outside laundries. The consequence was that a number of indigent people were hindered from supplementing their limited income, or, indeed, from making a living at all, on account of the low charge for work done in that laundry. In addition to that, there was a doubt as to whether the institutions referred to came under the provisions of the Factories Act, and if that was correct he hoped the Minister of Labour would be able to see his way to bring the institution under the Factories Act.

Mr. REEVES said he would obtain a legal opinion as to whether such institutions did not come under the Factories Act already. With regard to what had fallen from the honourable member, he need scarcely remind him that there was no Factories Act regulating prices charged for washing.

FROZEN-MEAT CARRIAGE ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL asked the Government, Will they, in view of the probable rapid increase during the coming season of the frozen-meat export trade, request the Railway

Commissioners to convert, say, twenty of the grain-trucks into refrigerated cars for the conveyance of frozen meat on the Hurunui-Bluff line; or will they place on the supplementary estimates such a sum as may be necessary to convert the said trucks, estimated at about £1,600? He would like to draw attention to the fact that, owing to the small price of grain in recent years, there was an immense number of trucks suitable for carrying grain now rendered almost entirely useless, while the frozen-meat trade was likely to be very much larger than in previous years. Both the Christchurch companies—the Christchurch Meat Company and the Canterbury Frozen-meat Company—had already booked a large number of sheep, and it was an assured fact that at present there was no margin over and above the actual requirements of the trade on the Hurunui-Bluff line. It had been stated officially by the Commissioners that it would take £1,600 to convert twenty grain-trucks into trucks suitable for the carriage of frozen meat, and it was most important that the work should be put in hand at once. He believed the Commissioners objected to take this amount out of revenue, and if that was the case it appeared to him it was a most short-sighted policy that what was the greatest industry in the colony next to the wool industry should be in any way handicapped by a shortage of trucks during the coming season. He hoped the Government would give an assurance that the matter would be attended to, as the Commissioners, he regretted to say, had been very reluctant in connection with it. That was his experience of them, and he hoped the Government would bring down the amount necessary to have these trucks converted at once.

Mr. SEDDON said the reply of the Commissioners was to the effect that if the funds for which they had applied to the Government were provided they would probably be able to meet the request. As the honourable gentleman had stated, the sum of £1,600 was required for the purpose, and the Government admitted that there was a necessity for furthering this industry; and, considering the sum mentioned would meet the emergency, the Government would, if requested by the Railway Commissioners, make provision for the amount.

NORTH ISLAND TRUNK RAILWAY.

Mr. MITCHELSON asked the Minister of Lands, if he will this session introduce a Bill to authorise the refund to the North Island Main Trunk Loan of the amount now owing to that fund for moneys taken from it for the purchase of Native land, under the provisions of the North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Application Act?

Mr. J. McKENZIE said this question was a very simple one, but it involved the sum of £220,000. This sum was taken out of the Main Trunk Railway Loan for the purposes of purchasing Native land along the line of railway, and it could only be replaced by passing an Act to provide money for the purpose. He was sure that the honourable gentleman opposite had a horror of borrowing, and would not be prepared to support a Bill to borrow money for the purpose.

Mr. BELL said it would not shock the honourable gentleman.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said the honourable gentleman should judge himself in the matter, because he (Mr. McKenzie) would certainly be very much shocked if the Government proposed to borrow £220,000 for that purpose. It would not do to take the amount out of the sum of £250,000 provided under the Bill passed this session, because it would leave only the sum of £30,000, and the Government required a great deal more than that. The proceeds accruing out of this loan were set aside as an endowment for the railway, and could not be dealt with in any other way than in accordance with the provisions of "The Land Act, 1892." He was sorry he could not promise the honourable gentleman that the Government would pass a loan Bill through this session.

CUSTOMS REVENUE.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON asked the Colonial Treasurer, Why the following motion is opposed: "That a return be laid before this House giving the amount collected for Customs revenue during the month of August last, together with the amount collected for Customs revenue during the corresponding month of last year"? He noticed in the last number of the Journal of Labour that the custom previously followed for one or two months in that journal of giving the Customs returns for the preceding month had been discontinued.

Mr. WARD said the answer was a similar one to that he had given on a former occasion this session. The Government entertained the opinion that it was desirable that this information should be published quarterly, not monthly.

Sir R. STOUT said it was given every week in Sydney.

Mr. WARD said they did many stupid things there.

LIME FREIGHT ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. ALLEN asked the Premier, If he is aware that a request, signed by a large number of farmers in and around the districts of Bruce, Clutha, and Tuapeka, has been forwarded to the Railway Commissioners, asking that a considerable reduction be made in the rate for the carriage of lime? What reply have the Commissioners given to this request? Will the Premier, if the reply is not favourable, ask the Commissioners to again consider the matter? Will the Premier, if he should take control of the railways, give encouragement to the farming industry by complying with the request? He had been asked by many farmers to ask for this concession in the freight of lime. It was a matter of considerable importance to the farmers, and he hoped the Government would be able to give a satisfactory answer.

Mr. SEDDON said the reply of the Commissioners was as follows:—

"The Commissioners have the petitions referred to under consideration, but, as the majority of those seeking the reduction are within the radius of twelve miles, for which the charge for conveyance of lime is only 1s. 9d. a ton, the request does not seem reasonable. The charges to stations in the districts mentioned outside this limit are exceedingly low, and will not admit of reduction without loss."

3.30. He had told the honourable member, the House, and the country that the carrying of lime and manure at very low rates more than repaid the cost by the increased production. The Commissioners had control of the railways, and, as they had said the matter was under consideration, it would be unfair to judge what course they would take. The rate named by the Commissioners seemed to him to be reasonable, but whether more could be done in this matter was a question for their consideration.

Mr. ALLEN said the honourable gentleman had not answered the last part of the question.

Mr. SEDDON said it was almost impossible for him to be Minister of Railways.

Dr. NEWMAN.—Who will be?

Mr. SEDDON said it was very hard to say, but he did not think it would be the member for Wellington Suburbs. However, this would be a matter for consideration when the Government assumed control. It would be very much out of place for him now to be pledging the Government as to what they would do. They had not got control yet. They must take everything into consideration. They must consider the condition of the colony's finance, and other matters must be considered. He had told the honourable gentleman the views which the Government held on the matter—that every encouragement should be given to the carriage of lime and manure—that they should be carried at the lowest possible rates. Further than that he could not go at present.

EXODUS TO AUSTRALIA.

Mr. DUTHIE asked the Premier, Whether he is aware that amongst the nine hundred passengers who are reported to have left Auckland for Sydney on Monday and Tuesday last there was a large proportion of desirable colonists with capital; and whether this increasing exodus to Australia has received the attention of the Government, and if they are now about to take any steps to endeavour to induce the people to remain in New Zealand? Seeing the great interest which the Premier took in bygone years in reference to an exodus of population which then occurred, he had no doubt the honourable gentleman was glad to see this question on the Order Paper. By the returns he noticed that for four months prior to September the departures were at the rate of 5,550 a year. He thought that was an indication that attention to this subject by the Government was required. He was informed from banking quarters that a number of these emigrants were taking a considerable amount of capital with them, which proved that those people who were leaving were people whom it was desirable to retain in the country, and, by taking their capital away, that they did not intend to return. He would read extracts from a letter handed to him on the subject. The letter was dated "Kingsland, Auckland, 25th August, 1894," and said,—

"We are moving again, this time to Sydney; leaving Auckland by the 'Tasmania' on the 18th of next month. I think it was in January last that I went to Gisborne, and used your letter of introduction to Mr. S—. . . I liked what I saw of Poverty Bay, and but a few weeks ago had almost decided to go there to take up land for my two sons. The new proposals of the Government to borrow, and this general interference with everything, quite decided me to invest no more money in New Zealand."

The writer went on to explain that he was about leaving—and he did, in fact, leave—the colony by the steamer mentioned. He thought that this question deserved the attention of the Government, because such a large exodus of most desirable people was weakening the colony, which was losing the very class of people who alone could carry on the real work of settlement. He trusted the Minister would be able to give such an answer as would give encouragement, which to some extent might tend to stay this exodus.

Mr. SEDDON said the honourable member did not state the name of the gentleman who signed the letter, but the colony was well rid of such a man. Probably the writer stopped in the colony in the flourishing days, when vast sums of money were being spent on public works. He had had the benefit of the unearned increment, and had probably made a large sum of money; and now that he had to bear his fair share of the taxation, and do his duty as a good colonist, he took the first ship for other colonies. Those colonies were welcome to such colonists, and we did not regret the loss of such men. He would read the substance of a telegram which he had received upon this subject. It was admitted that some nine hundred men left, most of them being for New South Wales en route for the Coolgardie diggings. It was stated that the gold-fever was strong. It was generally admitted that a man going to Coolgardie would require about £20 for the journey, and £10 when he got there: any prudent men would want £10 on their arrival; on the other hand, many would go if they could only manage to arrive there. Amongst the passengers there were all classes. For instance, there were solicitors. He did not think there was much to regret in that. Then, there were clerks. Well, he thought we had a goodly number of clerks in this colony. Then, there were tradesmen, labourers, and speculators. There was no doubt that many of those men had gone on "spec." to see the place, and to stop or return just as inducement offered. To this was added the enticement of the cheap trip. The fares at the present time on board the steamers were so low that really any one who was at all tempted to take a change of air was induced to take such a trip.

Mr. Seddon

There was no doubt whatever that these low fares were doing a great deal of harm to the colony. They disturbed people and caused them to be on the move. As one who had been on the goldfields for the last thirty years, he might say that when he read of Coolgardie he began to feel a little uneasy himself. One could not help it. At the same time this matter needed to be treated seriously. He was not one of those who liked to see our people going away and no effort being made to keep them. Numbers of persons were leaving no doubt owing to the low price of gum. And settlement had been retarded in the North: that might have had something to do with a number of these men going away. If the amounts which the Government asked Parliament to vote were granted, they would put road-making in hand, and endeavour to place people on the land, and by doing that they would probably prevent others from going away. He might point out that the colony lost some fourteen thousand people in three years—from 1887 to 1890—and he would undertake to say that it would not be the fault of the present Government if anything like that happened again. They would do their best to retain the population in the colony, and make the people prosperous, contented, and happy.

STEALING FLOWERS FROM THE CEMETERY.

Mr. DUTHIE asked the Acting Minister of Justice, Whether there were any undisclosed circumstances, beyond those reported in the New Zealand Times of the 19th instant, that justified the apparently excessive sentence of a fine of £5 passed on one Mary Harris for stealing a flower in the public cemetery; and whether, if there are no such circumstances, the Minister will remit or materially reduce the fine? He might explain that the cemetery was vested in the City Council. The authorities wished to withdraw the case. The Magistrate, however, insisted that the person should be brought up, and then he inflicted on her what seemed to be a very excessive fine. His attention having been drawn to the matter, he wrote to the Town Clerk, who, in his reply, stated that Mrs. Harris seemed to be a respectable woman, and earned her living by washing and odd work, and to be very poor, so far as he could judge; and that she was not the systematic flower-stealer that the authorities wanted to catch. He (Mr. Duthie) might point out that to fine a washerwoman £5 who earned 15s. a week, and to make her pay the costs, would result in this: that it would take one-third of her income for six months. He thought the House would agree that under the circumstances such a large fine partook somewhat of cruelty. However, he would be glad to hear some justification for the Magistrate's action if there were circumstances to justify it; otherwise he trusted the Minister would consider the matter, and grant some remission of the fine.

Mr. REEVES said until he read the report of the Stipendiary Magistrate he took the same view of the case as the honourable gentleman. But he had in his possession a lengthy report from Mr. Martin, which showed that this act was unfortunately a deliberate one; it was not an isolated one, nor was it the result of sudden temptation or impulse. A great deal of flower-stealing from graves had been going on, and nothing could stop it until this conviction. Since the conviction it had suddenly and completely stopped. He was bound to say, after carefully reading the report of the Magistrate, that he saw no reason for thinking that the sentence was one of undue harshness. The Magistrate imposed one-fourth of the lighter of two penalties allowed by the Act, and he did not press that the fine should be paid at once, but allowed it to be paid in weekly instalments which the woman herself said she could pay. He also made no order for imprisonment in default of the instalments not being paid, so that, in the case of default, a special application would have to be made before imprisonment could be inflicted.

Mr. DUTHIE asked if he was to understand the Minister to say that the woman had been guilty of previous acts of the same kind, or that this was not the first.

Mr. REEVES said he did not say she had been guilty of any previous acts, or that she had been accused of any previous act.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said the honourable gentleman said it was not an isolated act.

Mr. REEVES said, Yes; it was one of a number of thefts which had taken place about the same time.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH JUDGE BARTON.

Mr. DUTHIE asked the Premier, Whether he would object to a return, if moved for, to complete the Judge Barton correspondence up to the present date being laid on the table?

Mr. SEDDON said if it was simply the correspondence relative to the Court business he could see no objection to such a return.

EDUCATION ENDOWMENTS.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE moved, That this House approves of lands proposed to be reserved as endowments for education (as set forth in Paper No. 182, laid upon the table on the 19th September, 1894) being permanently set aside as endowments for education.

Motion agreed to.

TARIFF COMMITTEE.

Mr. SEDDON, in moving the motion standing in his name, said he hoped there would be no debate upon it.

Captain RUSSELL.—Tell us what it means.

Mr. SEDDON said it simply meant that there had been evidence taken by the Tariff Committee; that documents had been submitted to the Committee which, of course, had been sent to the Government and were of a somewhat confidential nature. Of course, if any persons read through the correspondence and minute-book they might probably get an idea as to what action would be taken when Parliament was called upon to deal with the tariff question. He thought, as these documents and the correspondence were of a somewhat confidential nature, that it was only fair they should be kept confidential.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the minutes, evidence, documents, and proceedings of the Tariff Committee be ordered to be treated as confidential."—(Mr. Seddon.)

Dr. NEWMAN would suggest to the Premier that the resolution was quite unnecessary, because he understood that for some weeks past, whenever a motion had been brought on for extra duties on boots, shoes, ironmongery, et cetera, there had always been clearances of goods at the Customs in all parts of the colony, and so there would be nothing gained by this motion. It was too late.

Captain RUSSELL did not say that this was not a delicate question, in connection with which the Government was justified in proceeding cautiously; but, at the same time, there were certain conditions as to the reports of Select Committees which must be recognised. It was in the power of any member of the House to attend a Committee and hear the proceedings, and it had generally been assumed that the proceedings of a Select Committee were for the benefit of the House which appointed that Committee. Under the circumstances of the motion proposed by the Premier, there was a certain section of members of the House who would be familiar with the proceedings of the Committee on this question, but the bulk of the members who had appointed the Committee could not obtain that information. He would not like it to happen that, because they did not call attention to this matter, a precedent should be established in the future that the evidence taken by a Committee and the ordinary proceedings of a Committee should be kept private. He was not sure whether Mr. Speaker should not give his ruling as to whether the proceedings of that Committee were not the property of the House, and whether the papers should not be laid on the table under those circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER said it was quite competent for the House to say what was to be done with regard to the custody of the minutes of proceedings and evidence, if it should think that it was necessary in the interests of the public that such evidence and correspondence should not be allowed to get abroad.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said that he, as a member of the House, desired to see the proceedings of the Committee, and he had asked to be allowed to see them, but was met with a refusal, on the ground that they were to be kept secret. He thought that this was an extraordinary course, and he had endeavoured to find some precedent for the course suggested by the Premier, but had not been able to find one. The singularity of the proceedings now was made more marked from the fact that the Premier had stated that certain documents which were deemed confidential had been forwarded to the Government by the Committee.

Mr. SEDDON.—No.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON understood the Premier to say that papers had been sent to the Government by the Committee which the Government considered confidential. Of course he accepted the Premier's assurance that it was not so.

Mr. SEDDON explained that what he did say was that a communication had been sent to the Government which was of a semi-confidential nature, and the Government had given the benefit of the choice to the Committee.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON understood that members of a Committee simply received a delegation of power by the House to inquire into a subject and report. It was the privilege of any member of the House to attend at a Committee sitting, except when the Committee happened to be in deliberation, when members were expected but not bound to withdraw. Members, whether present or not at meetings of a Committee, expected to have an opportunity of perusing the proceedings. He did not attach much importance to the resolutions of the Committee in question, but he thought it might be taken as absolutely correct that the proceedings of that Committee were throughout in the direction of raising the tariff duties.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON said the whole tendency of the Committee was in the direction of raising the tariff duties, and of turning our Customs tariff into what he might call a prohibitive tariff.

An Hon. MEMBER.—You are fishing.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON was not at all fishing. His information was of the most reliable character. He felt convinced of that. The colony should understand the danger with which it was threatened, and that the Government had taken the present unusual course to keep the proceedings secret. That capped the whole matter, and confirmed what had been suspected to be the intention of members on the Government benches—that this colony was to be faced with a change in the tariff which would be most hurtful to the best interests of the colony.

Mr. WARD said the honourable gentleman was very astute; there was a great deal underlying the honourable gentleman's remarks. There was a great deal in the honourable gentleman's speech which, he thought, without some reply from the Government benches, might be calculated to very seriously disturb the trade of the colony. He did not know whether that was the intention of the honourable gentleman, but that might certainly be the effect his speech would have. The honourable gentleman stated that this Committee had proposed to increase the tariff, and his statement was an entirely misleading one: in fact, it was most inaccurate. The honourable gentleman had made this mode of guessing what had taken place at the proceedings of this Committee a means of creating an impression in the country that they were going to have a prohibitive tariff, and he thought that such an impression was not at all desirable. It could only be liable to create a great disturbance in trade, and possibly it would disturb the ordinary importation of goods into this colony for a considerable time to come. If that were so, the object of the honourable gentleman in so frequently saying that the Customs revenue was not keeping up in the colony was quite apparent. They now found him explaining or echoing the preconceived idea for the purpose of leading the people to believe the tariff was going to be seriously interfered with. The honourable gentleman would, by first creating a drop in the revenue, afterwards assert it as a fact that the low Customs revenue had been due to the action of the Government; whereas the honourable gentleman, by the course he had suggested should be followed, would be the primary cause of it. Honourable members were sufficiently sensible, he thought, to know that in a matter of this sort the only object of the Government in suggesting that the Committee's minutes should be kept confidential was to prevent a disturbance of trade. There was nothing contained in the recommendations of the Tariff Committee which, in the ordinary course, could not be made public; but, if the suggestions of a Committee which had gone into the tariff question were published in the colony and sent abroad before the decision of the House and the Government had been arrived at in the ordinary course, it would tend to disturb the trade of those people interested. It was very much better, therefore, that the report of the Committee should be regarded as confidential, and also the correspondence and minutes. He was sure honourable members would do the Government the justice of admitting that in a matter of this sort honourable members would at once be taken into their confidence if that course were at all necessary. The honourable members who had attended the Tariff Committee had made this suggestion, and if the Government had published the proceedings they would have been abusing confidence. The only object of the motion was to prevent disturbance in trade, and he was sure that every honourable member who was animated by a desire to do his best for the country would agree that if this motion was not carried it would not be for the best interests of the country.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said they were justified in expecting that some action would be taken by the Government in connection with the tariff. For the last two or three years they had, each financial year, a Statement which declared that they would go into this question, and as regularly, at the close of the session, that question was ignored. The Colonial Treasurer had said that the remarks of the honourable member for Patea were likely to disturb trade; but it was his own action and the action of his officers that was seriously disturbing the trade of the colony. He held in his hand a telegram from the promoter of a certain industry in the colony which stated that owing to the recent action of some of the Customs officers, and the imposition of tariffs which were never contemplated, he would be obliged to shut down his works and go to some other colony. This was an industry of very great importance in the colony, but he did not think he was justified in disclosing the contents of the telegram just then; but he would show it to the Colonial Treasurer in confidence. It was like the proceedings of the Committee in question; it was confidential, and he knew the honourable gentleman would not ask that it should be disclosed. However, what it went to show was that, owing to the recent action of the honourable gentleman and his officers, an important industry in the colony would have to be closed down. The honourable gentleman also wished the House to understand that the Government did not contemplate an increase of the duties, but he would call the attention of the House and the country to the words of the Premier in dealing with the tariff. That honourable gentleman so far forgot himself and the interests of the colony as to say that he would support a duty of 5s. per ton to be placed on coal imported into the colony. It was also known that the Premier was in favour of a duty being placed on grain.

Mr. SEDDON.—I never said that.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said these opinions were in the air, and the Premier had stated in the House that he would consider the propriety of putting a duty on grain. The majority of the Committee consisted of Protectionists: they knew perfectly well what the intentions of the Government and of that Committee were. There was a feeling of unrest now existing, and, even if the session were prolonged a little further, he thought something should be done to amend the tariff: it would be in the interest of the whole of our trade, and would create a feeling of tranquillity which did not at present exist.

Sir R. STOUT said he had stated when the Committee was appointed that he thought it was a great mistake. It was the duty of the Government, if they wished to have a change in the Customs tariff, to bring down their own proposals to the House, and not to send them to a Committee. He declined himself to attend the meetings of the Committee, because he did not think the Committee should deal with the matter at all. He had heard from the Treasurer that this matter would be referred to a Committee; and that seemed to him to mean that the tariff was not going to be altered this session at all, but that it was to be shunted for the next twelve months. That was the object of the Committee. The position was this: This was not a secret Committee at all, because by Standing Order 225 there was such a thing recognised as a secret Committee, but this had not been made a secret Committee, and consequently members, if they wished, could attend the Committee. Any report by this Committee could have no effect whatever at the present time. For example, one day the Free-traders on the Committee were in a majority, and they carried Free-trade. The next day the moderate Protectionists were in a majority, and they carried moderate Protection. On the third day the Protectionists were in a majority, and carried Protection: and there could be no result. He could not think that honourable members did not want the report of the Tariff Committee to be submitted to the House, because it was contradictory to their wishes, for they ought to have the question submitted to the people of the colony. What they heard in the lobbies was that the duties were to be raised on almost every article of consumption—flour, boots, and everything else except tea, on which he did not think the duty was too high at present. He thought it was only fair that the country should know that practically the majority of the Government party would next year approve of an increase in the Customs duties. That was what had to be faced, and that was what was going to be carried. And it would have been carried in the present year if the Government had brought it down. That was exactly the position in which they were placed.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

4.0. Sir R. STOUT said honourable members might say "No," but one of the honourable members who cried "No" loudest was one with regard to whom the Premier had only to lift his little finger and he would go into whatever lobby he might tell him to go into. There was no doubt about that. He did not name the honourable gentleman.

Mr. SEDDON said it must be the honourable member for Dunedin City.

Sir R. STOUT said it was not a member for a southern constituency. The honourable member for Dunedin City was not pleasant to the Premier, he knew, because the honourable member for Dunedin City had a mind of his own.

Mr. SEDDON.—A reflex of yours.

Sir R. STOUT said the Government were very anxious for revenue, but did not like to put it on. He did not blame the Colonial Treasurer. What he (Sir R. Stout) said was that the Government had got to put on new duties next session, for honourable members might go on relying on the fact that new duties would have to be put on next session. There was no chance of getting out of it, with the proposals that were now before the House. It was as certain as that the sun would rise tomorrow, if their finance was to be kept safe. He did not see why the report and resolutions should not be published. It could not affect trade. Supposing he was a merchant, and had heard that Customs duties were going to be put on certain articles before Parliament met next year, he would clear the goods that were likely to have duties imposed upon them. He did not suppose that there would be any clearances of tea, but various other things would be cleared in order that, if the tariff should be increased, he would have less duties to pay. It would be far better to publish the report and resolutions, and let the merchants know what they had to look forward to. He thought the conclusions arrived at by the Committee on the separate items of the tariff should be published. Of course, it would not be right to publish any confidential information with regard to particular industries, as it might disclose the business of those who gave information, but he could not see what objections there could be to the country seeing what resolutions had been come to on different items of the tariff. Ought not honourable members to discuss the tariff question with their constituents, and ought not the constituents to be consulted? Supposing a member of that House told his constituents that it was proposed there should be an increased duty on grain from 9d. to 2s. "Oh, no," they would say; "we do not believe it." Then the member would tell them, "It was said so in the lobbies." What use, therefore, was there in keeping anything back? It would be talked about and known about, and would have the very opposite effect intended if the publication of these resolutions were withheld. He would therefore suggest the publication of these resolutions—excluding, of course, information of a confidential character which was given by manufacturers in the various branches of industry.

Mr. DUTHIE believed if the publication of this information had any effect at all it would be to increase clearances, and so increase the revenue for the current year. He could not understand why there should be any secrecy in the matter. Less harm would be done if the recommendations of the Committee were made known to the whole world. Unless this were done there would be an unrest in trade, in anticipation of something taking place. So far as what had been done by the Committee was concerned, nothing would really come of it. There were some members of that Committee who were very much in earnest in a desire to amend the tariff: these would have worried Ministers; and, that they might be kept quiet for the session, they were set on in a Committee to occupy their time and exhaust their energy. The Colonial Treasurer, however, did not want, nor, he was sure, for a moment intend, to upset his revenue by carrying the recommendations of the Committee into effect. He thought it would do good if these recommendations were made known to the public, and he therefore thought that the Premier ought to withdraw his motion, and allow the whole matter to be published to the world.

Mr. SEDDON desired to say that, in moving the motion, he did not think it would give rise to any debate, and therefore had not gone into the matter fully. The senior member for Wellington City had stated that, with regard to the resolutions arrived at by the Committee, one resolution was passed one day and was negatived the next. One day the Free-traders were in the ascendant, and the next day the Protectionists. That must show very clearly that in the selection of the members of that Committee the Government had acted very fairly. Where they had a Committee so evenly divided as to represent the opinions of members of that House, and where the House was so equally divided, he thought they might take it for granted that there would be nothing very serious done as far as the tariff was concerned. He said therefore, advisedly, statements made even in this debate,—he would not say that the senior member for Wellington City had made these statements on purpose, or that the honourable gentleman would desire wilfully to cause uncertainty in trade, and loss of revenue; but none knew better than the honourable gentleman himself that, in pointing out directions in which the tariff would be amended, it would have an injurious effect between now and the next session of Parliament. Such action on the honourable gentleman's part was not what he would call patriotic. Whatever might occur, the Government were the representatives of the people, and could only pass such a tariff as would be approved of by the people, and be in the interests of the people. The people had already been consulted. The voice of the people had been given in that Chamber, and the Government would give effect to the wishes of the people.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What are the wishes of the people?

Mr. SEDDON said one of the wishes of the people was, if practicable, a free breakfast-table. When the honourable member for Wellington City occupied the position which he (Mr. Seddon) had now the honour to fill that honourable gentleman did not consult his own supporters with regard to the tariff. He consulted no one concerning it excepting a colleague, who thought the people would put up with anything he proposed. He brought down a tariff against the wishes of his own supporters, and against the wishes of the party, and of the people of the colony, and wrecked the party. With that example before him, he assured the honourable gentleman he was not prepared to wreck the party. He was prepared to take counsel with the party and with the people, and to propose such a tariff as would be acceptable to the people. He was sure the honourable members for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout and Mr. Duthie) and the honourable member for Patea would all concede that there was grave desire on the part of the Government to deal with the matter this session.

Mr. G. HUTCHISON.—The Government desire not to deal with it.

Mr. SEDDON said in the early days of the session the Government moved the appointment of this Committee, and when the honourable member for Patea wanted to limit them to fourteen days the Government agreed to a month. They had not the whole information that was required. They met the honourable gentleman, a compromise was effected, and the Committee were to report in a month. He believed every member of the Committee was anxious to report at as early a date as possible, but the moment they got into the subject they found it stupendous. They found that it would require great care, time, and attention, and they desired to do that which was perfection itself. That being the case, it was no fault of the Government that the report was not down sooner. What was the great anxiety of the honourable member for Patea? Surely he was not anxious to stay there till Christmas. His only anxiety was this: The honourable member for Patea knew, in asking the Government to deal with this question, that it was one in regard to which, unless the greatest care was exercised, it might prove injurious to the Government and the country. The Government felt that a question of this kind required to be dealt with in such a way that no accidents would happen. Now, with regard to the articles to be raised, as far as he knew, there were one or two trades in the colony that required attention. It was now six years since any alteration in the tariff was made. The condition of the colony had altered in respect to some of the trades. At the time the tariff was passed it was thought that these trades would be encouraged by the new tariff. There had been a mistake made in regard to these particular trades, and with regard to others anomalies existed which required to be dealt with, and a change was required to be made. These changes could be made without at all increasing the tariff in the aggregate. That was the remedy—it was more a question of adjustment; and he desired to say at once that the senior member for Wellington City was incorrect in making the statement he did, that increased taxation through the tariff would be necessary next session to enable the Government to meet their engagements. It was a statement of that kind going forth that would do evil, and he at once took this opportunity of meeting it and saying that there was nothing whatever to warrant the statement being made. It was quite true there was a falling-off in two months' Customs revenue; but there was a considerable increase last month as compared with the previous month. That being the case, there was nothing to warrant the statement of the senior member for Wellington City that there must be increased taxation. He quite concurred with the remark of the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) that the Government for the last four years—the Liberal party—had resisted any interference with the tariff, because they believed the time was not opportune to make any change, and that there should be some certainty, some finality. Constant tinkering with the tariff, and statements that it was going to be done, were injurious to commerce; and, having that conviction, the Government had said from the commencement that now the time had arrived when something must be done, and they desired to do it, and do it in such a way that it would not be required to be touched again for some years after that was done, so that the commercial men of New Zealand would know definitely and distinctly where they were. It was from a desire that this should be done that the Government had asked for a Committee to assist them and advise them upon several matters. They had experts on the Committee. However careful the men on the Government benches might be, or however good their officers might be, they must bring in experts to their assistance, and there were on that Committee experts, enlightened men, men who felt the responsibility that was placed on their shoulders, and who were able to advise Parliament wisely and well. Having their counsel was a decided advantage. They had now the report of the Committee on the table of the House.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. SEDDON said they certainly had the report of the Committee; but the honourable member for Patea desired to go behind the proceedings of the Committee, to see each and every resolution. He might want to do so, probably, for the purpose of, on the platform, attacking some member of that Committee, who would at the time have no chance of defending himself and explaining why he had voted for a given resolution or why he had not. He did not think the honourable member for Patea was incapable of doing this, and he must say it would be unfair to attack any member of the Committee on any resolution or amendment without his having an opportunity of explaining what he had done. If that could be done they would find that members of Committees appointed to deal with the question of the tariff would do like the honourable the senior member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout) and the other member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie)—refrain altogether from attending the Committee. There had, however, been those appointed to the Committee who had done their duty, and they had no right to be placed in a false position. Then, they had had correspondence sent in by manufacturers and commercial men, and, regarding this, the Government had treated the Committee with every confidence, but had not for a moment thought that that correspondence would be printed with the papers or become public. If those who had sent this correspondence had thought it would be made public the Government would never have received it. There must be confidence in dealing with such questions as this. He had not, in the first instance, moved that it should be a secret Committee; but, seeing what had eventuated, he asked the House to agree that, at all events, the minutes and the various resolutions passed and the references submitted should be treated as confidential. If the Government had been dealing with the tariff question he should not have objected at all, and should not have moved this motion, because they would then have had the tariff before them to have the resolutions passed into law. As the matter, however, was held over for a year, he asked the House to hold over the publication of the proceedings and the correspondence.

Motion agreed to.

LANDS IMPROVEMENT AND NATIVE LANDS ACQUISITION BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be read a third time,

Sir R. STOUT said,—I wish to make a few remarks on this Bill. I was not present when the honourable gentleman replied on its second reading, and I did not hear what was said; but there were one or two remarks made then that I wish to refer to, and I wish to put on record some things about this Bill that I think may be beneficial. Sir, this is a borrowing Bill. It proposes to borrow half a million. It proposes to raise this half-million in the colony, but it gives power to convert the half-million—once it is raised—under "The Consolidated Stock Act, 1877," and therefore to get the money from the London market. I do not think honourable members are aware of the total amount of loan-money that we now give the Minister to spend for roads independently of what comes out of the Public Works Fund, under "The Government Loans to Local Bodies Act, 1886," there was a sum of £200,000 to be set aside each year. That Bill is un-repealed. Under the Act of 1891 amending it £50,000 can be taken out of the £200,000 and spent on improving blocks of land, so that, if we add together the amount of money in this Bill, the amount of money that is in the Act of 1886, and the amount of money that is authorised by the Land for Settlements Act, we have the large sum of money for expenditure, or, rather, administration by the Minister of Lands, of practically £950,000.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—How is it made up?

Sir R. STOUT.—I will explain later on how it is made up. It has been said that the £50,000 taken by the 1891 Act cannot be spent because blocks cannot be found to spend it on. The fact is, blocks have been already proclaimed, and the estimated cost for improving those blocks has been put down at £150,566, and out of that sum only £67,833 has been expended, so that there is to expend on these blocks alone no less a sum than £82,733—practically two years' expenditure almost to go. It is true that last year only £30,000 was expended, but still there is £82,733 yet to spend over proclaimed blocks.—that is, assuming that the statement made in the Crown Lands Report is accurate. I assume that, although I notice here—and perhaps the honourable member will correct it—that the tables do not correspond with the statements; the figures are two or three hundreds out—there is some mistake somewhere. Now, honourable members may think the amount to be borrowed under the Bill is really to be spent in opening up lands for settlement. That is what has been assumed, and the preamble of the Bill says, "for the purpose of encouraging the settlement of the people upon the lands of the colony, it is expedient to give better access to such lands." The assumption is that this is to be used on roads to open up lands for settlement. Now, the fact is that that term has become quite a misnomer. Last year, and the year before, and away back—I am not saying this only of the present Minister, but of other Ministers—the money to be spent upon roads to open up Crown lands has not been spent upon roads to open up Crown lands at all, but simply on little votes given to various honourable members and various districts. Why, if we take, for example, the table in the Crown Lands Report this year—take, for example, one province, the Province of Nelson, in the schedule: that shows what areas are to be bene-ated by roads. There are several thousands of pounds expended there, but there is not a single acre of Crown lands benefited by the expenditure; though they are headed "Roads to open up Crown Lands for Settlement." In Canterbury very little was expended, but it was not to benefit Crown lands at all. Then, under Otago, there was a vote, for example, for the Henley protective works, and a vote for the Maruwhenua Bridge, and so on, but it did not affect the Crown lands in the slightest degree.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—The Maruwhenua Bridge did.

Sir R. STOUT.—I am taking it that the honourable gentleman's Crown Lands Report is accurate, and if honourable members will refer to the table annexed to the Crown Lands Report they will see that what I am stating is correct, and that the tables showing the roads to open up Crown lands do not give any area of Crown lands benefited at all by the Maruwhenua Bridge. In Table 9 you will see that; so that practically, of this sum of £250,000, more than half will be spent not in opening up Crown lands at all; it is simply in the nature of giving aid to settled districts to make their roads: and it is given on no principle whatever. I can understand aid being given to roads according to mileage, or the number of roads in a district, or on some well-defined principle, but, so far as this vote of a quarter of a million is concerned, it is to be spent at the sweet will of the Minister of the day. No doubt he has to have the approval of Parliament: but how is Parliament to deal with such a question? Members may reject a vote referred to them, but they cannot put on the estimates a vote for a road that may be more necessary, and it is an invidious task to ask honourable members to vote against a road put on the estimates for the member for some particular district. That is perfectly clear from what I have stated. Honourable members who look at the table will see a column in which is stated, "Area of Crown Land rendered better accessible"—by roads; and in some districts, as I have already said, there is no area rendered better accessible, using the term in the widest possible way.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—You are mixing up two things.

Sir R. STOUT.—I am not mixing up two things. I am mixing up miscellaneous roads and roads to open up Crown lands, and if the honourable member will refer to the table he will see I am right. If he will refer under this head he will see that is so. The honourable gentleman asked how I made up the amount of £350,000. I will tell him. First, under this Bill there is £500,000: that is made up of £250,000 for roads, and £250,000 for Native lands plus roads. Now, I do not think I am going too far in saying that, out of this £250,000, £50,000 will be for roads, so that we have roads £200,000 under this Bill. Then, there is a sum of £500,000 for roads called "Loans to Local Bodies," but still roads under the Act of 1886.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—The Minister has not that.

Sir R. STOUT.—The honourable gentleman should read the Bill. The Minister has the £50,000, and the other £150,000 is to be made applicable to the local bodies; I am only pointing out the total amount. That is £500,000 we are going to borrow for roads. This is how I make up the other £450,000: There is Native lands, £200,000; and lands for settlement, £250,000: altogether, therefore, £950,000 borrowed for roads and lands. Now, I do not think the House appreciates what the borrowing proposals may be. It is all very well for the Minister to get up and say, "If you do not vote this you will not get roads." Well, Sir, there are things just as necessary as roads, and they are financial security and economy. We cannot in a colony like this, or in any other country, get all we want in one year, and I say this is the greatest extravagance, and that the colony cannot stand it, and that is why I stated a little while ago that we must have increased taxation. What would be thought of a Minister in England borrowing at the same rate that we are borrowing? Our population is one-fifty-seventh of that of the United Kingdom. What would be thought if a Minister in England proposed a loan of £54,000,000 for the purchase of land and for making roads? They at once would imagine he was insane. They could come to no other conclusion. I will give an instance: What did they do in reference to naval matters in 1889? What did they propose there? It was thought an extravagant vote when the Ministry asked for—what? For twenty-one and a half millions, to be spread over five years. We want at the same rate fifty-four millions for one year. Or, if you like to take all these borrowing proposals together—I am not referring to the Consols, because they

4.30. may be used for this and other Bills—we have £1,500,000 for advances to settlers and £950,000 for lands for settlement, making £2,450,000 of borrowing; and, at the same rate, the Chancellor of the English Exchequer would have come down and asked for a loan of £139,000,000.

Mr. SEDDON.—What did they borrow to get the land back in Ireland?

Sir R. STOUT.—I do not know what the honourable member is referring to; but if any proposal like this had been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England, and he had come down and asked for £139,000,000, he would not have been able to maintain his seat for a single day. They would have considered him mad. And at the same rate we are asked to borrow an amount this year of £2,450,000. What I complain of in this Bill is that honourable members are continually having it thrown out at them that we do not want settlement because we do not agree to these borrowing proposals. But settlement proceeded when there was less borrowing just as quickly as now; and I say, except you lay down some well-defined scheme, that, in coming to this House threatening members by saying that they desire to oppose settlement and progress you are casting a slur upon us, and your schemes for borrowing must land the colony in endless financial confusion. What did the people of England do after the close of the Indian Mutiny, and the United States after the Civil War? They reduced the national debt after the Indian Mutiny by £132,000,000, while after the American War the debt was reduced by the sum of £245,000,000. What are we doing? We are going to add to the public debt; and it means that for every million we are borrowing it costs us the sum of £35,000 to £40,000 a year. I say it is better to keep to some well-defined scheme, and by the Acts passed in 1886 to 1891, if carried out, you can obtain and open up land for settlement without rushing into this mad scheme. Then, again, this £40,000 which we have to pay on every million borrowed could be spent in making roads; and if you want information on this matter we have only to look at what took place last year in the tables of the Crown Lands Report, and see what actually occurred. I shall say no more about that, except one word as to the reference the honourable member made in my absence. He said the district railways were rotten purchases. I do not understand what the honourable member means by continually harping back upon what some past Government did, even if they did something wrong in the past, instead of discussing the Bill before us.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—You said settlement in the past was carried on as fast as it is now.

Sir R. STOUT.—I said it was carried on faster. I was not harping back on the past; and I was only showing that we could have settlement without borrowing schemes. I admit at once there will be greater difficulty in regard to settlement now than there was in the past, and for the reason that men have to go farther into the interior, and, consequently, there will be greater difficulties. The honourable gentleman wishes to cast a slur on the Government that passed the District Railways Act. Well, the honourable gentleman voted for it, and supported it; and I would not have referred to the matter but for the fact that this session, whenever Ministers are put in a corner and cannot answer fair criticism, they harp back to something that took place between 1884 and 1887. There, again, they are casting a slur on the memory of a member of the very Government who assisted and supported the very thing of which they are now talking—the memory of a man they followed.

Mr. SEDDON.—You were responsible, as the head.

Sir R. STOUT.—I am not responsible, any more than the honourable gentleman is responsible. Each member of a Ministry is responsible for his own function. But this continual harping upon the actions of their late chief is not creditable to Ministers. The total amount spent on the purchase of the district railways was only £489,000; and what railways did we get for that? For that sum we got 183 miles of railway, and I undertake to say that no railways have been so cheaply bought in any colony in the British Empire. We got them at far less than they cost—about two-thirds of the cost; and then members should remember that in the case of those lines the colony was then paying 2 per cent. guarantee, and, as we got the money at 4 per cent., we were practically paying 2 per cent., and for this amount we got the Waimea-Gore line, the Duntroon-Hakateramea line, and the Rakaia-Ashburton line. Of course, the Rotorua line did not earn anything, because it was an uncompleted line, and until it was completed to Rotorua you could not expect it to earn money as a line for tourist traffic. But there was no objection to the purchase of that line. It would require too long a time to go into the defence of this matter, but it is easily defended, and the honourable gentleman, in talking so glibly, does not know what he is talking about. The honourable gentleman voted for the Bill in 1885, and he is now criticizing his own actions, and he is casting a slur upon what he did eight or nine years ago. I wish to say one or two words upon what occurred in Committee. I exceedingly regret that the Minister did not consent to some amendments in the Bill.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—So I did.

Sir R. STOUT.—Some of the suggestions I made I did so not for the purpose of injuring the Bill, but to make it more readable from a lawyer's point of view. When in Committee I did not oppose any clause, but anything I did was practically to make the Bill read better, and for the purpose of making our labours as perfect as possible. I am not going now to criticize the clauses of the Bill; I opposed clauses 2, 3, and 9, and I again repeat that they do not read correctly, and they are not what a lawyer would put together. I do not put the blame on the draftsman or the Ministry, as I know what happens. You get a Bill from the draftsman; the Bill goes through Cabinet, and amendments are suggested, and we often get the Bill here in such a shape as it would not be in if properly prepared at first. I wish to point out to the honourable gentleman that section 10 is entirely unmeaning. I pointed this out to the honourable member before. Section 10 says, "Any moneys appropriated to specific roads or bridges under this Part of this Act." There is not a single specific appropriation in the Bill. What is the meaning of it? The clause is utterly unmeaning. A clause like that could be made useful, and it is practically copied from a clause in the Public Works Appropriation Act; but it is not needed here, and is utterly useless, and it should not be here at all. I pointed it out to the honourable member, who did not think it necessary to deal with it. Another clause I wish to refer to relates to the conversion operations. I think that clause should be struck out. I refer to clause 24. I do not object to the Colonial Treasurer having the powers of conversion, but we ought to have one thing or another. If this is to be a local loan, why could we not take the money we are to get from our Consols, our Insurance, our Savings-Bank, or the Public Trust Office? If we are to rely on ourselves I see no reason why this section of the Bill should have been framed. I object in this Bill to the way in which we are borrowing in the colony. It is not as though we are raising the money in London, or for one, two, or fourteen years at 4 per cent. We do not do that. We write to the Agent-General and ask him to convert the stock we have issued in New Zealand. What does that mean? It is what was characterized by an English paper as "sly borrowing." We do not put the money on the London market; and when we go to the London brokers with this stock that is to be converted they do not think it is a new loan, they look at it simply as an old loan, and we are simply, by means of conversion, adding to a debt without informing our creditors. That is sly borrowing, and I do not think it is honest or fair to our creditors. The fair thing to do would be to go on the London market at once without resorting to this proposal. I believe we talk about the state of commerce and trade, but raising this money locally in this way does not tend to benefit either commerce or trade. It may be that we have money in the Savings-Bank and the Public Trust Office that cannot be invested, but that cannot be said when we are proposing to go directly to London for the purpose of borrowing money to lend to farmers. If we have money here we should have no need to go direct to London to borrow. I might have referred to the correspondence laid before the House relating to conversions, and told the House what really is the position of this question, but I do not wish to go further afield. I can only say, in reference to this particular Bill, that I think it is extravagant. I think it is too much borrowed money to spend on roads, too much borrowed money to spend on Native lands. The Minister might ask, What money scheme could be suggested without increasing the debt of the colony? Take "The Native Land Administration Act, 1886," under which the Minister could have got the Natives to lease their lands without buying it from them. That would not have injured the colony, and the colony would not have been plunged into debt. The only objection I have heard urged to that is that it would make the Maoris landlords. What do you mean by this Bill? If we borrow this money in London your real landlords will be the stock-owners at Home. They are the real landlords, and they get the sole power over us, and not the Maoris. The latter would have got their rents and spent the money in the colony. They are not people who are absentees; but under this Bill you are making your money-lender your landlord, in effect. He gets your money from you, he pays no taxes, but spends the money away from the colony, and you are giving this great benefit to absentees who pay no taxation and who spend your money out of the place at Home. I would further say, so far as the Maoris are concerned, they are utilising the land, and they can sell their rights to the Crown under the Native Land Administration Act. Parliament has the right to take from the funds the cost of rearing the lands and the cost of surveying the lands, and, so far as Native lands are concerned, you can get them without borrowing; and you get your land opened for settlement, and you cease to be responsible to the absentee bondholders, to whom you have to pay the uttermost farthing. I could show various ways of arranging a better scheme without increasing the burdens of the colony, and it is therefore nonsense of the honourable member to say that if this Bill is not passed there will be no progress of settlement. We can have settlement and progress without plunging the colony into debt, and, depend upon it, a few years will show whether those who are now talking of this Bill not plunging the colony into debt under this wretched borrowing scheme will not regret it.

Mr. WARD.—I should like to point out one or two fallacies in the speech of the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout). It is becoming customary in this House to make a comparison between this colony and England so far as our financial indebtedness is concerned. He said if England borrowed at the same rate as we are doing here she would require to borrow fifty-four millions per annum.

Sir R. STOUT.—No; £139,000,000.

Mr. WARD.—Surely the honourable gentleman, in fairness to the people of this colony, does not expect them to accept a statement such as that. Such a statement is calculated very seriously to mislead. What is the position? Take the honourable gentleman's own argument. Their population is fifty-seven times greater than ours. Take our indebtedness at forty millions. If the honourable gentleman's argument is worth anything, England ought at the present time to be indebted to the extent of how much?—£2,208,000,000.

Mr. BELL.—So she would be if you were Treasurer.

Mr. WARD.—I have no doubt the honourable gentleman is the possessor of what is commonly termed prescience. I have no doubt if the honourable gentleman had lived in times long gone by he would have been regarded as one of those forecasters of possible events whom it is desirable to get out of the road. It seems to me that in a case like the present the honourable gentleman's sense of reasoning for the moment is dimmed by his political prejudice against the Government. I think that is very much to be regretted. Now, coming to the arguments of the honourable member for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout), what is the position? According to his own argument, at the present time, it does not matter who is Treasurer of England—a position to which I do not aspire: I have quite enough to do as Treasurer of a country such as this—the position would be that England's indebtedness would be £2,208,000,000. Well, that would be so if the figures and arguments of the honourable gentleman were correct. The basis of the honourable gentleman's argument was this: That, England's population being fifty-seven times greater than that of this colony, if there were a similar proportion of debt their debt would be what he stated. I say their indebtedness under such circumstances ought to be £2,208,000,000.

Sir R. STOUT.—No;—ought not to be anything.

Mr. WARD.—We have been borrowing at a certain rate: that is admitted. Our population is fifty-seven times less than that of England. That is a certainty, is it not? I say, then, if the honourable gentleman's argument is correct, England's indebtedness ought to be £2,208,000,000.

Sir R. STOUT.—Ours ought to be a fifty-seventh of England's.

Mr. WARD.—At that rate, ours ought to be a fifty-seventh of £2,208,000,000.

Sir R. STOUT.—No; a fifty-seventh of England's debt.

Mr. WARD.—If it should be a fifty-seventh of England's indebtedness, England's indebtedness should be—what?

Sir R. STOUT.—Nearly £700,000,000.

Mr. WARD.—The amount of their public indebtedness is £671,000,000. Does the honourable member ask the people in this country to accept that as a fair comparison? Does the honourable gentleman not know that railroads and many harbour works which we pay out of public funds and include in our national debt, are made out of private funds in England? In this colony, who has made our railways and harbours? Has not that expenditure been added to the ordinary indebtedness of the colony? I say that it has.

Sir R. STOUT.—Not the harbours.

Mr. WARD.—A great many harbours. Very well, take the railroads, and leave the harbours out. The private indebtedness of England on account of railways is £1,000,000,000. If you add the £1,000,000,000 to the £671,000,000, it amounts to £1,671,000,000. The honourable gentleman, in making his comparison with England, left out that £1,000,000,000 of indebtedness. There can be no question about that. All I wish to point out in connection with the honourable gentleman's argument is the absolute fallacy of the honourable member's argument in making a comparison between our indebtedness and that of England, when he leaves out the cost of the English railways and includes the cost of our railways. The honourable gentleman said that if the English Chancellor of the Exchequer went on at the rate we are going on it would soon end in national bankruptcy. I say this country is going on at nothing like the rate England has gone in indebtedness in connection with railways and other works I have mentioned. Even on a population basis that is so.

Sir R. STOUT.—In the railways the shareholders have the liability, and are not paying interest.

Mr. WARD.—Yes; and in the financial proposals which the Government have placed before the country at the present time that is precisely our position. The taxpayers will not be called upon to pay the interest.

Sir R. STOUT.—Not for the roads?

Mr. WARD.—Not on the bulk of this money. In the case of the £1,500,000 for advances to settlers, the return of rents and interest would recoup the colony: it would not increase the taxation. Take the £500,000 out of the £750,000 to which the honourable gentleman has alluded which is for purchase of Native and private lands: the whole of that expenditure would at once become interest-bearing, either by rents or by actual interest payable upon the amounts so expended. The bulk of the money which is being asked for will be reproductive as far as earning-power is concerned. Just a word or two in connection with what the honourable gentleman has said as to the Minister of Lands having obtained authority to spend £950,000. The honourable gentleman knows that £200,000 of the moneys to which he alludes is under the Loans to Local Bodies Act, and the honourable gentleman knows that last year, out of that £200,000, only £50,000 was set aside for expenditure by the Minister of Lands, and, of that sum, only £30,000 was actually expended.

Sir R. STOUT.—I said so.

Mr. WARD.—That is the position this year.

Sir R. STOUT.—I said so.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable gentleman also said that the Minister of Lands had £950,000 for expenditure on these works. But I would point out that the local bodies apply for their loans in the ordinary course, and that that expenditure is not made by the Minister of Lands at all. As to the £250,000 which the honourable gentleman said was to be expended entirely on roads, the greater portion of that money, I understand, is to be used for the purpose of clearing land, with the object of promoting settlement. That ought not to be included in ordinary road expenditure. If the greater portion of the £250,000 is to be expended in the clearing of bush for settlement purposes, it cannot be used for road-making.

Sir R. STOUT.—Do you know what was spent last year for roads?

Mr. WARD.—£180,000.

Sir R. STOUT.—The Minister of Lands spent £176,000 himself, besides what was spent out of the Public Works Fund.

Mr. WARD.—I understand that the greater portion of that money was expended in the maintenance of main roads.

Sir R. STOUT.—About £22,000 only.

Mr. WARD.—Well, deducting that amount from £167,000, it leaves £145,000. There is a very material difference between that amount and half a million.

Sir R. STOUT.—That was only in connection with the Minister of Lands.

Mr. WARD.—I understood the honourable gentleman to say that the Minister of Lands had £950,000 under his control. If £145,000 was expended on roads last year, it appears to me pretty clear that there cannot possibly be the increase which the honourable gentleman suggests next year.

Sir R. STOUT.—That includes loans to local bodies. There will be about £350,000 for roads.

Mr. WARD.—So far as I can gather, there is nothing like that amount for roads alone provided in the financial expenditure of this year. I think my honourable colleague the Minister of Lands will be able to clear up that point. The honourable gentleman says, in connection with this road expenditure, that it is done upon no principle whatever. The honourable gentleman must know that this House, and not the Minister of Lands, is responsible for that; because the votes are placed before the House for it to affirm or reject. If there is no principle in the present system, the Minister of Lands is in no way responsible for that. He submits his proposals to the House after exercising the greatest care, and if the House assents to them I do not think the honourable gentleman should be accused of exercising no principle so far as this expenditure is concerned. My own view is that we should have the power of expending more annually in opening up roads for the development of settlement. I may point out that the London County Council spends a million every year on streets and roads. It gets no return whatever from that expenditure. But in the case of the bulk of the money the expenditure of which we are asking the House to authorise this year the Treasury will be recouped by the return of interest in the shape of rents.

Then, about these conversion operations: I think that was a most desirable provision. The honourable member, I know, is anxious to prevent the colony from becoming overburdened with debt, and so am I, and, I am sure, so is every member of this House; but the honourable gentleman ought to give others credit for endeavouring to exercise their intelligence to prevent that from coming about. Why are these conversion Acts on the statute-book at all? Conversion has of late years been used very successfully, and conversion was essentially part of the financial system of the colony. It is the natural sequence of obtaining money that in due course conversion operations should take place, and, if honourable members say that conversion is wrong, then the conversion Acts should be repealed.

Sir R. STOUT.—It is for the purpose of going to the London market.

Mr. WARD.—The honourable gentleman is mistaken. The conversion operations have been carried on openly in the London market. There was due publicity given, and the whole of the operations were well known on the London Stock Exchange. They were not kept in the dark upon the matter in the slightest degree; and to say that it was taking an unfair advantage in not doing the thing openly is to suggest what is not the case. I say that the conversions in the ordinary course have been carried out publicly, and were included in the deed-poll. The people most concerned would have the full knowledge of what was proposed to be done, and there can be no such thing as sly borrowing.

Sir R. STOUT.—The deed-poll is simply the power of attorney to your agents.

Mr. WARD.—It contains a good deal more than that. It contains the proposals for conversion. It ear-marks the conversion operations. It contains the amount to be converted, and the rates payable. Now, I think that the honourable gentleman, in suggesting that the speech of the Minister of Lands was a slur upon the late Mr. Ballance, was doing the Minister of Lands a great injustice. I say, Sir, that every one who was associated with the late Mr. Ballance has the highest estimate of his character, and the highest possible respect for his memory; and, further than that, I will say that the policy which the present Government has adopted is the policy which the late Mr. Ballance was himself favourable to, and it is ridiculous to suggest that the arguments of the Minister of Lands were a slur upon his memory. At that time Mr. Ballance was not Minister for Public Works.

Sir R. STOUT.—The Minister for Public Works had nothing to do with it.

Mr. WARD.—He was only a member of the Government who were responsible for the acquisition of the private railways.

Sir R. STOUT.—He was just as responsible as any other member of the Government.

Mr. WARD.—The Government as a whole were responsible, and the honourable gentleman had no right to select the late Mr. Ballance as one upon whom the Minister of Lands had cast any slur, because I say no member of the Government would cast a slur upon the memory of the late Mr. Ballance. I should like to say this with regard to the honourable gentleman's statement as to this being an accession to the indebtedness of the colony: that he ought not to overlook the fact that this is a progressive country, which, in the ordinary course, for many years to come requires to have settlement promoted, where there will be large annual expenditure for the opening-up of roads for the settlement of the lands of the colony. And yet the honourable gentleman blames the Government for bringing down the most reasonable proposals it can suggest to the House for carrying out the policy of settlement in the colony. If my honourable friend knows of a more practical proposal he ought to suggest it, because if he can suggest a better policy for obtaining the necessary lands, and for enabling those lands to be opened up, I think the members of this House would be only too happy to hear of such proposals, and, if they were good ones, to accept them. But, Sir, we have recognised that the lifeblood of this colony must not be sapped. Settlement must go on. People must be settled on the land. Further roads must be opened up, and the necessary lands must be obtained, and the Minister of Lands, in his desire to obtain further lands for settlement, must have the necessary means at his disposal to purchase and road those lands. And how are you going to do this great work unless you have the money to do it? I say that the measure now before the House is necessary in the present position of the country. I do not believe that any impartial gentleman, looking into the details of the Bill carefully, will say that this is an unreasonable amount of money to provide the Minister of Lands with to promote in every possible way the settlement of the country; and in my opinion increased taxation for this purpose is not justified, and will certainly not under these proposals be necessary. I can only say that the Minister of Lands has placed the whole position fairly before the House. This is part of the policy of the Government; and I do not admit what some honourable gentlemen say—namely, that the sum to be placed at the disposal of the Minister of Lands is any more than the circumstances of the country warrant.

Mr. BELL.—Sir, I should be very glad to have time to refer to one or two statements made by my honourable friend the Colonial Treasurer; but I remember that the number of his noughts is becoming almost historical, and I think he will, after reconsideration, be able to reply to himself—to reply to his own arguments outside this Chamber. I shall not occupy more time than I can help in referring to a matter which came up in Committee on this Bill. On that occasion I made a speech which the Hon. the Minister of Lands described as cruel, and he invited me to meet him on some country platform, and promised that his friends would subject me to such a bombardment of rotten eggs and bags of flour as would effectually close my mouth.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—The honourable gentleman is not quoting what I said. What I said was, if the honourable gentleman went to any country platform and made the same speech he would stand a good chance of getting rotten eggs.

Mr. BELL.—I do not want to argue about terms, but the Minister invited me to go with him to a country platform; and I will accept the statement now made by the Minister that if I expressed the same views I should stand a good chance of having my mouth closed with rotten eggs and bags of flour. He went on to say of me that I do not represent my constituents in the City of Wellington, and, in his own eloquent and terse phrase, he said, "You will never see Wellington again." As the proceedings in Committee are not reported, I think it is only fair to those who, whether I represent them properly or not, are at the present moment my constituents, and to the electors of this provincial district generally, that they should have an opportunity of knowing what I did say. I shall now briefly restate it, in order that on some future occasion, if, as the honourable gentleman thinks, they still hold with him, they may proceed to provide themselves with the unsavoury arguments by which he expects I shall be concluded, if not convinced. I am now going to restate the position which excited the indignation of the honourable gentleman. I pass by one matter with a mere reference. I advised the honourable gentleman to use that language not to me, but to his supporters on that side of the House; at which the honourable gentleman took what I conceive to be entirely unreasonable offence, which drove him to make a direct attack upon myself. I did not intend to say anything offensive to the honourable gentleman. The honourable gentleman indicated that he would offer opposition to me at the next general election in Wellington; but it is only in the nature of things that he should do what he has done in the past—that he should do his best to keep me out of Parliament. Had I been on that side of the House his opposition might have had some effect. Now, Sir, with the exception of one or two clauses in the Bill the third reading of which is now before this House, I supported it, as I have always strongly supported the expenditure of the moneys of the colony upon improving Crown lands before settlement. And I also with perfect consistency supported the amendments of the honourable member for Dunedin City to introduce in the earlier clauses of this Bill such a provision as would insure that the moneys raised should be expended on roads and bridges on Crown lands, and should not be used for the purpose of works in settled districts. I was, I say, consistent in that. I then said, and I reiterate, that roads and bridges are local works, the cost of which ought to be provided by the locality out of local rates, or local loans for which interest and sinking fund are provided by the locality. I said, and I reiterate, that there is only one exception to that rule—namely, that the Crown lands of the colony may be improved before sale out of colonial moneys, in order that higher prices might be obtained. I say that is proper finance, and carrying on the business of the colony on business lines. Then I was attacked and appealed to by the honourable gentleman and by others, who asked me what I had to say with regard to settlers who had recently been settled upon Crown lands and who were without reasonable means of access, and I replied that those men had obtained their land at a price or rent fixed having regard to that inaccessibility, and that, therefore, they ought themselves either to provide out of their rates the means of access to their lands, or to do it out of borrowed money, of which they themselves should pay the interest and the sinking fund; or that, if they were to have the moneys of the colony for that purpose, they should pay a betterment tax, inasmuch as their lands were let to them at a rent based on the inaccessibility, and made accessible out of borrowed money. To that the honourable member for Masterton gave an answer quite logical. He said that my premises was wrong—that, in fact, the price paid was a price which was only fair if the land had been accessible. I do not agree with him; but, if it is so, it shows how unjustly our land-laws are administered. Now, I admit, and never was so silly as to refuse to admit, that the construction of roads and bridges through a settled district might be necessary for the purpose of opening up Crown lands adjoining and surrounding it. I did not object, or seek to object, to expenditure of that kind, nor did the amendment of the honourable member for Dunedin City limit such expenditure; but what I said, and what

I reiterate now, is this : The honourable gentleman, the Minister of Lands, has taken a letter of license by this measure. He is permitted to expend the money either in the improvement of Crown lands or in the construction of roads and bridges within settled districts. He tells us he has still to lay proposals for specific works before Parliament; and I admit that, though I do not think it is put in very precise terms, but, still, I will concede that to him and admit it. But honourable members know that it is mere pretence to say there is anything in the schedule to prevent the Minister from spending the money as he pleases. The rolling of the log is not a new game, and never will be so long as you have borrowed money. I expressed the opinion that the honourable gentleman would not be able to resist the pressure brought upon him by honourable members and by deputations from districts. I said he would not be able to resist the pressure; and, indeed, honourable members on his side agreed with that view, and expressed a belief that the West Coast would get a considerable share of this money for settled districts. I want the borrowed money, if it be borrowed at all, to be spent upon the lands of the colony, and in the improvement of the lands of the colony, and not in the relief of settlers from local rates. If money is to be spent in that way, I do not see why I should not have a road made in the City of Wellington out of colonial loan-money for the convenience of its inhabitants. I object to that in principle; but it would be as justifiable as some of the things which the honourable gentleman has taken a license for under this Bill. I say the rolling of the log is not a new game, and the rolling of the log is beginning again as fast as the honourable gentleman can set it in motion by pouring borrowed money into the colony and laying these schedules on the table.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Mr. BELL.—It is not corruption. No honourable member has anything to gain to himself. But, instead of sitting here to represent the country, each honourable member thinks, when borrowed money is going about, that it is his duty to his constituents to get some of this money. He thinks it is part of his duty as a representative in this House to do that: and that is the injury which is done to our whole political system. The Public Works Statement is held back now just as it has been held back in the past, and the reason why it is held back is simply this: that it gives opportunity to measure the merit of a constituency, and the desirability of providing expenditure among that constituency, by the political conduct of the representative of that constituency in this House. Sir, that is the reason why the Public Works Statement is held back; there is no other reason.

Mr. McGOWAN.—What a fund of information!

Mr. BELL.—The honourable member for the Thames says, What a fund of information! I do not suppose I am giving the honourable gentleman any information in saying that. He knows it perfectly well without my stating it. I am simply stating a fact which he and other honourable gentlemen seek to keep out of the pages of Hansard. But it is a fact that by Bills of this kind, which give a license of this nature, the Minister is only seeking to carry on the same unfortunate and unhappy demoralisation and degradation, which has been subversive of the principles that should govern the representatives of the people in this House.

Captain RUSSELL.—I should like to say a few words, and to congratulate the House on the advance that is rapidly being made. The time was when there was no honourable member on the other side of the House who would allow there was any attempt to borrow on the part of the present Government. Sir, the most sophisticated arguments were adduced by members on that side, one after another, to prove that under no conceivable circumstances could it be alleged that any borrowing proposal had been submitted by the Government. I am glad to see, however, as we get on, and as the new members on the Government side are beginning to realise the true position of affairs, that they are beginning to admit there is very considerable borrowing in the proposals of the Government. It is a comfort, after sitting here for three months, doing very exhausting work to find there is still a laugh left in the honourable gentleman. It is no longer a question with the Government party whether there is borrowing or non-borrowing. It is now a question whether it is hundreds, or thousands, or hundreds of thousands, or millions; and they have not yet quite arrived at a conclusion, but they are beginning to think that it is a number of millions the colony is borrowing. The Colonial Treasurer just now was completely outside the mark when he endeavoured to prove that the senior member for Wellington City was wrong in his comparison between the debt of New Zealand and that of England. I do not know what the arguments he attempted to put forward amounted to, because the Colonial Treasurer got so confused that it was impossible to follow him. He went on to say that, if there was a comparison, it was a comparison favourable to New Zealand. He proceeded to speak of thousands of millions which were embarked in private concerns in the Old Country, which here are charges on the debt of the colony. But he forgot one or two essential particulars in the arguments he adduced. He drew his comparison of the railways in England and New Zealand, but forgot to tell the House this: that our railways are made entirely out of foreign borrowed money, that the locomotives of our railways are manufactured in Europe, the very rails they run upon are made outside, and the whole of the money therefore is borrowed, and interest sent back again from this country. He forgot to tell the House that the circumstances were entirely different in the case of England, inasmuch as there the whole of the money to build the railways is found within the four corners of England. The locomotives are manufactured there, and the railways are made in England with English money, and therefore money is not sent out of the country as in the case of this colony, but is only an investment of the country itself within its own borders. Our circumstances are altogether different. He did not say that England owns one thousand millions of money lent to other countries, and that, whatever embarrassment there may be in connection with railway investments, the interest the thousand millions return to the people of England is expended in England, and therefore there is not likely to be experienced there the distress that our borrowing will bring about in New Zealand. The honourable member for Wellington City spoke of the log-rolling which is going on very fast, and he takes a more charitable view of such matters than I do myself. He thought that the rolling of the log was primarily in the interests of the constituencies. I should take a different view to that. I should say it is primarily in the interest of the man who rolls the log, and that the constituency is quite a secondary consideration: to keep himself right with his constituency is probably the motive that gives the impulse to the log. But, unfortunately, now we should not compare the public-works policy with the rolling of a log, but rather with the rolling of a snowball. A short time ago this Government called itself a distinctly non-borrowing, self-reliant one that was rolling a comparatively small snowball. During the three or four years they have been in office they have kept rolling, and rolling, and rolling until their policy, like a snowball,—different from a log,—has been one of continual increase of borrowing, until now we find a snowball so large that probably the country will be unable to bear its weight much longer, and it will melt, under the genial sunshine of true criticism, until nothing is left of it but a mass of dirt accumulated in its travels. The Colonial Treasurer said to us, "It is all very well to say we must not go into debt; but how else can we get roads?" And he requested the senior member for Wellington City to suggest some scheme by which we could get roads without further borrowing. This Bill is most iniquitous, inasmuch as it mixes up two matters—one borrowing for the improvement of Crown lands, and the other for the purchase of Native lands. It was skilfully done, no doubt, inasmuch as there is £250,000 for the improvement of "new-acquired land," as it is termed; but, as has been pointed out by many honourable members who have already spoken, it gives power to the Minister to use this money in any part of New Zealand he thinks fit. Whatever the intention of the Government may be, there is no part of New Zealand in which roads and bridges cannot be made at the will of the Minister if he chooses. I may be told that Parliament will be asked afterwards to ratify what the Minister has done. We have seen a Serjeant-at-Arms sitting in this House against the will of honourable members, but because Ministers say, "Ratify this appointment;" so they will ratify any schedule the Minister may bring down. So long as they have their present majority, so long will that majority agree to, without consideration, anything put before them. So do not let us console ourselves with the idea that there is parliamentary control. We have seen the Minister in his somewhat passionate manner do what he chooses; and so with the same strong will he compels his followers to do what he chooses. And it is the Minister of Lands who is to arrange in the future wherever a road or a bridge is to be made, and his colleagues and Parliament may do what they like if they do not choose to agree with him. Here is an undesirable set of circumstances, a precious state of things. Colleagues and Parliament are to be cast aside, and the Minister is to do exactly what he pleases. The Minister may laugh, but he knows that I am correct in saying what I say. I have a thorough dislike to giving such power to the Minister. I am convinced it is injurious to the colony; and I am also convinced of this: that, though it may be held desirable to borrow a certain sum of money annually, even then there is no very urgent necessity for it—certainly not to the extent mentioned in this Bill. It is quite possible to get sufficient funds to carry on all the roading that is required at the present time without having to borrow. On further consideration of the subject, and after looking into the figures, I find that, as for the figures of the Colonial Treasurer and his argument, they are worse even than I supposed them to be. Now, taking the debt of England at £675,000,000—I do not know the exact figures, but some honourable gentleman told us it was about that—and adding the cost of railways, £1,000,000,000, we arrive at a gross total of £1,675,000,000 for the consolidated debt of England, with the railways added, as against £40,000,000, which is the public debt of this colony. But it has been pointed out that the population of England is fifty-seven times greater than that of New Zealand, which proves this: that, taking the railway debt as a part of the public debt of England,—which it is not,—and comparing the gross amount with the public debt of New Zealand, we find that if the public debt of England were to be of the same proportion as it is in New Zealand it would amount to £2,280,000,000, as against £1,675,000,000, which the debt of England coupled with the cost of the railways really is at the present time. However, if you take the figures in another way it will still show that the indebtedness of New Zealand is infinitely greater proportionately than that of England. Deduct the cost of the railways in both instances from the sums which I have already quoted and it will leave the balance still more unfavourable for the honourable gentleman's argument than it now appears, because, on the same principle, multiplying by fifty-seven—the proportionate population of England being fifty-seven times greater than that of this colony—if the debt of England were to be taken at the same proportion as ours, their public debt would amount to £1,475,000,000, instead of

£2675,000,000, which it really is. Probably if the indebtedness of the local bodies of both countries were also taken into account our position would appear to be really worse than it appears from the last calculation. As I have already said, I believe there is a better system of getting money to road the country than this very expensive system of borrowing that is now being urged upon the House, and it is this: Whatever our opinions may be upon the nationalisation of the land, every honourable member must agree that, as the larger proportion of land has already passed from the State into the hands of private individuals, the nationalisation of the estate of the colony is practically an impossibility, and therefore the Government might well continue to sell; though I know there are persons who think that to sell an acre of land is wrong. I hold a different opinion myself. But, leaving that on one side for the moment, there can be no question that, so far as the land-tenure of the colony goes, it is impossible to nationalise the land. Therefore, having parted with the land to a certain extent, would it not be better to sell or lease what remains, under the land-laws of the colony? For my own part, I have always held that what is called the lease in perpetuity is in itself most iniquitous. We are practically giving away the estate of the colony for no purpose. Though I am told there is interest chargeable on the leasehold, yet the fact remains that as the land continues increasing in value the State will not reap the advantage accruing from that increase. Instances of this increase will readily occur to every person. The value of some land will increase tenfold or even a hundredfold within the next fifty or one hundred years, and, as the persons who take up land under the lease-in-perpetuity system only pay interest on the original value, and as some of this land, which is now sold merely as country land, will be the sites, I hope, of busy and prosperous towns, the colony will derive no advantage whatever from parting with that land on what I call the entirely wrong system of giving it away instead of reaping the advantage which is to be got from it by selling it. We should do this, instead of borrowing largely: and the need for such sums as we are now asked to authorise for land-purchase does not exist, so far as any immediate requirement is concerned, because there are large areas of country still unoccupied and unsettled. And, though I think it desirable to buy Native land, there is no necessity for so large a sum as £250,000 being authorised for buying land in addition to the £50,000 a year already authorised. I do not care to discuss the amount which the Government will have at their disposal for making roads and for the purchase of Native lands. Under this Bill there is, to my mind, an iniquitous provision by which money apparently devoted to the purchase of Native land can in reality be employed to open up roads to give access to Native land. Take that definition in its narrowest sense and you will find that it affords opportunity for a great deal of Ministerial patronage. Take it in its widest sense, and there is scarcely a part of New Zealand in which money cannot be spent on roads and bridges under the nominal and flimsy pretext that it is being spent in giving access to Native lands. It seems to me to be quite wrong. However, reverting to the subject I was dealing with, I should very much prefer to see a certain sum devoted annually only to the purchase of Native land. Surely that would be wise and in the interest of the colony, because we must bear this in mind: We are now asked to pledge the credit of the colony, of every individual in the colony, for the purpose of giving away land to certain individuals—to certain favoured individuals, I may say. I do not mean that they will be favoured by the department; but, still, it must be felt that these persons will be favoured individuals; and yet every person in the community will be liable to taxation if the circumstances should be such that the Crown tenants are not able at any time to pay their rent: that is to say, all will then be liable to taxation for the benefit of the few. Now, surely it would be better, when a large piece of country is bought by the Government, that it should be opened up for settlement; and, instead of giving away the whole of this land to persons under lease in perpetuity, it would be desirable to divide it into such sections that you should have all kinds of settlers represented. In other words, what I advocate is that a certain area of land should be laid off for cash sales and a proportion for lease under the perpetual-lease system. The money derived from the cash sales should be expended in forming the main roads through the block, so giving employment to the perpetual-lease holders during the early days of their occupation. There is a great deal to recommend the perpetual lease, but nothing, that I see, to recommend the lease in perpetuity. But if the system were adopted that I suggest it would encourage persons with limited capital to take up land. I do not believe it is a wise thing to put persons absolutely devoid of cash on bush-land. To put men without one penny of their own on bush-land means that they will have absolutely nothing to live upon, and that they must live in continual hardship for many years—that sort of hardship which is incidental to the settler's life in a new district. I do not attach much importance to that, because the man who is not prepared to undergo hardship of that kind is hardly worth considering, and, if these men struggle on for years successfully, it will not be in misery, for so long as there is hope it will be nothing but a pleasure. But the inevitable result of putting men on the land without capital must, in my opinion, be that at the end of, say, five years or so these men will fail, and have to be bought out by those who have acquired a little capital, and they will reap the benefit of all that has been done by the original occupiers. Therefore, I say, such a scheme as this might be devised: that certain areas of land should be sold annually, and other lands opened up for selection under the per-perpetual-lease system, to allow those with small capital to go on the land; and the perpetual-lease holders would have the advantage of having roads made by persons with capital, who wish to settle on land, but are unable to purchase land as they wish to do. This was evidenced the other day by a letter which the honourable member for Wellington City (Mr. Duthie) read from a gentleman who had been anxious to settle in New Zealand, but was frightened away by the policy of the Government. I know, myself, of similar circumstances; but if sufficient land were opened up annually for sale, and if arterial roads were constructed through blocks to enable them to be comfortably occupied, this would be obviated. It seems to me to be an utterly disastrous policy to go in for further borrowing. But if we allow men with capital to purchase land, they would give employment to the perpetual-lease holders during the earlier years of their occupation, and there would be the double advantage of having the roads made out of the land—which seems a quite legitimate principle—and of giving employment to those men without capital who are prepared to go on the land, until they are able to make a living out of it. That is what I wish to see. I should like to make a remark upon the observation of the Minister of Lands that he declined to consider the position of the North Island Trunk Railway. Money has been advanced from the funds set apart for the construction of the North Island Main Trunk Railway for the purpose of making roads, and for other purposes in connection with the supposed advancement of that railway; and, seeing that under this Bill it is contemplated to take money out of a fund—money which has yet to be raised—to recoup the Consolidated Fund for the moneys expended up to the 31st March last—I cannot see why the principle should not be further extended. We are not likely to expend a quarter of a million this year, and why, therefore, a portion of the money advanced to the Public Works Fund from the North Island Main Trunk Railway Fund should not be restored to it, so as to allow the line to be pushed on, I cannot understand. I would invite the attention of the House to the fact that large sums of money have been paid from the North Island Main Trunk Railway Fund to make roads to give access to lands on the West Coast, particularly from Wanganui, Pipiriki, Hunterville, and other places, and I would urge that there is a legitimate claim on the part of the people who live in the neighbourhood of Gisborne and the East Coast to similar consideration; and I hope the Minister, when he has passed the Bill, which is inevitable, will take into consideration the large area of country on the East Coast which has benefited not one iota, and which under his proposals, unless my vision is distorted, will be liable to the further taxation which must be imposed on the colony within the next two years to make up for the expenditure under his administration.

Mr. HEKE.—I wish to express a few words

in reference to the amount set apart to be borrowed for the purchase of Native land. I think, myself, there is no necessity whatever to borrow more money to purchase Native land. I think the aim of this Government, and of every Government that may come into power, should be to try to settle all the Crown lands at the present time, and all the lands purchased from the Natives year after year, instead of borrowing more money for this purpose, which amounts to nothing but placing more taxation on the people. The aim of the Government should be to try to recoup all the money spent in purchasing Native land. If such a position could be taken, no doubt any Government that may come into power would be able to purchase Native lands when the colony is in a position to realise they are in the receipt of revenue that goes towards the extinguishment of money borrowed for this purpose. I know quite well every Government wishes to make a record in the purchase of Native lands. I think that is a folly that should be put a stop to for at least ten or twelve years, and the attention of every Government should be turned to settling the people on the land and getting a source of revenue to extinguish the money borrowed in the past. I intended to test the feeling of honourable members last night in reference to the amount set apart in the Bill; but I thought it was not advisable, nor of any use, to call for a division on it, as the evident inclination of every honourable member is towards purchasing Native land year after year, which I think to be a great mistake. Although I do not wish to say a great deal in reference to the moneys intended to be borrowed for roads and bridges—and I think it is advisable that money should be obtained for that purpose—I do not agree with the amounts, as the strain on the taxpayer is already heavy enough. The cry is raised at present to reduce the tariff. Well, I think, if the step in the direction I mentioned is taken it will be one in the right direction—namely, that of allowing taxation to be relieved on the taxpayer. I merely wish to protest against the large sum intended to be borrowed for the purchase of more Native land.

Mr. BUTTON.—I have only a few remarks to add to those I made on the second reading of the Bill. It appears to me that this Bill is simply a pill coated with sugar. The sugar in the Bill consists in its reference to roads and bridges; the nauseous part of the Bill has reference to borrowing money for this purpose. A little time ago the colony, from the North Cape to the Bluff, protested against any further borrowing, and I believe that nearly every member gave some pledge to his constituents that he would oppose any further borrowing. It was the cry throughout the length and breadth of the land that we had had enough of borrowing. I find on reading the papers that wherever a candidate spoke against increasing the debt of the colony by borrowing that sentiment was hailed with cheers. But now I find honourable members are ready to take this Bill—to swallow this pill, as I call it, because of its sugar-coating with reference to roads and bridges. I know that the country, from one end to the other, does desire that roads and bridges should be constructed; but before the last election the country had that before it just as much as it has now. The question was just as much the burning question before we addressed the electors as it is on the present occasion, and, notwithstanding that the country settlers felt the necessity for roads and bridges, they did not desire that these roads and bridges should be constructed with borrowed money. If the sentiment of the settlers has changed, then I say, Let us have roads and bridges with money borrowed on a fair and open basis—let it be understood we go in for borrowing money for that purpose, and let the roads and bridges be specified for which the money is to be borrowed. I should have far less objection to the borrowing of money if it were to be devoted for certain specified roads and bridges scheduled in an Act or declared by Parliament. But when I come to this Act there is neither one thing nor the other. There is no guarantee that any particular road should have any particular sum. Indeed, it appears to me not to give relief to present settlers at all. The object is not to construct roads for or give facilities to those already on the land, but the first object, I believe, is to provide roads and bridges in connection with land that is to be purchased; so that if this comes into effect the settlers who expect that they will get something that will help them will find themselves very much mistaken. I say that this Bill misleads the settlers now on the land, as it will be found to give very little relief to those who are at present on the land. I believe one of the main features of the Bill is to enable the Ministry to advance money to those who have no money, in order that they may go on rough bush-land and endeavour to bring it into workable order. I quite agree with the honourable member for Hawke's Bay in this respect. He has had experience in these matters, and knows that it requires a considerable amount of experience to prepare a man for a farmer's life; and you cannot, by simply advancing a little money to men, enable them to go on to rough bush-land and become successful settlers at once. I wish to emphasize this: that this Bill is what I should call a fraud. It pretends to be a Bill to assist with roads and bridges settlers already in the country, whereas it is nothing of the kind. The money is to be advanced in connection with lands that are going to be opened up, and not those already settled. I protest against this Bill. It is only a sweet morsel held out to tempt settlers, and is entirely misleading, and I protest against money being borrowed for this purpose. If the country from north to south has changed its mind with regard to borrowing, next session we shall have learned it, and be prepared to support borrowing for legitimate purposes; and what I call legitimate purposes are those we have already expended money on. I believe that the money we have borrowed in the past for public works will give far better value than any money expended under any of these experimental Acts which the present Government are initiating. I shall oppose the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—I shall support the third reading of the Bill. I voted for the second reading without making any remarks, as I did not wish to hinder the consideration of the Bill in Committee at the earliest moment. I should now have voted for it with much more pleasure had it had one or two alterations. I do not propose to discuss the Bill at any length, because I realise that at such a late period of the session the sooner we get some Bills passed through and into the other House the better for our prospect of an early close of the session. But I must express my opinion, in view of the fact that we have already agreed to raise £250,000 for the purchase of lands, that the amount proposed in this Bill is excessive. However, as the "true Liberal party" are strong enough to carry any sum that may be put in any Government measure, I suppose we must abide by the decision of the majority, and let the Bill go through. But there is one principle I regret is not put in this Bill, and that is the one embodied in the amendment moved last night, providing for the retention of the fee-simple by the State, and a periodical revaluation of the rent to be paid for land acquired under the Bill. I am a firm believer in State ownership of the land, and I think it is to be regretted that the House has, for the second time this session, refused to acknowledge this principle. The time, I think, is not far distant when the country will demand that the land-laws of the colony shall be changed and State ownership be recognised as the leading principle of our land-laws. It has been said that revaluation is unfair, but I merely point out that a revaluation may either be upward or downward. If the land becomes more valuable through the expenditure of public money and increase of population, or other causes, then undoubtedly the rental value of the land will be higher; on the other hand, if the value of produce falls, or if from various causes the value of the land is low, the rental to be paid will be reduced; therefore either way you look at it it is fair. I again express my regret that members of the House have, for the second time this session, refused to admit the principle of State ownership of land, with periodic revaluations of rent.

8.0. Mr. COLLINS.—I do not wish, Sir, unnecessarily to prolong the debate on the third reading of this Bill, but, as it is a matter in which I take a very great interest, and on which to my constituents I expressed very pronounced opinions, I feel justified in making one or two comments on the Bill at this stage. I may say, Sir, that during the election campaign I repeatedly and strongly advocated the purchase of Native lands for settlement purposes, and I have watched the passing of this measure through the House with a very considerable amount of interest, and interest of a very deep character. I am under the impression that this House has passed no more important measure than this during this session. The whole of the details have been so much discussed that I shall endeavour, for the few moments I intend to trespass upon the attention of honourable members, to confine my observations to one or two points. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay, who referred to the speech of the Colonial Treasurer, endeavoured to disparage the arguments that honourable gentleman put before the House by pointing out that there was a very distinct difference between the indebtedness of private companies in England and the indebtedness of this colony. Over and over again it has been suggested that, if, in referring to the indebtedness of the colony, we take into consideration the fact that this colony has engaged in very expensive enterprises which in the Old Country fall to the charge of private companies, the relative positions of the two countries would stand very differently. It has been argued that our indebtedness during the past fifty years has increased at a rate altogether out of proportion to the indebtedness of the Old Country. Sir, the Colonial Treasurer has pointed out—and I would again draw attention to the fact—that in the Old Country very large sums of money are expended upon works of a public character, which moneys are drawn from the purses of private individuals—of private companies. In this way more than one thousand millions of money have been expended during the past fifty years on railways alone. Now, what was the reply of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay to the Colonial Treasurer's argument on this point? He says there is no comparison, because the moneys so expended are expended within the Old Country—that is, within the country in which they are raised; they were their own, drawn from people in their own country, and did not represent loans, such as the money raised for this colony represents. But if the honourable member will deal with this matter fairly—if he will not draw, as has often been said, a red-herring across the scent on this point—I think he will see there is really a very cogent argument from this standpoint. Although it may be true that these moneys are withdrawn from private persons within the country, and are expended within the country, and so cannot be termed a loan, they nevertheless represent a loan drawn from one portion of the community, the interest on which very largely comes from another portion of the community. It may be termed a loan within the country as truly as honourable members have used the term with regard to the raising of Consols within this country. The argument is exactly the same. But I would draw the attention of the House to a remarkable difference between this country and the Old Country. What is the national income of the Old Country? It is £1,250,000,000 per annum, out of which £200,000,000 represents rent and £250,000,000 represent interest. No wonder the Old Country can find funds for the construction of her own railroads without raising external loans when there are classes of private individuals within the Old Country in receipt of such huge sums as £200,000,000 per annum for rent and £250,000,000 per annum for interest. No classes in this country are in receipt of incomes of anything like the extent of the incomes in the Old Land. And yet, what have we seen within the last fifty years? This country fifty years ago was, practically speaking, without any of the arts and appliances, the means and methods, of civilised communities. What has been done within the past fifty years? Within that time so effectually have the features of this country been transformed that persons coming from the Old Country now practically feel that they are simply stepping from one portion of Great Britain to another. They find all the means and appliances characteristic of civilised and settled communities. Now, it was impossible that this could have been done by expending money belonging to those within the colony. The people who came here were not the possessors of millions in rent and interest, and, when public works demanding such an enormous expenditure had to be carried out, it was absolutely necessary that these moneys should be obtained from a country where people were in possession of moneys that could be lent out for this purpose. I think, when we take these facts into consideration, we shall really see that there is a very considerable amount of argument, and of cogent argument too, in the material advanced by the Colonial Treasurer. Sir, I am convinced that no measure has been more demanded by the country than this measure for the settlement of the Native lands. As I said before, it is not my desire now, once again, to traverse the details of the measure. I simply desire, on the third reading, to say I believe no more useful work will have been accomplished this session than the bringing of the Native lands within the possibility of immediate settlement. I believe that will add materially to the prosperity of the country. And, Sir, while it has been urged, and may still be urged, that we are losing sight of the towns, I would again point out that the success of the country means the success of the towns, the prosperity of the country means the progress of the towns; and I feel quite convinced that if honourable members would only take a broad and generous view of the matter they would realise that they could not do better work than by setting themselves to the passing of this Bill.

Mr. EARNSHAW.—I am opposed to this measure because it is one of the number of borrowing Bills, and I oppose it all the more because of the very peculiar ground the Government have taken up in this matter. The Government, having seen, generally speaking, that the centres of population in New Zealand were opposed to a borrowing policy, and realising that it was necessary for them to control and hold the country votes, have, with great astuteness, put the borrowing to what may be termed country purposes. In other words, instead of raising money to enter upon a public-works policy, they are raising money primarily for the country districts—that is, under cover of the department of the Minister of Lands. Now, there is one amendment which the Minister has himself made in clauses 4 and 5 which I think is a very proper amendment, and that is, the striking-out of the word "person," and putting-in of the words "number of working-men comprising an association." That, of course, will stop any man from being able to pick out the eyes of the Crown lands, which, with the Bill as it came down to us, would undoubtedly have been done. However, I oppose the Bill because it seems to me that, as has been well said, log-rolling, so far as the country votes are concerned, will be the order of the day. I endeavoured to get the word "Crown" inserted before "Lands" so as to read "Crown Lands Improvement," and I think I had good grounds for doing that, seeing that this House had voted a million and a quarter for the purchase of lands for settlement, and that in this Bill it also proposes £200,000 practically for the purpose of purchasing Native lands—that is, £200,000 for lands and £50,000, I believe, for roading these lands. Now, I think if we had a far smaller amount for roads and bridges, and confined specially to land the Crown is purchasing, then the Crown would get back the money by the enhanced value it would put upon these lands before they were settled upon. The Bill as it is now gives the Minister of Lands the control of half the votes in this House, and that, I believe, is really the main object the Government have in view in putting the Bill forward instead of bringing down the proposals in connection with public works. That, at any rate, is the way in which I look at it. This Bill, and Bills which the Minister of Lands has brought down, practically covers £800,000 of loan-money, and I say there was no member of this House returned to support any such policy. I am quite sure of that, for I have read most of the speeches of honourable members when they were addressing their constituents. I think I have read nearly every speech of every member. I went through them all, and my opinion is that the whole, or nearly the whole, party were returned to carry out the policy of the late Mr. Ballance—a non-borrowing self-reliant policy; and, instead of that, here we have proposals for £800,000 of borrowing for dealing in lands and roads. Behind this, we have other proposals for advances to settlers, and the Consols to wipe out the present issue of Treasury bills. I think, as I said before, the Government should have allowed honourable members to consult their constituencies as to whether these proposals were what they desired or not. I quite realise that no country member in this House can trust himself to oppose this measure, because every country district in New Zealand is in want of better roads—wants roads to sections that have been sold in the past but which are inaccessible, and the general wish is to see every district developed. Of course, if any country member were to oppose a measure of this kind he would be in very great danger of coming into conflict with his constituents. I quite admit that it has been a very astute move on the part of the Government to put the new policy under the administration of the Minister of Lands, because, if they had come down to the House with borrowing proposals for public works for the construction of railroads, there is no doubt that those members who have no railroads in their districts could not have supported the vote. At the same time, though this vote is under the Minister of Lands, yet, practically, it is just as much a vote as if it had been raised for public works, because the sums of money that would have been taken out of the Public Works Fund will not come under this heading, and larger sums can be voted for public works and for railways. Whichever way you look at it, it simply means, after all is said, that the public works are to be supplemented by £300,000, because there is £250,000 for roads and bridges under this Bill, and there is £50,000 under the 1891 Act. It is very curious that, when in Committee, the Minister made very indistinct statements with regard to these loans to local bodies. First he did not know anything at all about it, then he was not going to use it, and then he made another remark, that it would be in one of the schedules he would bring down. That he should have made the three statements is one of the curious things that we often hear from the Ministerial benches. Then, there is the £50,000 more for Native lands. That really means £350,000 for the roads and bridges of the colony this year. Now, I say no member of this House was returned to support any such proposal. Not a country member was returned on that condition. Of course, there is also the £250,000 for land for settlement, and £250,000 for Native lands, making £450,000 for land-purchases this year. I am a strong believer in, and have always supported, the idea that the proper function and duty of the Government was to deplete the cities and get men on the land as fast as they could do this properly. There is no need for the Government to go in for this excessive land-purchasing when we have such a large amount of Crown lands available and already in our possession. It would be better that the money should be devoted to the roading of Crown lands we have already; and I consider the Government could open up four times the amount of land—land quite as good as the land they are purchasing under this Act. Of course, these lands are not so accessible as the land they intend to acquire, but I have always held it is not the duty of the State primarily to find land where the people desire it. So long as there is land vacant in the colony, there is the place for them: so long as the Government give them proper access to it, that should be sufficient. Now, I said before that I believe this money will be spent for log-rolling and controlling votes in this House, and that the bulk of it will not be spent in developing the Crown lands that the Ministry are going to purchase. I am sure it will be found that, when the Public Works Statement comes down, the ordinary sums of money that we have found in the past appearing in that Statement for roads and bridges will really come out of this vote, and therefore this means simply and purely the raising of loan-moneys for a public-works policy. I am opposed to this policy in every shape and form, and therefore I shall vote against the Bill.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Sir, it is not my intention to refer to the speech just delivered by the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw). He has thrown no new light upon the subject, and what he has given is simply a repetition of what he has said several times already this session. I intend, however, to occupy the House for a few minutes in connection with the remarks made by the senior member for Wellington City with regard to the Bill, and I am also going to refer to the medium member for Wellington City before I sit down. I regret very much indeed, and more so than anything I have had to do in this way in my life before, to have to get up here to-night and say what I am about to say. I am sorry that the honourable gentleman has forgotten his friends in the country who did so much for him in the past. Those are the bonâ fide settlers of New Zealand. I am sure that those people have done very much for the honourable gentleman politically. The honourable gentleman may laugh, but there is no doubt about it, and he knows it; and he also knows it is true that he has done his best to damage this Bill and to prevent it from becoming law—a measure which is intended to assist all bonâ fide settlers to go on the land, and to assist them when they are there. If this assistance is not given them, then, as a matter of course, settlement and progress will be checked to a large extent. I am not going to refer to the matter the honourable gentleman brought up in connection with the question whether the borrowing of money in the Colony of New Zealand or the borrowing of it in London is better, as I think my colleague the Colonial Treasurer has answered that matter sufficiently without its being necessary for me to refer to it. I come now to the question of opening up lands for settlement, and on this matter I have something to say to the honourable gentleman. The honourable gentleman told us this afternoon that land was opened up in the past without the expenditure of money in this way. This statement surprised me very much, and I challenge the honourable gentleman to prove to this House and to show where lands have been opened up in the Colony of New Zealand without large expenditure of money. I ask him, how is it possible that land can be opened up for settlement without the expenditure of money, and how is it possible that you can put people on the land, and get them to settle down, and give them access to that land, without in the first place considerable sums being expended to enable them to get on to it? In the Province of Otago in the old days the honourable member will remember, probably, what was the very first question. Was not the very first question in the life of that province the matter of the construction of roads and bridges?

Mr. Earnshaw

The same thing occurred in the settlement of Canterbury: when that province was opened up the Provincial Government received large sums from some of their lands; but where is that revenue now? Where are the millions that were got from land revenue at that time? Sir, it has not been spent on roads and bridges. The honourable gentleman must know that there were in those days very large revenues received from the sale of the lands, and spent on the land itself. Those lands were near the sea-coast.

Sir R. STOUT.—They had no railways.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—The lands were near the harbours, and the roads could be easily made to them; but now we have no lands of such value. We cannot get revenue of that sort; and what are we to do? Are we to check settlement, and say to the settlers we are not going to help them? It is useless talking like that, or, indeed, about what was done in the past when large sums of money were available from the sale of these lands. We have no such advantages now. We have only poor remnants of land away in the back-country, and if these happen to be of any value they must be opened up with the assistance that this Bill is going to give. The honourable gentleman was very misleading in the statement he made to this House with regard to the amount of money to be placed at the disposal of the Minister of Lands. He said that £950,000 was to be at his disposal under these measures this year. In the first place, the honourable gentleman referred to the £750,000 to be provided by the three sums which this House is about to pass, and he added £200,000 which is at the disposal of the Government under the Loans to Local Bodies Act. Now, the honourable gentleman must know that he was deceiving this House when he made the statement that £150,000 out of the £200,000 for loans to local bodies was available; because that sum is not available to the Minister in any shape or form. That money is only available for the local bodies on their making proper application, and after first appealing to the ratepayers to sanction such application. On the receipt of these applications from local bodies the Colonial Treasurer finds the money for them, but they have to show him first of all that they have passed the necessary order, and have sufficient revenue in their districts to provide both the sinking fund and the interest on the loan. This money is not a loan to the Minister of Lands at all in any shape or form: in fact, I have nothing to do with the transaction in connection with such advances to local bodies, nor have I anything to do with the expenditure. It is a matter that goes direct to the Colonial Treasurer, who deals with it entirely. Then, with regard to the honourable gentleman's statement that the Minister of Lands was authorised to spend £50,000 under the Act of 1892, what has been the result of that Act? Last year we were only able to make use of £30,000, and during the whole time the Act has been in force £67,883 was the total amount out the £150,000 we could use within three years; therefore the honourable gentleman can see that in asking for this money the Government are not doing any more than what they proposed to do when the former Act was passed.

Sir R. STOUT.—Why did you not use more?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I have explained this several times to the honourable gentleman, but he will not have the matter explained to him. I have explained to him that it has been impossible to get blocks of land suitable for the purpose that we require. We only had a few blocks of land which were suitable. The other lands recommended were not suitable, because, if we load the lands with the amount as required by the Act, the settlers will have to pay for interest such sums as will make the land so dear that they will not be able to pay the amount. The honourable gentleman does not understand the question, and I think I shall have to get him down to my office and give him a lesson on the subject. Out of this £150,000 which was at the disposal of the Treasurer for the local bodies last year, only £87,000 was granted, and this year we do not know what may be granted until the applications are made, but I can tell the honourable gentleman that not a sixpence is available for the purpose of opening up lands for settlement from that source. Now let us come to the three sums of £250,000 which he referred to and which made up the £950,000 with the £200,000 added. Taking the first amount of £250,000 for land-settlement in the South Island, I ask this House and those honourable gentlemen who come from the South, where are we going to get land for our young settlers and farmers' sons in the South Island? We have no Crown land to put them on. The honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. Earnshaw) said there was plenty of good land, but I will pay him handsomely myself, out of my own pocket, to show me, if he can, where the land is. The honourable gentleman does not know what he is talking about, as there is no land in the South Island available. Where is the land in Canterbury? I appeal to the Canterbury members, and I ask them what they have got to say for the future of Canterbury in regard to land-settlement. There is no room for progress or any extension of settlement in Canterbury or North Otago, and I should like to see any member of this House prepared to go before his constituents and say this money is unnecessary in North Otago, Canterbury, and Hawke's Bay. I say it will be no burden to the taxpayers of the Colony of New Zealand, such as was pictured by the senior member for Wellington City tonight. The colony will lose nothing by the transaction, and other parts of the colony will not have to bear anything in the shape of additional taxation. Let us take the next £250,000—for the purchase of Native land. Surely honourable members from the North must know, if we are to get the land in the North Island that we require for settlement, the only land that we can get is Native land. Some honourable gentlemen would tell us that the policy of the Government should be to open up these Native lands to a few wealthy speculators and lawyers in the North Island, and land-monopolists, who will swindle the Natives out of it. That is the policy some honourable members would like to see carried out; but it is not the policy that the Government intend to adopt. We say that, in regard to these Native lands, we should get them at a fair price and open them up for settlement, so that in time the colony will be recouped every sixpence it has paid for them, and interest also; therefore there will be no loss to the colony. Let us now come to the £250,000 to be provided under this Act for the opening-up of Crown lands. What does that mean? It means that many settlers at the present time are not able to get to their farms or from their farms for several months in the year, and it means that when this money is spent they will be able to get access to them, and there will be prosperity and progress of settlement. With regard to this matter, I say the members for Wellington City (Sir R. Stout and Mr. Bell) do not represent their constituency as they ought to do; and I ask, how can we settle all those lands from Hunterville to Ruapehu without giving the settlers assistance? How can we get settlers to take up all the country there, those beautiful valleys, and the Awarua Block, and say to them they are to find the money themselves to make the roads and bridges? It is impossible. It cannot be done without some assistance. It means to the City of Wellington the opening-up of a new province; and I tell every elector in the City of Wellington, from the smallest tradesman to the largest merchant, that his interests are not being represented in this House by the honourable members who made those speeches here

8.30. to-day. There are one or two more remarks which I should like to make in reference to the senior member for Wellington City before I refer to the medium member for Wellington City. The senior member accused me of stating certain things in reference to the purchase of the district railways when he was not present.

Sir R. STOUT.—I saw it in the newspapers.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—It does not matter where the honourable gentleman saw it. I may state that I did make a statement in connection with the purchase of the district railways—that rotten transaction from the first to last of the purchase of the district railways. Why did I make it? The honourable gentleman attacked the Government of which I am a member, and he also attacked myself, with regard to what he alleged to be our borrowing propensity, as shown in our measures. If these allegations had been made by a member who never himself had any connection with borrowing we might accept the rebuke; but in this case they were made by a gentleman who was a member of a Government which borrowed largely—for instance, for the purchase of the district railways—and I venture to say that during the time he was in office he made very large applications to Parliament for borrowing purposes.

Sir R. STOUT.—How much?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I cannot say how much, but it was a very large amount. Then, the honourable gentleman referred to the policy of my late chief, and said I should not have referred to this matter because he was a member of the Government which purchased these railways. But I say, with regard to the policy of my late chief, Mr. Ballance, that the Bill now before the House is an extension of his policy. He was my colleague when I introduced the Loans to Local Bodies Act, under which £50,000 was authorised, and also when £50,000 was authorised for the purchase of land under the Land for Settlements Act, and also £50,000 for Native lands. On all those occasions my late colleague told me that the sum was not sufficient, but that it was as much as he could ask the House at that time to sanction. I have no doubt, if he were here now, he would be a supporter of the policy of the present Government. The honourable gentleman has got some policy under which he is prepared to open up Crown lands without money. I say he would be the greatest benefactor to this country, or to any country, if he would bring down such a policy and explain it to the House, and let us get to work upon it. But I may say that I have never seen how that was to be done. During my career in this colony I have always found if one wanted any work done one had to find the cash for it. I say it is impossible to put people on the land without spending money. Now with regard to the medium member for Wellington City (Mr. Bell). I have already said that that honourable gentleman did not properly represent his constituents last night. I have no doubt he thinks he does; but, from my point of view, he did not do so last evening. I would not have referred to this matter to-night if the honourable gentleman did not apparently wish to place on record in Hansard the speech which he made last evening. I ask the honourable gentleman, how is it possible for him to say that the opening-up of land in the interior of the Wellington Province does not benefit the City of Wellington?

Mr. BELL.—I never did say that.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Well, how are you going to open up the land? I venture to say that if the honourable gentleman would go into the country districts and preach the policy which he has suggested I would not like to be responsible for what happened to him. The honourable gentleman said that I used towards him last night language which I should have reserved for members on this side of the House. I deny that, however, and will only say that I should be careful to use no language to one honourable member which I could not equally apply to another, and I am sure, Sir, that you do and will see that no language is applied to one member which may not be applied to another. The honourable member, however, is new to politics. I can quite understand that he is rather thin-skinned with regard to any attack made upon him in this House. The honourable gentleman imagines, I have no doubt, that he is sometimes browbeating a witness in the witness-box when he is addressing some members of this House. I believe the honourable gentleman is being trained slowly to be a very good politician, and I think that his listening to such remarks as I am making this evening will do him a great deal of good, and that he will be a better member next year than he has been this. I am going to deal very gently with the honourable gentleman, because I know he does not like to be struck very hard, and I should not like to do that. Last night I attacked the honourable gentleman rather warmly for a little time, but I am not going to do that at the present time, and I see, moreover, that he is taking the thing very pleasantly. The honourable gentleman says that it is impossible for the Minister to resist certain pressure which may be brought to bear on him. Does the honourable gentleman mean to say that any pressure can be brought on myself in connection with these roads and bridges? I venture to say that the honourable gentleman will not say that. Large numbers of honourable members have waited upon me from time to time in reference to various matters, and I am sure that none of them has brought pressure to bear upon me successfully, and that I have not acceded to any request unless I could see that it was in the interest of the colony. Then, with regard to log-rolling.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What does it mean?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I think it means, in politics, "You claw my back and I will claw yours." In other words, "If you only manage to give me a road or a bridge I will give you a vote in this House." I suppose that is what it means. I may say, in connection with this Bill, that my desire is to get the country settled; and when the honourable member for Hawke's Bay accuses me of making passionate appeals to honourable members, and carrying those appeals even to another place—namely, into the Cabinet-room—I am sure no member of this House can accuse me of having made a passionate appeal on the floor of the House for anything I was directly interested in myself. I venture to say that if I have ever spoken with earnestness—and when I am convinced as to the rights of a thing I always speak with earnestness—it has been when dealing with the question of doing something for the assistance of the settlers of New Zealand. I arrived in this country when I was a very young man, and I have had to make two homes for myself, and I know the difficulties of a young settler in a new country. Both in this House and in another place I have always done my best to assist the settlers of this country to get homes and land for themselves. I know as a fact that, without good roads and good bridges, in many cases settlement may be of very little value. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay referred to the large sum of money which has been taken out of the loan for the North Island Trunk Railway, and he said that that money ought to be paid back again. During the time I have been in office I have constructed a road out of this money from Pipiriki to Hunterville at a cost of something like £43,000; and I venture to say that road has done a great deal of good to Wellington, and it has opened up a very large area of country which was almost unknown when I took office. How is it possible to expect settlers without means to do a work like that, to open up such a large tract of country? We have put a road right through the whole of the Waimarino Block, of 400,000 acres. That block was bought by my late chief, Mr. Ballance, at something more than 2s. an acre. A very large proportion of the block has since been sold as high as £1 an acre, and some parts far more than that. I think the average price was 17s. 6d. per acre. The construction of that road has been the making of that block, and it has added to its value to that extent. And I say, through this Bill we are now passing, the same thing will apply in connection with large blocks of Native land in the North Island which, without some assistance such as we can give, would have to lie dormant for years to come. At any rate, it is a work which no settlers could undertake themselves without some assistance from the colony. I have one or two words to say with reference to the remarks which fell from the honourable member for Auckland City (Mr. Button). He, of course, differs from the other two lawyers, the honourable members for Wellington City. He has quite a different opinion as to this Bill from that held by those honourable members. They said that this Bill is meant to open up land already settled, and not Crown land at all. But the honourable member for Auckland City says it is all for the Crown land. When these three eminent legal luminaries disagree in reference to the meaning of this Bill I am sure honourable members will agree with me that they do not know much about it. The honourable gentleman says the whole country is pledged against borrowing. He said he read it in the newspapers. What newspapers has he been reading? I venture to say that the only newspaper which he reads is the Auckland Herald, and that is the organ of the "National Ass." He gets his information from it. I advise the honourable gentleman not to take his information from that newspaper, because there are other parts of the colony besides Auckland where gentlemen make speeches and have made pledges, and know what they said about them. I venture to say that on every platform upon which I spoke I said that I really must get more land and more money for the purchase of land for settlement, if settlement was to progress. Every honourable member who supported the Land for Settlements Bill during the last election must have known that it was necessary to take more money to buy land. I have just one word to say to the honourable member for Christchurch City (Mr. G. J. Smith) in connection with the lease in perpetuity. The honourable gentleman seems to think that provision for revaluation ought to have been inserted in the Bill last night. I could not accept that amendment in this Bill by a side-issue, commencing with the revaluation on working-men only. I would say to those honourable members who believe in revaluation that it is their duty to bring down a resolution, and test the question in the House. Let us not try it in one Bill like this; but let us have a resolution which, if it is carried in this House, will apply to every Bill dealing with land we have got, so that we shall have the same policy throughout the whole of our land-legislation. When that time comes, I will give every opportunity to any honourable member who may choose to bring forward the question to have it discussed on the floor of this House. I say it is the duty of those honourable members who believe in that system to try their strength, and see where they are in the House. If they do that, they will see what their position is, and whether the country believes in their policy. But let me say this to them: It must not only apply to the lease in perpetuity, but also to the freehold, because, if it is to be fair at all, it should be a resolution to the effect that no more land in the colony should be disposed of except on lease with revaluation. That would be a fair test-question to go to the country on; and it would be a fair test to ask the Minister to introduce the system into the land-laws of the colony. Let us not have a big question like this settled by a side-wind. Let it be fairly settled in this House, and let us see if any member is strong enough to carry such a resolution. I have, Sir, to thank those honourable members who have supported me in this Bill, and I conclude by expressing the hope that the Bill will give all the benefits that I and those who support it expect of it.

Sir R. STOUT.—I wish to make a personal explanation, Sir. The Hon. the Minister said he would like to know where I got my information from with reference to the amount of money that could be expended on blocks under "The Government Loans to Local Bodies Act Amendment Act, 1891." I would explain that the information was obtained from the honourable gentleman's own report, C.-1, page 12, laid on the table this year.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Wednesday, 26th September, 1894.

First Reading—Third Readings—Cheviot and Pomahaka Estates—Shops and Shop-assistants Bill—Government Railways Bill—Land for Settlements Bill—Factories Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Lands Improvement and Native Lands Acquisition Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

CHEVIOT AND POMAHAKA ESTATES.

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND asked the Government,—(1.) How many settlers have taken up land in the Cheviot Estate, particularising the different classes of land so taken up, the total acreage of each class, and the number of settlers to each class? (2.) How many of each class of settler is now settled on the land? (3.) What acreage of the estate remains undisposed of, and how many settlers of each class will such residue provide for? (4.) Similar information as above in respect to the Pomahaka Estate?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said the reply of the department was as follows:—

"Cheviot.—The number of settlers who have taken up land on the Cheviot Estate up to the 21st June, 1894, was 317, and the acreage and classification is as follows:—

System.	No. of Sections.	No. of Settlers.	Area.
Town lands, cash ...	56	47	A. R. P. 13 2 20
Suburban lands, cash ...	25	25	125 1 13
Rural lands, cash ...	9	9	6,366 2 25
Lease in perpetuity...	107	107	23,936 2 38
Village-homestead ...	90	90	2,418 1 21
Grazing-farms ...	31	31	43,633 0 6
Pastoral ...	8	8	3,171 1 6
Totals ...	326	317	79,627 3 34

"The number of settlers on the land on the 21st June was 171, exclusive of children and persons employed by settlers; but the time allowed for residence has not yet expired. The number of each class cannot be given.

"The acreage remaining undisposed-of is 3,066 acres, which is to be retained for future village, recreation, and other reserves.

"Pomahaka.—The number of selectors who have taken up land on this estate is eighteen. They are all of one class—rural lands. The total acreage occupied by these settlers is 4,548 acres 3 roods and 22 perches. The acreage of the estate undisposed of is 2,717 acres 1 rood 38 perches; providing sections for eleven more persons."

SHOPS AND SHOP-ASSISTANTS BILL.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON, in moving the motion standing in his name, might refer, first of all, to Standing Order 141, which said, "Whenever any matter of privilege or order arises it shall be immediately taken into consideration." If it had not been that the writer of the letter he complained about stated that he was present when everything which was said by Mr. Tregear before the Committee was spoken he would not have troubled himself with what appeared in newspapers; but, coming from the quarter from which it came, it would be throwing discredit on what he had said if he did not contradict it; and he thought the Council should permit the evidence given by Mr. Tregear to be printed. He would read the letter:—

"The Shop-hours and Mr. Tregear.

"To the Editor.

"SIR,—A report in your paper of this morning narrates that the Hon. Mr. Swanson, in speaking to the Shop-hours Bill, quoted from Mr. Tregear's evidence before the Labour Bills Committee to the effect that the half-holiday closing would be a hardship on the small shopkeepers. As one of those who were present when Mr. Tregear's evidence was given, allow me to state that the two hours during which he was examined were spent in giving his reasons why the holiday should be compulsory. At the end, however, after much sentiment had been talked about shops kept by widows, cripples, and others—people who gleaned their profits when other larger shops were shut—he was asked if he thought closing such shops would be a hardship to them, and he answered that he supposed it would. I hope his evidence in full will be printed.—I am, &c.,

"LIBERAL."

The insinuation contained in that letter was that he had put words into the mouth of Mr. Tregear which he never uttered. He would read some of Mr. Tregear's evidence:—

"Hon. Mr. Richardson.] Do you know the feelings of the shopkeepers themselves in regard to this legislation?—I have attended several meetings of employers in Dunedin, Christchurch, and Auckland, and here. I considered that the employers came forward in the most manly way to meet the wishes of the assistants."

The witness, Mr. Tregear, seemed to see that the large shopkeeper could get a holiday whenever he liked, and that his business could be carried on by his assistants as well in his absence as when he was present, and very likely a little better. He did not say that the holiday was wanted by the large shopkeeper for himself, but for his assistants, and the employers came forward in the most manly way to help them.

"Hon. Mr. Richardson.] Do you mean the large or the small employers?—I attended a large number of meetings where both were fairly represented, but the smaller shopkeepers were not so eager as the larger ones."

And that was what he (Mr. Swanson) said. Mr. Tregear was asked about the most effective way of carrying out the object of the Bill, and various objections were put forward, and it was suggested that the half-day should be taken and made a sort of Sunday, and that all shops should be shut:—

"Suppose all the shops to be shut, and the day settled, would not that meet the case?—Yes; I think so.

"Much more simply than any other?—Yes; more simply, and more desirably if it could be done.

"Hon. Mr. Bowen.] Do you not think that the sanitary clauses are the most important part of the Bill? Have you had any representations from the small shopkeepers in different parts of the colony who really have to work on afternoons, getting, as it were, the scraps of business that fall from the tables of the rich shopkeepers? You are aware that there are many people,—widows and others,—who get their livelihood in a small way when the large shops are closed?—I have had such representations made to me from persons who employ no shop-assistants—many of them women, who stand behind a half-door that is open, and carry on a trade. These people complain bitterly. They say that their livelihood is going to be taken away from them.

"Indeed, they carry on their trade with their domestic living?—Yes.

"But it is after the ordinary hours when trade is carried on that I am referring to?—Yes.

"They do most of their work when the big shops are closed?—It will be a hardship on them—many of the very small shopkeepers: I admit that."

He did think that he had some cause of complaint of the extremely "Liberal" gentleman who wrote that letter; and he thought the Council had some cause to complain when persons who were present at meetings of Committees published statements which were in flat contradiction of the facts. He would not weary the Council, otherwise he could read the whole of the evidence, which would bear out his statement; but he did hope that "Liberal" would be obliged for once, and that the evidence would be printed. He could assure any one who would look over it that more would be found to the same purpose. He had seen a letter signed by Mr. Tregear in the newspapers, and which put very mildly that, while he said there would be cases of hardship, it was not to be inferred that he opposed the Bill; on the contrary, he went before the Committee to support the Bill, and did so to the best of his ability. But the stern truth drew those answers from him, and he was not the man to deny them when the questions were fairly put to him.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the evidence given by Mr. Tregear upon the Shops and Shop-assistants Bill be laid upon the table, and that the said evidence be printed."

—(Hon. Mr. SWANSON.)

The Hon. Mr. RIGG said that as a rule he did not think it was judicious on the part of members to take too much notice of correspondence which appeared in the newspapers; but on this occasion, as the letter purported to come from one who was present, he thought the honourable gentleman was quite right in taking up the position which he had done, and also in putting himself right with the Council. He quite agreed that the honourable gentleman stated the facts fairly; but he thought something more would be necessary. He thought some attempt should be made to ascertain who the member of the Committee was who was guilty of such bad taste as to write to the newspapers in connection with a matter which had come before a Committee of the Council. He did not intend to oppose the motion; but he rose for the purpose of proposing an amendment. The evidence of Mr. Tregear was valuable evidence; but at the same time there was other evidence which he thought it was just as desirable should be published. Therefore he proposed to amend the motion so that the whole of the evidence taken before the Labour Bills Committee on the Shops and Shop-assistants Bill should be printed. He therefore moved, After the word "That," to strike out the words following, with the view of inserting "all the evidence taken by the Committee on the Shops and Shop-assistants Bill be laid on the table and be printed."

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE wished to say there was a reason for publishing the evidence of Mr. Tregear only. As the honourable gentleman stated, it had been falsely reported in the public Press; and considering the period of the session, and the quantity of evidence that was taken,—to none of which reference had been made, and in respect of which the same argument would not apply,—he thought, for the purpose of putting the honourable gentleman right, if they confined themselves to the evidence of Mr. Tregear, that probably would be the wiser plan. Therefore he would oppose any more evidence being printed, as it might be very costly, and the evidence might take a long time to put into print, and thus there would be delay in getting a contradiction made of the statement which had gone the rounds of the Press.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS had been just going to say exactly what the Hon. Sir George Whitmore had stated. In the one case there was a necessity for printing the evidence, inasmuch as the veracity of one of the members of the Council was impugned. It was necessary that the evidence should be printed, so that it should not appear that the writer of the letter referred to was speaking the truth. He did not think it was necessary to carry the printing any further. He thought there was far too much printing in the blue-books. If the writer of the letter was a member of the Committee he did very wrong in revealing anything which took place at the Committee. It was contrary to their Standing Orders that anything which took place in Committees should be made public. He thought it was hardly worth while as the session would soon close, but if there was more time it might be advisable that inquiries should be made as to who the culprit was who wrote the letter which appeared in the newspaper.

The Hon. Mr. JENNINGS trusted the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Rigg would be accepted. There was only one other witness who gave evidence before the Committee on the Bill, and that was Mr. Blair, of the firm of Lyon and Blair. That gentleman was in favour of the Saturday half-holiday. He did not think it was altogether fair that only one side of a question should be printed. Personally he had very great sympathy with the position which the Hon. Mr. Swanson had been placed in by the writer of the letter. He was inclined to think that no member of the Committee wrote that letter. He thought it would be far better to let this matter be dealt with by the Chairman of the Labour Bills Committee, and it could be ascertained if any member of the Committee did write the letter. He trusted the Council would accept the amendment, and allow the whole of the evidence to be printed.

The Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON said, as Chairman of the Committee, and having taken that position temporarily, he thought it was only fair to say a word or two, especially in view of what had fallen from the honourable member who had just spoken. He thought the Council had better allow the small amount of extra evidence to be printed. Mr. Blair was by no means in favour of this Bill. He stated that he had been established here for a great many years, and he had made it an invariable rule to close for a half-day on Saturday every week. He said, "All I want is to carry on my business in my own way."

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON had not the slightest objection to accept the amendment. The matter had been very neatly put by the Chairman. Nobody could contradict anything that Mr. Blair said. He gave all his workers a half-holiday on Saturday, and, if the half-holiday was changed to some other day, he wished to go on doing then as he was doing now. Everything he said was self-evident.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be now read the third time,

The Hon. Mr. JENKINSON asked the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill if he had made inquiry into clause 7, relating to leave of absence.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY said he had received the following memorandum from the

Under-Secretary for Public Works upon the question :—

“Memorandum for the Hon. the Attorney-General.

“In response to your request by telephone, I have the honour to state that clause 7 of the above Bill (the first part of the clause) was inserted for the purpose of insuring at least one week's uninterrupted leave to every railway employé. Many of the men only get three days' leave at present, and they don't always get even these three days all at one time. The class of men alluded to are men who are paid overtime if they work beyond the regulation hours. Men who are not paid overtime get one week's leave per annum in addition to the three days.

“When the clause was under discussion in the House Sir Robert Stout pointed out that it might operate to curtail the leave of such of the officers who, under the present regulations, are entitled to more than a week per annum. The latter part of clause 7 was therefore moved by Sir Robert, and accepted by the Premier.

Bill read the third time.

LAND FOR SETTLEMENTS BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY moved, That the Hon. the Speaker leave the chair, in order that the Council may go into Committee on this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Sir, I propose to make a few remarks on this motion. Having spoken on the principle of this Bill on the second reading, it is not my intention to repeat any of the arguments then used, or to say anything at all as to the general effect of the proposals in the Bill; but, having been Chairman of the Waste Lands Committee, which has had charge of the Bill, I think it right, for the information of the Council, that I should detail some of the principal changes that have been made in it. The position is not an ordinary one, as will be seen by honourable members on reference to the Bill. It has undergone enormous changes, and it will be for me to show that these are necessary, before going into the main changes that have been made. I might say that most of the earlier ones are incidental to the greater change: many of them are merely verbal, and are put in for the purpose of making the Bill work more smoothly. There is one point which I should mention: it is with reference to the proviso in clause 21. This proviso has been put in by the Committee to put an end to all doubt as to the power of any Government to increase the amount mentioned in the clause limiting the expenditure to £250,000 within the year. I ask the attention of honourable members to the large change that has been made in the Bill, and the reason for it. The existing law enables the Government to take land within certain limits by voluntary agreement. This Bill was introduced by the Government this session for the purpose of adding the compulsory power in the taking of land to the power which already exists; and when the Committee came to examine the Bill, and especially clauses 6 and 7, they found that the state in which the Bill then was made the proposed compulsory power of taking land absolutely inoperative. The Committee then addressed itself to putting the Bill into such a shape that it would carry out the views of the Government on that point; and I will explain the manner in which it so happened that the Bill was inoperative for the purpose for which the Government brought it down. There is power given in the Bill to an owner to make a selection from the block as to which the notification of taking may be given to him, and for this purpose the land notified to be taken is subject to selection by the owner, for retention, of 1,000 acres of first-class land, or 2,000 acres of second-class land, or 5,000 acres of pastoral land. There is a further provision in the Bill, which honourable members will see on page 3, clause 7, subsection (3), for the purpose of this compulsory taking, and selection by the owner of the portion he wishes to retain. The clause says what land shall be deemed to be first-class, second-class, and pastoral that he is enabled to select from; but the Bill was so admirably constructed, and was passed in such a complete and perfect shape, that there was absolutely no authority in it—no Court, no power, nor any other machinery—to say how the land should be deemed to be of any of the classes. It comes to this: that, if an owner received a notice, all he would have to do would be to get his solicitor to serve the Government with a notice to stop proceedings for the taking of the land. I believe that is understood to have been absolutely the position of the Bill as it came to the Council. It has been an exceedingly arduous task, and one of extreme difficulty, both for the Committee and the legal advisers of the Government, to get machinery put into the Bill that shall carry out the intentions of the Government with regard to it. The Committee, with the assistance of the Government Law Advisers, have reconstructed the Bill so far as the classifying of land is concerned, and, starting with the notification, they have made provision for the Compensation Court acting as the classifying authority. The Court having, then, classified the land, the claim of the owner to be allowed to retain so much of it will be considered by the Compensation Court—that is, within the limit prescribed—and the Court will decide the quantity to which the owner is entitled, having regard to the class of land which is established by the classification made by the Court. The Court then will proceed to consider the compensation to which the owner is entitled, and subsequently the Proclamation will issue, and the land will be taken, and the whole proceedings will be completed. I think the Council, on examining these clauses, will see that a great deal of care has been taken with them. I take no special credit to myself, though the Committee is entitled to some credit, and I think that the professional assistance that has been given is also entitled to credit for the present shape of the new clauses. I should say, however, that the production of the whole Bill as originally introduced is not at all creditable, for in the course of a long experience I have never before known a measure of policy that has come to this Council, or left the House of Representatives, in the condition in which we received this measure. Let me point out to honourable gentlemen in connection with this matter that this Council is repeatedly assailed for opposing measures which are supposed to be of a Liberal character, and it has been assailed in regard to this particular question repeatedly. The Council, if it desired to defeat this Bill, had nothing whatever to do but to pass it in the form in which it came to it. If it desired to justify the attacks which have been made upon it, it could have passed the Bill exactly as it came to the Council. But the Committee felt that the Council would not take up such a position—that it owed a duty to the public, and that it was not their business to take advantage of any accidental circumstances to defeat a measure of policy,—as on the second reading, when we said that, however much we disliked this measure for the compulsory seizing of land, nevertheless, it having been before the country, and having been adopted by the constituencies, we did not feel inclined to reject that principle. What I have said I now repeat: that the rejection of the principle would be complete had the Council taken advantage of the Bill as it came to this Council; but through the medium of these clauses the Committee have made it a workable measure.

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND.—Sir, my honourable friend who has just spoken has, I think, very clearly defined the position of this Bill when it came to the Council, and what has been done with it by the Committee, and he has made it so clear that I, as one member of the Committee, may say he has, in my opinion, in the clearest terms put the position before the Council; and I think it will have the advantage of showing those outside the Council how much care is taken with important measures like this in their preparation. Sir, this Bill is an important policy Bill, and it is not too much to say that it came down here in an entirely unworkmanlike condition, and my honourable friend put it rightly when he said that had the Committee of the Council left it where it was the Minister could not have availed himself of this policy at all. He would have been brought up on the threshold with a faulty Act, which did not carry out the objects for which it was created. I cannot help adding to what my honourable friend has said, that when Government policy measures like this come down in this state it shows very little care on the part of those who prepare them. This is supposed to be a great plank in the platform of legislation on which we are now engaged, and it is instructive to see what was the condition in which it came before us. I was not here when this Bill was discussed on its second reading, and I therefore want to take advantage of this opportunity to say a few words about it. Again referring to the condition of the Bill, I should like to say a few words as to what the Bill was in its entirety when it first came down to the Legislature. I myself was of opinion, and am of opinion still, that the Bill is going to do very great injury to the country in general. That is my opinion about it. But, Sir, when it came down to the Legislature first it had in it a provision which, to my mind, made it more objectionable than it is at the present time. In the Bill as it came down there was a proposal that the Minister should have the right to take out of any property in the country such pieces or portions as he thought fit, and to leave the rest. Sir, I want to point out again that there was an utter want of thought or consideration, in my opinion, for what the effect of that proposal would be to the country. Nothing could be proposed, in my opinion, that would more injure the confidence of the people outside the colony, and in the colony, than that proposal, if it became law; and yet it was recommended as part of the policy. There is a very large amount of English capital invested in this country; and what would have been the position of that capital had such a provision been passed? Why, any security which any individual or company may have in the country would have been liable to be destroyed at a moment's notice by the action of the Government. Could there be anything that would more thoroughly injure our credit than such a proposal as that? It is true that that proposal is not now in the Bill. I think it was withdrawn almost before the Legislature considered it.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Hear, hear.

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND.—My honourable friend says "Hear, hear," but he forgets that this already has done its injury. This thing has gone Home. It has been acted upon, and it has already done a great deal of injury to the credit of the colony. We have still, Sir, to recognise that the Government that proposed it is a Government that is still in office, and, probably, is likely to be in office for some time, and that that was its deliberate proposal. I have personal knowledge of very considerable injury having been done to the colony by that proposal. I know of cases of companies that were proposing to increase their capital which they were prepared to invest in the country, which have taken alarm at this proposal, and which have abandoned any idea of increasing their capital; and the effect of that proposal cannot be exaggerated, and has been most mischievous. It adds to the evidence offered by my honourable friend who spoke before me that this Bill, as it came down—important measure as it is—was very ill-considered. Now, Sir, I should like to say a word or two about the constitutional position of the Council with regard to this measure, and I do so because, as far as I follow the debate on the second reading, this point was treated in different ways by those who spoke on the matter. Sir, my view may be summed up in a very few words. It is this:

that this principle of compulsory land-taking which was refused assent by the Council before the elections—that this principle had been proposed, of course, by the present Government. The present Government obtained a large majority at the elections, and it is reasonable to agree that this was a portion of their policy which was approved of at the elections—that is to say, the principle of the compulsory taking of land; and, that being the case, it would not become the Council to take any action which would override what may be said to be the will of the public on the subject. But, Sir, when I say that that principle has been affirmed, I should like to draw the line there, and to say that is all, in my opinion, that was affirmed during the late elections. The subject received no very great attention. It was, no doubt, made one of the subjects referred to, but, so far as I was able to follow the elections, there was nothing done, either by the Government in the speeches of its individual members, or by the speeches in general of those who addressed the public, in defining the lines upon which the proposal was to be given effect to; and it appears to me that in this Bill we have now before us there is an evidence of utter failure, particularly on the part of the representative branch of the Legislature, to do in Committee what I think ought to have been their special duty—that is, to define clearly the lines of settlement on which this principle is to be carried into effect. Sir, this Bill is singularly defective in defining those lines; and of all important subjects, if this Bill has the importance which is ascribed to it, it is one of the planks which ought to have been mainly attended to by the representative branch of the Legislature. What were the cries we did hear, for instance, at the elections in relation to this measure? Sir, so far as I remember, they may be summed up in words like this: Land for the landless; land for the artisans near the centres; and land for the farmer, especially for the man who tilled the land. So far as my knowledge goes, those were the three main principles which were to be provided for: the principle of close settlement was to be provided for. Well, what is there in this Bill to give effect to a condition of things such as that, supposing those to have been the planks? Take one portion, say clause 4, which is the clause relating to the manner in which the Minister of Lands can dispose of lands—one of the provisions, in fact, for providing land for settlement under the Land Acts; and then clauses 2, 3, and 4, providing for the settlement of land in the shape of farms and grazing-runs, that runs right through the Bill, exchanges of pasture land, and so on. You lose sight, if you examine the measure carefully, of the main object, which is the settlement of the people on the land; and it appears to be a measure devised largely for the purpose of borrowing money to purchase land to be disposed of again as grazing-runs or sheep-farms. Now, Sir, I say, if such an intention had been placed before the people they would not have given their assent to the compulsory principle. What they did mean was close settlement of one or two kinds chiefly, and they mean this still. And I will point out presently that under the Bill as it stands close settlement, especially in the neighbourhood of large centres, cannot be carried out under this Bill; it is almost expressly prohibited; and therefore, from my point of view, this Bill is a departure from what was intended, the intention being, as I have said, to further close settlement, and farming of the class I have referred to. In looking at this question we are assisted a great deal by the administration of the past year, and if we look at the administration of the past year—particulars of which were very fully and kindly given by the Colonial Secretary to me to-day, in answer to a question—we arrive at what, as I shall show to the Council, is exactly the class of settlement that has been carried out during the past year, and this I shall try to contrast with the kind of settlement which ought to be carried out if in this Bill we are to give effect to what, I contend, the people ask that land should be taken for on the compulsory principle. In the return which my honourable friend gave us to-day there is information afforded as to the purchase and disposal of the Cheviot Estate, on which a sum of £260,000 was expended. That is a sum exceeding the amount which is to be given for expenditure in this year, or in any one year, under this Bill—that is to say, £250,000. Well, just let us see what has been achieved in Cheviot. Sir, my honourable friend answered my question to-day as to what has been done in Cheviot, and the results are given in these particulars, which I think I have taken out correctly. They show that in the Cheviot Estate—which consists of 79,657 acres, and which cost, as I have said, £260,220, there have been 326 sections disposed of to 317 selectors, who, between them, have got this 79,657 acres. In working this out, I find these 317 selectors have cost the colony £821 each to place on the land.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Cost the colony?

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND.—Yes. The cost of the estate was, as I have said, £260,000; the selectors settled on the land—they are not all on the land; only 171 are on the land, according to the answer I got to-day—but there are 317 who have selected and taken up land, and taken up nearly the whole of it. And I say, again, that they have cost the colony £821 a settler. Now, this is a very important thing. That is why I asked the question, so as to try to arrive at what it is leading us to, and what we are getting for our money. I noticed the other day that Sir Robert Stout, in a speech in another place, in talking of this matter, quoted the Hon. Mr. Ward, who in the speech that he quoted said that the expectation of the Government was that with £250,000 of expenditure they would settle 1,250 people. If this were right, the cost to the colony would be £1,250, instead of £821. That can be taken, I suppose, as a correct statement of what the Government are achieving in the way of settlement of the land. I find, looking at the class of settlement—still quoting from the return the honourable gentleman gave me to-day—107 lease-in-perpetuity selectors, who had taken up an average of 223 acres each, making a total acreage of 23,936 acres; and thirty-one grazing-farms, of 1,407 acres. In addition to this, I find nine rural settlers taking up 6,358 acres, and eight pastoral settlers with 3,171 acres; making up a total of 77,098 acres. So that it will be seen the bulk of this land has gone into the hands of comparatively a few people. This also is a very important point in connection with the question we are now considering. According to the information with regard to the only other property the Government have dealt with—the Pomahaka Estate—a great deal of it is undisposed of. There is a total of 7,265 acres, and eighteen lease-in-perpetuity selectors have been put on the land, and eleven are expected to be, making twenty-nine settlers on 7,265 acres. I have not the correct cost of the Pomahaka Estate, but I am told it is £18,000 or over. In this case, the twenty-nine settlers on the Pomahaka Block have cost the country £605 each. It is fair for us, in considering this measure having for its object the settlement of the people on the land, to say that the settlement of these two blocks, which is claimed to be successful, is evidence of how it is to be done in the future, especially when we examine the Bill and find, as I have pointed out, that its provisions are mainly, apparently, in the direction of obtaining land, not for close settlement, but for grazing-runs and sheep-farms. Now I want to say a few words as to the class of settlement that, in my opinion, ought to be provided for, as against the class of settlement which has been provided for at Cheviot and Pomahaka,—and before I leave Cheviot and Pomahaka I should like to ask the Council and the Government where this is going to end. Now, how are you going, by any reasonable borrowing in the world, to settle people on the land, if it is going to cost these sums to put them on? And I am going to ask why it is not right that better provision should first be made for those who have far greater wants, whose necessity is fifty thousand times greater than that of the people who have been put on land which was already in profitable occupation. I want to point out what class of settlement ought to be, in my opinion, the justification for a measure like this, and ought to be provided for first. First we will take the farming class—the men who are at present living in agricultural and pastoral districts—men who have not had an opportunity of obtaining land on which partly to maintain themselves while they are partly maintaining themselves by employment in the districts where they are located: because I hold that this class of settlement is the most legitimate to be first provided for. It is a very large class, and a very valuable class—a class out of which can be built up a homestead farming-class, who, if put in a proper position, would establish themselves to great advantage, and be of great advantage to the country. I know in many parts of the country there is an absence of the class of land open for these people to occupy, and I would say that what is needed for them is a class of land which should not be taken up in very large acreage, but should be of first-class quality, and within easy reach of a market, near a railway, and where employment can be obtained in times when men are not engaged on their own farms. If these conditions were fulfilled the Government would be establishing a class which would be of value to the country. The next class I say the country might provide for to advantage is the artisan class in the towns. I know that among this class there is a feeling that they have a claim to consideration in land-settlement, and the thinking men amongst them think that if they were within reasonable reach of towns—say, two to five miles—if the Government granted them limited acreages small proprietaries of these people could be put down in numbers of fifty or twenty, and so on: they could attend to their ordinary business; and they could work on their land on those days on which there is no employment for them as artisans; and I am sorry to say there are many of those days amongst all the artisan classes at present—one or two days in each week on which their trades do not work—and I fear there are going to be more during the year coming on. If provision were made for this class by giving them a small acreage of good land in such positions, on which to establish homes, they would be assisted to provide for themselves in the intervals between their work. I conceive that to be a statesmanlike way of providing for a class of people who are at present in not very satisfactory circumstances; and they ought to be provided for next to the farmer class, or at the same time. Now, what could be done with the money in that direction? I have taken out roughly what, it appears to me, could be a means of giving effect to such a scheme as I have just sketched out. We have got £250,000 to spend in the year. Suppose out of that we devoted £100,000 to the settlement of people of the artisan class on pieces of land, say, from one to five acres in extent. I say such an acreage, within four or five miles of the centres, would be a great provision to assist such men to maintain themselves and their families. What could be done in this way? So far as I am able to ascertain—not sticking exactly to the four centres named in the Bill, but extending it to all the large centres in the colony—you could get such land at from £50 to £100 an acre. That is what I consider a full valuation. Then, supposing I am right, and you adopted a one-acre system, you would have a thousand sections for artisans of this class, and, if two acres, you would have five hundred. I would go on and say what could be done with the small-farm business. There, I should say, for the class of settlement I have sketched out, the areas of the allotments should be from five to twenty acres, supposing the land to be of first-class quality. It could be bought in situations I have in my eye all over the country at from £5 to £30; and if this were done, and if the sections were five acres, five hundred people could be settled, and, if ten acres, two hundred and fifty people could be settled. I say this is capable of being given effect to, and would work out results which, as compared with the Cheviot business, would be of incalculable benefit to the country. In the one case you would provide for a class of settlement for which there is a demand; and in the other you are interfering with settlement which, at any rate to a certain extent, is beneficial, and with very inadequate and poor results. And, so far as I am able to follow this Bill, it does not provide for the class of settlement to which I have referred. And I will tell you why. The Bill limits the acreage within reach of centres which the Government can take to five hundred acres. There are few such properties in existence within this distance of the centres, and therefore the Bill shows that the Government does not at all take into consideration the necessity for providing for this class of settlers. These are my views in connection with the settlement that is wanted as against that given effect to at Cheviot and Pomahaka; and I give these ideas in the hope that they will become known, and that the fact of their being put forward in a public way may lead to a different class of settlement being carried on under the Bill from that which has been given effect to during the past year in the cases of Cheviot and Pomahaka. I want further to say this of the class of settlement of the land that has been given effect to at Cheviot and Pomahaka: that, if the country does make up its mind that it is necessary to provide this class of settlement, the field for it is mainly in the North Island of the colony, where Native land is lying waste much more suitable for the purpose than the lands that have been taken, and which could be got at a tithe of the cost of the settlement at Cheviot. I am not of opinion that this class of settlement at the present time needs to be provided for by the State. There is land for sale wherever you go: in fact, I do not know of any land which is not for sale, or whose owner would not be glad to sell it if he could. I want now to say a few words about the injurious effects of this Bill; and they are many. The instances which occur in our every-day life are numerous in which we hear from our friends, and from persons who come into the country and go out of it, how this Bill is operating. What are its tendencies? Its tendencies are to take away all interest in beautifying the country, and improving it, and making homesteads in it. That is what it is doing. I could give the names of many persons whom I know whose cases bear out what I say. There are instances within the knowledge of many of us in which friends within the last month or six weeks intended to go out into the country where they have property, and they intended to improve it, to build on it, to plant it, and to make homes for themselves and their children after them, and they have given up that intention because of this Bill. Why should they go out?

AN HON. MEMBER.—Why?

THE HON. MR. ORMOND.—I will tell the honourable member why. He perhaps does not know it. A man who has taken up a waste piece of land, and who has improved it with the view of handing it down to his children, has something to live for. But this Bill takes that land away from him; and if you can imagine anything worse for the country I do not know it. This Bill is also stopping what is the lifeblood of all new countries—the inflow of settlers with capital. While I have been here I have met gentlemen who have come from the other colonies and from Home, and who say they like the country and everything about it but its laws and their interference with the liberty of the subject, and everything which is tending to destroy individuality and the desire of settling the country. That is what the legislation which we are at present engaged upon is producing. And it is driving away the class of people who are wanted; and much misery is being created in our midst by what is going on. If my honourable friends lived in country like that which I come from they would see the misery which is being brought on the country at the present time. There are numbers of unemployed in the country such as those who live in a city like Wellington do not dream of. It is no exaggeration to say that men are travelling in hordes through the pastoral districts of the colony, and they are being maintained and fed. It is with great regret that I, an old settler, should say so, but they are going about from house to house begging bread; and, to my mind, that is a miserable state of things. That state of things is probably greatly owing to legislation of this kind, which is stopping the introduction of capital and the employment of money, which if not discouraged would provide the very thing which the men whom I have referred to require, and which they should be able to get, living in a young country like this. I have stated almost all I want to say upon this measure. I feel very strongly upon it. I think the injury which it will effect will be more indirect than direct. I do not anticipate any direct injury from it at all, I may say, but I do repeat that it will have a deterrent effect upon the employment of money; it will have a deterrent effect upon the settlers, discouraging them from improving their land. I do not know that at this stage of the session we should attempt an alteration of this Bill. I think this Bill, as I have said before, is altogether inadequate to provide for proper settlement. I feel strongly in regard to this Bill, as I did with respect to the recent Bank Bill. I felt then, and expressed the opinion, that the Legislature was devolving upon the Government the rights and the duties of the Legislature; and I say so again in regard to this Bill—that it is failing altogether to mark out the lines that the Government should act under. There is very little of it in any of the policy Bills which we are having brought before us. I shall not myself attempt to make any amendments in the Bill, although I express the opinions which I have done as to its being altogether inadequate. And I shall also not do so because doing so would lead us probably into altercations with the other branch of the Legislature at a time when no sufficient consideration could be given to the subject. In the other branch of the Legislature attempts were made to make provision for close settlement, and such attempts were defeated. Therefore, if the Council were now to enter on such a course as I have indicated, we should be entering upon something that would bring us into conflict with the other branch of the Legislature at a period of the session when it would be hopeless that the point at issue could be properly settled.

The Hon. Sir G. S. WHITMORE.—I personally have always been in favour of peace. If the owners of large estates are to be tormented as they have been for several years, and threatened to have their properties taken from them, I think there ought to be something like a reasonable provision made for buying them all out. If we are to have charges of "constructive crime and social-peatism" brought against any people in the country, I think the wisest way would be to buy them out. I think, as the Hon. Mr. Ormond just said, they would be perfectly willing to sell, and shake the dust of this colony off their feet. I am quite certain there would be no difficulty at all in doing that: but there is one thing that I must say. I cannot see that this amendment of the present Act provides for it. That is, the Minister ought not to be encouraged to come down here and claim the credit of buying properties at absurd prices at a time when produce must be cheap, and when the value of land is not very great. I do not think that point has been met by the provisions of the altered Bill. There ought to be a distinct provision for that. There ought to be a minimum price which the Government should pay for any land—that is to say, the price on which the owners of the property are being taxed. I hope that may be altered in Committee. I may say that I should be in favour of withdrawing the limit mentioned in the Bill, and enabling the Government, if they choose, and if they are wise enough to buy up all the great estates and large properties, to try what they can do with those properties. With regard to what the Hon. Mr. Ormond said with reference to provision being made for the artisan class, that is, to a large extent, what the late Mr. Ballance proposed. He proposed, and he tried, to place these men near centres where when their labour was not permanently required, they might have little homesteads to which they could retire when they were out of work, and where their families could live while they happened to be away. Then they could return to their homesteads when they were not employed in other ways. I think that would be a much better system than this general system of taking everybody's property away from him, and giving it to people who can just afford to carry on small farms. However, that is a detail which I should not like to interfere with. I hope that I may be able in Committee to induce the Council to place a minimum price on any purchase made under the Bill. Without that, this is a confiscatory measure. It has no other purpose, as I understand it, than to remove from the community that class of persons who are always railed against, and who have been for the last few years perpetually attacked. Adequate money is not provided in this Bill to buy out both the land-proprietor, and that person more wicked still, the absentee. I think the Bill is defective in that particular. As I have said, I think, in Committee, it would be wise if we took pains to see that there shall be a minimum price, and that land shall be taken at the land-tax valuation with 10 per cent. added. If that is put in the Bill, the measure may have a fair chance of succeeding. Large properties will be bought, and then it will be for the Government to decide whether it will carry out Mr. Ballance's principle of placing a labour colony on the land, and giving labourers or artisans an opportunity of becoming members of the small yeoman class of freehold farmers. I, for my part, think we should provide for that class of people.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—Reference has been made to the Ohevot Estate by the Hon. Mr. Ormond, and I agree with him to a certain extent. No doubt the purchase was a very extravagant one, and very likely it will not return interest on the money expended upon it. I believe the honourable gentleman simply referred to the original cost, without adding to it the cost of roads and bridges; but unfortunately the Government were driven into this purchase by the act of the former owners in not agreeing to the valuation which the Land-tax Commissioner put upon it. Consequently, under the circumstances, we are not to blame. With regard to the Bill itself now under consideration, I think its effects will not be so serious as some honourable members anticipate. It may prejudicially affect one, but at the same time it will probably benefit hundreds. Speaking for myself, I know that in the district where I live we have large tracts of country adjoining the town which are in the hands of large estate-owners and absentees, who, while they draw everything they can from the colony, spend very little in it. Sir, if properties like that were bought from the New Zealand Land Company—such as the property adjoining the Town of Oamaru—I have not the slightest doubt that, instead of being overburdened as we are now by enormous taxation, and the place being almost starved out, that locality would become a very prosperous one. The land, I believe, could be purchased at a far lower price than that fixed by the Hon. Mr. Ormond. I have no doubt that the suggestion of the Hon. Mr. Ormond is a very good one. Near any centre where the Government can acquire land it should be acquired, and cut up into small allotments, which would be beneficial to settlement, and I have no doubt that if the Government would do that they could get more than the five hundred, or even five thousand acres adjoining the Town of Oamaru, and in many other localities besides. I speak from my own experience. I am certain that the Government could purchase land which I do not suppose would exceed in cost £18 an acre—the very best of land; and while this might perhaps be injurious to one individual it would benefit many hundreds. Under these circumstances I think I am in duty bound to vote for the Bill.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—Sir, I feel very much interested in the two speeches that have been delivered by the Hon. Mr. Stevens and the Hon. Mr. Ormond upon this Bill. I should like to say, in relation to the position which the Hon. Mr. Stevens has so clearly stated to the Council, that this new experience merely affords an additional proof of the extreme difficulty of effecting practical legislation when dealing with complex subjects. We must not forget that when a new Parliament is elected a very large number of the members returned to the Legislature are absolutely without parliamentary experience, and it is very difficult indeed for the leaders of a House, in a somewhat tempestuous atmosphere, to control all the elements which thoroughly ordered and perfectly regulated lead to the best results. I am not now seeking to exculpate the Government from any measure of blame that may perhaps attach to it as to the character of the drafting of this measure. I feel that it is extremely difficult to find in a Minister of the Crown a sufficiently varied capacity so as to render him equal to the various efforts he has got to put forth in different directions for the furtherance of his objects, whether political, or social, or directed purely and simply in a naked manner for the good of the commonwealth. I say that, so far as the clearing-up of this difficulty goes, it is merely a distinct proof of the absolute necessity for a second Chamber in any colony situated such as ours is. And this experience merely affords another guarantee to the country of the fact that no party spirit, about which we have so often heard lately, will ever be availed of to the disadvantage of the best interests of the colony in this Chamber. Were it otherwise, would it not have been the simplest thing in the world for the Council, by neglecting its sacred duty, to allow this measure to lapse through the incompetence and inefficiency of the measure itself?

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—The Select Committee would have rectified that.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—My honourable friend Mr. Montgomery alleges that such a condition of things could not have been possible, because the Select Committee would have rectified such a deficiency in the Act. Sir, the Select Committee is a part of the Council, and, if that Select Committee had been influenced by any party spirit, there is no doubt whatever that the business of the country would have been less well done than it is. But I merely wish to indicate this—I merely wish to draw attention of colonists to this little fact: The sense of the Council is against the Land for Settlements Bill, and yet the Land for Settlements Bill is made into an efficient and practicable measure by the Legislative Council. Why is that so? Simply because we are, in reality, all thoroughly in earnest about advancing the welfare of the community. And if we take diverse views about what are the best interests of the colony we are here to give expression to those diverse views, and the discussion which follows leads to results as hitherto—ending in great practical benefit to the colony. Sir, here is another illustration of the value of the application of unbiassed practical capacity to the public business. That is all I claim for the Council in relation to this measure. I would say to my honourable friend Mr. Ormond that, though I agree very largely with his speech, and I agree with it entirely where he says that the kind of settlement he suggests would be most beneficial to the colony,—though I agree with him in these particulars, these details, I do not agree with all that he has said in his speech; and here you will at once perceive that members who may be in accord in relation to general principles often form different views as to means and results. I am not of opinion that the country is at present flooded by unemployed owing to mischief resulting from this proposed measure, or any such proposed measure. I am of opinion that the number of our unemployed very largely depends upon the price of our products in London, and I am convinced that the incidence of the taxation on property is so severe and is so severely felt that the margin of profit left for the employment of labour has been seriously diminished by our financial system. I think that an average earning of something like 6 per cent. is as much as is obtained from land in this colony. Now, inasmuch as half the value of the land in the colony, or, perhaps, rather more, is mortgaged at an average rate of something over 6 per cent.,—and not very much over, for there are misconceptions in relation to the current rates of interest,—the margin left to the owner of the property for his personal expenditure, and for employment in any further industries, is very limited, and this margin has been very seriously reduced of late by the constantly-declining English market. Now, Sir, that I hold to be the fundamental cause of the number of our unemployed. To that prominent reason, based on the fluctuations in prices of our commodities in London, has to be added, in my judgment, the fact that labour has of late uniformly demanded more for its share than colonists could afford to pay. That being so, I feel that labour, between the two poles,—through the low prices of our commodities in London, and the high prices demanded in the shape of wages—is suffering a very bad time; and I am of opinion that the condition of labour cannot be improved except through the instrumentality of higher rates for our commodities in England, and lower rates demanded for labour in the colony. Now, with regard to the general principle of the Bill, I made no comment upon the measure on its second reading, because last year, when the Bill was before the Council for consideration, I pointed out that there was one fundamental error which was bound to act most gravely against the interests of the colony, and that fundamental error lay in the fact that as the Bill originally came to this Council twelve months ago any portion of a man's property outside a given area might be selected for settlement by the Crown without remedy to the owner in relation to the balance. I sought to show that the effect of that would be that land-proprietors would have great difficulty in borrowing money on their properties, owing to the insecure condition in which the balance of the property, when the Government had selected from it, would be left. Now, this Bill contains a provision by which the Government must buy the whole of a property in case the person whose property is sought to be diminished demands it. This Bill, by providing recourse to the property-holder in the way of affording him a right to demand that the Government shall purchase the whole of his property, removes that fundamental commercial fault, as I take it, in last year's measure. In connection with the sentimental view of this measure, and its effect upon settlement and the improvement of lands generally, personally I do not attach so much importance to that element as my honourable friend Mr. Ormond does, because I hold that, within an area restricted to one thousand acres in one instance, two thousand acres in another, five thousand acres in a third, and five hundred acres in a fourth, men will have plenty of land left for the cultivation of their natural enthusiasm in the direction of improving lands; and I hold that when the public come to understand that this measure reduces to a practical form the present problems which are exercising the minds of the Legislature it will restore confidence among the people. It is perfectly true the proverb still holds good, "Give a dog a bad name and hang him." We have got a bad name, but we are vastly too useful to hang yet. We have too much in us to make it possible for such a character as we have recently obtained for wild legislation to ruin our future. I am satisfied that this kind of legislation, during the current period of incubation, affects our interests prejudicially; I am satisfied that this kind of legislation does restrict the introduction of capital; but I am inclined to believe that a juster appreciation of our real ends, and a wider knowledge of our real difficulties, will put us outside the sphere of this kind of prejudice, and lead to a restoration of confidence. Now, I would say, what would property-holders, in their own interest, have the colony to do? In my view the general and local taxation of land is already overburdensome. In my view the productive power of land will soon have reached its limit, owing to the check put upon the energy of the people by the small returns for capital so employed. What then would be the remedy for a condition of that kind? The answer, it seems to me, is to broaden the basis of taxation, and broaden out the foundation of the landed interest. How can that better be done than by increasing settlement? I hold it is a question of the character of the settlement that is to be effected under a Bill of this kind, and I hold, if a measure of this kind is wisely administered solely for the purpose of settlement, and free from collateral issues, that the measure itself is a measure of promise. I do not know that we could possibly have a better illustration than the condition of the Town of Oamaru. There are many such districts in the colony, where there is no progress and no settlement, yet where the land is fit for settlement, and where, as I hold, under this measure settlement could be effected beneficially to all parties; and surely, if a landed proprietor receives a price arranged by a Judge of the Supreme Court and two Assessors he will have received a sufficiency for the land that he has parted with. If our experience is worth anything, does it not show that the trouble with a large number of landed proprietors is that they have too much land and too little money, and that their land is not saleable? If we admit all this, we must admit that the particular effect of a measure of this kind cannot be deleterious to the interests of this colony. I agree absolutely that our experience in relation to the settlement of Pomahaka, and, so far as we know, of Cheviot, has not been satisfactory, and I have no doubt what the Hon. Mr. Ormond meant was that we had in the Cheviot business eight hundred and odd pounds a year with each settler at risk. Of course, the settler has not cost the colony eight hundred and odd pounds; but we have a risk of £800 upon each man, which is a very large risk to have in relation to what is a problematical experiment. If I understand the honourable gentleman's argument, it is that we should have a less amount of risk per head, and we should afford to each person a better chance of profitably working than we have hitherto afforded him. In this view I agree with the honourable gentleman entirely, and also with his view that our speculation in regard to Cheviot and Pomahaka has not been a desirable speculation. In point of fact, we must settle the country, and I hold it is impossible for us to maintain our financial solvency unless we extend the basis of settlement; and if this Bill is carefully administered, and if we profit by experience already in regard to both Pomahaka and the Cheviot, it ought to be successful.

The Hon. Mr. MACGREGOR.—Sir, as one who is in favour of the principles of this Bill, and as one who has also taken some part as a member of the Waste Lands Committee in shaping it, I think it is fair to say a few words at this stage, and in doing so I may say that I entirely agree with what has been said by the Hon. Mr. Stevens, the Chairman of the Committee—that if this Bill had been passed by this Council in the form in which it was presented to us by the House of Representatives I am convinced that not a single acre of land could have been taken compulsorily under the provisions of it. That is a very startling fact, and it is a very startling commentary on the manner in which a Bill of so much importance as this was prepared in the first instance, and the manner in which it was passed through the other branch of the Legislature. I may say that the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill here, and who was also in charge of the Bill in the Waste Lands Committee, will admit that this statement is correct, and that no one was more surprised than the honourable gentleman to find that the Bill was in this condition. The honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill seemed not to be aware of it; and, indeed, no one who had taken any part in the handling of the Bill seemed to have discovered that the Bill was so absolutely inept a measure as it was found to be in many respects. I feel bound to mention the attitude towards the Bill taken by those members of the Waste Lands Committee who are opposed to the principle of the Bill. On the Waste Lands Committee there were several members of this Council who are entirely opposed to the principle of the Bill, and yet it was found that in amending it they did their utmost loyalty to bring it into workable form. It is a very imperfectly-drawn measure, and it is a duty that we owe to those honourable gentlemen that we should acknowledge that attitude, and also the attitude of the Council as a whole towards the Bill. This attitude has been to me one of agreeable surprise. I think the statement made by the last speaker, to the effect that the majority of the members of this Council are opposed to the principles of the Bill, is correct; but I am convinced that the majority have given way on the ground that it is considered that a mandate has been received from the country, and that a Bill to this effect should be passed. That being so, it has caused me very great surprise, I must admit, to find that those members of the Council who are so strongly opposed to the principles of the Bill have given themselves so much trouble and devoted so much time and consideration to put it into the shape by which the intentions of the Government could be carried out. With regard to the Bill itself, I may say that I am in favour of it; but at the same time I feel bound to say this Bill is not precisely on the lines that I should have liked to see it. There was, I admit, a very grave objection raised by the Hon. Mr. Ormond, that this measure is not what the country expected—that is to say, that it was mainly intended to provide land for the landless. That, I am convinced, is the kind of measure which the country did desire, and the measure which the country now desires. The statement of the Hon. Mr. Ormond is correct: the Bill is so framed at present that land in the neighbourhood of the cities cannot be acquired for the purposes of this Bill—that is to say, land in small areas, because it is only in small areas that land can be acquired in the neighbourhood of cities. Yet by the provisions of this Bill the owner of land in the neighbourhood of a city is entitled to say to the Minister, "You can go about your business. I have five hundred acres of land, but you cannot take it." This objection arises from the fact that the Bill is altogether too ambitious. The whole scheme is too ambitious. The amount to be borrowed is too large; and the area of land to be taken is also too large. The Bill, I am quite sure, would be found very much more advantageous if it had been laid down upon very much more moderate lines; and if the areas to be taken and the areas to be disposed of were very much smaller: then I am quite sure that the requirements of the country would have been very much better served. But I am quite sure that we shall before long have to amend the Bill, so as to make provision for small settlement in the neighbourhood of cities. All depends upon the administration of the Act. The land is to be disposed of under regulations made under the Land Act of 1892, and under those regulations the area may be large or small. I have no doubt that the Minister, in the administration of this Act, will so frame the regulations as to make provision for small settlement; and there is ample power for the framing of these regulations. However, all depends upon the manner in which this Act is administered. I have no doubt that, when the Bill comes to be amended, as, to my mind, it will have to be next session, the Minister will find that his best course is to amend it in such a way as to make provision for small settlement near the towns: then I am convinced the Act will be found exceedingly advantageous. At present, even with the very large number of amendments that have been made in the Bill by the Waste Lands Committee, it is still very far from being a perfect measure. In point of fact, it is an extremely incomplete measure, with all the "doctoring" it has received. Still, it has been very much improved, and, as I have said, if the Act is wisely administered, as no doubt it will be, I am convinced that, notwithstanding its defects, it will be found to be an advantageous measure.

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Sir, it is inevitable that a Bill that has been brought down to the Council from a special Committee so completely changed as this Bill has been should provoke a sort of second-reading debate on going into Committee. I am very glad this debate has taken place, if only for the opportunity we have had of listening to so very interesting and practical a speech as the speech my honourable friend Mr. Ormond made just now, and which I think will be very useful outside the walls of the Council. I cannot let the Bill go into Committee without taking the opportunity of expressing my opinion as to the principle of the Bill, because, although it is admitted that the main features of this Bill have been before the country and will be passed,—perhaps in a modified shape, but still passed,—it does not follow that those who disapprove of the principle of the Bill should be expected silently to swallow that principle. Sir, I think that there is in this Bill a principle which may be mitigated in practice, but which is morally bad; and I am quite sure that it is distinctly a check to colonisation. Colonisation, I repeat, is almost at an end in this country—it will be killed outright by this Bill. I mean colonisation in the sense in which we have always understood it. I was rather surprised at my honourable friend Dr. Grace suggesting that it is a mere sentimental view which people hold when they believe their Crown grant confers an absolute right—that it was only a sentimental view which people had when they thought, having settled on their land and improved it, through years of toil and self-denial and anxiety, with the hope of handing it down to their children, that it could not be taken from them by a Minister. That, Sir, is no sentimental view, but the view which used to be held by all Englishmen as to the tenure of any property to which they were legally entitled. But it has been said or suggested that this measure was absolutely necessary in order to settle the country—to settle people on the land; that such confiscation as has hitherto been known only in countries ruled by despotic tyrants was the result of all available land being occupied in this country by monopolists. Well, Sir, notwithstanding the passing of this Bill, I believe the compulsory clauses will scarcely ever be put in force. Apart from all the Crown land still unoccupied, and the large areas of Native lands unpurchased and now lying waste, there is too much privately-owned land being offered for sale all over the country, and not only land that is some distance up the country, but such land, near to the centres of population, as my honourable friend Mr. Ormond spoke of. Now, it is very difficult to speak of private individuals, and not fair to quote them without special authority, or to bring their private affairs on the floor of the Council; but there is one case which I will mention here, because the gentleman I speak of has himself written to the newspapers to state the case. This gentleman is very well known in Canterbury—my honourable friend Mr. Stevens will know all about him: I refer to Mr. Henry Gray—an extremely careful man, and a man whose word can be taken as sufficient assurance for everything he says. Well, this gentleman, who, I may say, is a thorough judge of land, wrote to the newspapers the other day in Canterbury stating that he offered all his land to the Government, that it was situated about Christchurch, that it was good land, and land in many parts particularly well suited for close settlement—and that it was offered at the Government valuation—that is, at the price put upon it by the Government for taxation purposes,—and the Government price was lower than any price which the Hon. Mr. Ormond suggested this afternoon: and yet it was refused. And since this land was refused by the Government he has sold it at a price higher than the Government valuation—higher than the price at which it was offered by him to the Government.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—The whole of the land?

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—Yes; the whole of the land, which shows that he did not set an exorbitant price on any part of it. He wrote to the papers to give publicity to his statement, and therefore I feel justified in quoting this as one instance among hundreds to show that plenty of land is available at a reasonable price.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Did he sell the whole of the land?

The Hon. Mr. BOWEN.—He sold the land he offered. His letter can be easily found; I have not got it by me at this moment. I say this is not an isolated case. There is plenty of land of all kinds to be got in the country at a very reasonable price, and at such a price as any jury would put upon it. There is plenty of it in every province in the country, and therefore I do not believe that these compulsory clauses were wanted, and I do not believe they will be put in force, or that it will be necessary to put them in force. But I do think it is advisable that every care should be taken, and every check put on the purchase of land, so that only that which is really useful and beneficial for settlement should be bought, and that there should be no mistake made about it. With that view, I propose in Committee to suggest an amendment in section 6. There is now a Court provided by the Act for purchasing, and I intend to propose a clause to this effect:—

“No land shall be taken compulsorily until a description thereof has been forwarded to the Council of the county in which such land is situated, or, in any county in which ‘The Counties Act, 1886,’ is suspended, to the Road Boards within the said county, and the said county or the majority of the said Road Boards have reported to the Governor on the suitability of the land proposed to be taken. It shall be the duty of such County Council or Road Boards (as the case may be) to report their opinion forthwith.”

I think, Sir, this would be a very useful check, and one that the Government themselves ought to be glad to accept, because it will give them an opportunity of obtaining local information about the land in question which may be more valuable than what they can get from the official Board. At any rate, it will be further light on the subject, which is not to be despised. Most of the questions left for discussion in this Bill are Committee questions. I hope that any reasonable amendments will be accepted by the Government in the spirit in which they are offered, and that there will be a fair and reasonable discussion on the clauses of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—With regard to what my honourable friend Mr. Stevens has said, there is no doubt that the Bill came up, in so far as its machinery is concerned, in a somewhat imperfect state. In fact, Sir, from what I heard of the discussion when it was taking place in the other House, there was a difficulty how to classify land as first-, second-, and third-class; and when it came before a Select Committee of men who had been said to be hostile to the Bill they did their duty, just as those who were in favour of it did their duty, in endeavouring to make perfect that which was not perfect before. I think the Hon. Mr. MacGregor said that the Minister in charge of the Bill suggested that which has been adopted—namely, that a Board of Arbitrators should be the Court to decide as to the three classes of land; and, at any rate, during the consideration of the Bill before the Committee, very great care and attention was bestowed on these points; and also very great care and judgment were used by the Chairman, my honourable friend Mr. Stevens, in developing that idea of bringing the machinery into such a shape that the Arbitration Court would not only judge of the value of the land, but also under what class that land should be brought. I can understand that it would have been better if the Bill had been brought to this Council in a more perfect form; but, Sir, this is a revising Chamber: in fact, the very reason of its existence is that it is a revising Chamber. Members here are not supposed to be swayed by political or partisan feeling. We simply, therefore, in the Committee, performed our duty, and, I think, did it well, and the Hon. Mr. Stevens in that Committee devoted a great deal of time and attention and clear judgment, prompted by his wish to make the Bill as perfect as possible. I think I am only giving him his due in saying this. Now, Sir, I wish to say a few words respecting what the Hon. Mr. Ormond stated. He spoke of the Bill as it came down to the other branch of the Legislature; but I only want to speak of the Bill as it comes here, because, whatever possible effect it might have had, whatever obscurity there was in regard to this policy, or whatever wrong this policy might have committed in its immature state as it was brought down or passed through another place, I only know the Bill as it comes here. If I go outside that I go into political questions at once which I do not wish to go into at all, because I think we should endeavour to have as little expression of political party feeling in this Chamber as possible. That there will be party feeling I can quite understand, but I think it would be a matter to be deplored that there should be any expression of party feeling which might call forth rejoinders, for, depend upon it, if one man is actuated by feeling, and expresses it strongly against another man, that other man will have something to say in reply. The Hon. Mr. Ormond said that the principle of the Bill had been affirmed at the general elections, and that therefore he would vote for it. He did not like the principle, but it had been affirmed by the country. But he went on to ask, "What would have happened under this Bill if the Cheviot Estate had been taken under its provisions?" Now, the Cheviot Estate would probably never have been purchased under this Bill at all. The Cheviot Estate was purchased because if it had not been so purchased the revenue would have suffered very much. It was entirely for the protection of the revenue of the country that it was purchased; and then, Sir, the Government, having got it, naturally had to make the best of that particular block. I do not at all say the Government would have bought the land under this Bill. But when they got that estate, and put men on it in small sections of good agricultural land, they had to make sections of larger area, some partly good and some not so good; and then there were other sections outside that again that were only fit for grazing purposes, that could not be cultivated to advantage, and they had to let that in larger sections still. And, when my honourable friend Mr. Ormond puts forth to this colony without any explanation that we have spent £821 in placing every settler upon that land, what does he mean? When you speak of the cost of the settlers placed upon the land, what does it mean in the usual acceptation of the word? That the colony has gone to this expense?

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND.—Will my honourable friend allow me to say that I used the word "borrowed"—"borrowed" to that extent on each individual settler?

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—No, Sir; I put down the honourable gentleman's words. If he does say he said that, I must not continue, but I was astonished to hear him put it in that shape, because I do not think it was ingenious; I think, in point of fact, it was disingenuous. Now, the men have, after obtaining allotments under a system of public tender at auction, gone upon this land at Cheviot, and they have to pay so much rent per annum. If they fulfil their engagements it has cost the country nothing—not a shilling. I mention this because, if it were not put into a very different shape from that which my honourable friend has put it in, it would go forth to the world that the expense of putting roads and bridges, and so forth, and the expense of putting men upon this land, have cost the country so much, and therefore that it is a failure. Now, I saw the return for Pomahaka; we shall learn more about that by-and-by, and shall know by-and-by something more about the assertions that were made, and about the insinuations that have been thrown out against Ministers' characters. In the meantime, from the report that has been placed on the table, it does not appear to have been an unsuccessful affair. Now, a few words more, which I have to say to my honourable friend Mr. Ormond—a gentleman who has occupied high places in the colony, and who is deservedly listened to with great attention. He did not confine himself to speaking to this Bill, but he spoke about the legislation of the country—that is, of the present Government—as shaking confidence. Well, the answer to this will be just as short as what he gave us. It is, that I do not think it has shaken confidence. It is only a matter of opinion on his part, and my opinion differs from his entirely. And what has my honourable friend done with regard to settlement for the number of years he was in power in this colony? What has he done? I do not speak of what he himself has done upon his own private estate, but what has he done for the people of the colony?

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND.—I have settled a great many more people than you have.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Then, what we have is this: My honourable friend makes it a personal question. From a personal point of view, he asks what have I done? Well, perhaps he is wrong. Perhaps he is entirely wrong. I did not acquire my property at the extremely cheap rate he acquired his. Let us be personal, if you like; but he has no right to say that he has done more than I have. I can compare my passage through the world with his; and, though I have not done so well for myself, I have done quite as well for other people. I was simply speaking of my honourable friend as a public man who has held prominent positions in this country for a number of years. He comes here to-day and says the Government are not going the right way about the matter, and that we should acquire lands in the North Island and settle people upon it. Why, Sir, it seems to me that he is dreaming, or he thinks that we must be. This is the first Government that ever did anything towards assisting the people to go upon the lands of the North Island. Sir, there is a Bill in another place that proposes to buy land to the value of £250,000 in the North Island—bush-land—to road it, to assist settlers to go upon it, and to advance money to assist in cutting the timber down, so that the settlers can live during the time they are getting their land under grass. This is the first time that has been done. This is the first Government that has said the land shall not be parted with for the future in large blocks to individuals in the manner in which it has been in the past, as we all know, so that it was characterized by an honourable gentleman in another place not many years ago by saying that the title-deeds were smeared with rum and blood. I remember that very well. The present Government is one that is objected to because it is said not to have taken the proper means of putting settlers on the land. Sir, the desire is to put men upon the land upon small holdings in places where they can beneficially occupy them; to put men upon larger holdings where the land will support them, with their families; and not to buy land, as the Hon. Mr. Ormond has said, for sheep-runs—to buy one man's sheep-run to put the sheep of another man upon it. The Bill is different from the Bill of last year, and from the Land for Settlements Act of 1892, but has increased the area, because the owner of a property from which the Government wants five or ten thousand acres may now say, "No, take the lot"; and, if the Government be obliged to take the whole property, necessarily there will be some land in it adapted for grazing only, and consequently they have increased the size of the sections to meet that difficulty. Now, I can understand very well that many people may think the proper way to settle people upon the land is in small sections, that they could work for the larger holders. That might be very well. It would be the means of bringing labour to the doors of the larger property-holders, and would be very convenient for them. But what the Government want to see is hundreds or thousands of settlers upon the land making homes for themselves—that is one of the reasons why the sections are larger—to make homes for themselves where they can bring up their families as independent

men, and not mere bits of land which they could simply have habitations upon, so that, in order to live, they must go to richer men not far away and ask for work. Sir, it is a thoroughly democratic measure. It is to put men upon land, so that they can live without having to take off their caps and beg other people to give them employment. I have never disguised from myself the fact that this is a measure I have always wanted; it is one to provide for settlement,—not merely one to provide labour for those men who are holders of fifty or sixty thousand acres. My honourable friend Dr. Grace, in the very kindly and good spirit which always characterizes him, spoke of this measure as being one that was against the sense of the Council, but as one that the Council would pass. Well, I believe that is so. But does not that show, when it has been passed by an overwhelming majority in another place, after a general election, that this Council is not in touch with the people—that the sentiment in this Council is not in touch with the sentiment of the people? Well, Sir, I think it is a wise thing on the part of honourable members who do not like the principle of the Bill, yet find the country will have it, to endeavour to make the best of it—to make it as perfect as we can. I think that shows wisdom, and also a commendable feeling on their part that I am sure is the one that should characterize every man in this House. I have not been able to reply to my honourable friend Mr. Bowen, who brought forward a particular instance. To do that I should have to get particular information. I have sent for it, and I should have had it had I been apprised before that the case would be referred to. I have this information: "That the Board reported it was not suitable for settlement." That was the reason it was not purchased; but the papers will be in my hands very shortly. I have sent for them. I admit my honourable friend Mr. Bowen would not put forward a thing he did not believe. I know he would not do that, and I paid a great deal of attention to what he said, and at the time he spoke it was in my mind that he was only speaking on one side of the question, as furnished to him. Mr. Henry Gray himself has very strong feeling in the matter, and very strong objections to Government measures, and to the Government, and generally he likes to keep things as they are. I would ask the Hon. Mr. Bowen's attention to this matter respecting this land of Mr. Gray's. Mr. Gray is a very estimable man, is a very strong partisan, and is very strong against the Government. He says,—

"I deliberately charge Ministers with purposely abstaining from buying, with the object of having an apparent reason for forcible resumption."

I think you can see the strong party feeling there. He offered 17,400 acres of land at £80,000—take all or none. Now, this is what the Surveyor-General says:—

"Mr. Gray offered about 14,700 acres in various parts of Canterbury, most of which was near Waikare, and pastoral country; the prices varied from £4 to £22 18s. an acre, the prices being conditional on the purchase of the whole. The Board rejected all but 663 acres, as not being in districts where land was wanted, or as too high-priced, or as partly pastoral country; and a special report was made by Ranger Mussen on the 663 acres, which showed the land to be suitable, but it was incumbered by three years' leases, which prevented the Board recommending. The other blocks were well known to Ranger, and did not require inspection. Total sum asked was over £80,000."

The Board reports that with the exception of 663 acres it is not suitable for settlement. The Minister had nothing to do with it, beyond giving careful attention to this report. When my honourable friend knows this, he will see it was out of the power of the Minister to buy the whole land. I think, when the honourable gentleman hears the facts of the case, he will understand that the information given to him was one-sided information, given by a man who, however estimable in his private character, is such an opponent of the Government, and such a strong partisan, that he is not a person to be relied upon in this matter; and I am sure he will be very careful about receiving information from him again.

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND.—One word in personal explanation. My honourable friend said I had been disingenuous to the Council in saying that each settler put upon the land had cost the Government so-and-so. My argument was founded on the colony having borrowed money for this purpose of settling the people on the land taken compulsorily, and my argument was that every settler on the Cheviot had caused the country to borrow and incur a liability of £821. That was my statement, quite clearly, as will be seen when my speech is reported. There is nothing disingenuous in that. I also wish to say that I am sorry I was tempted into making the retort I did to my honourable friend when he was good enough to say I had never had any part in putting people on the land. He had begun the personality most distinctly, and I am sorry I took part in being personal in such a matter.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY was understood to say,—I was speaking of the honourable gentleman simply as a Minister of the Crown, and did not speak of him as an individual, and after his attack on the Government policy I think I was justified in speaking as I did.

Bill committed.

FACTORIES BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY moved, That the Hon. the Speaker leave the chair, in order that the Council may go into Committee on this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—Sir, I desire to say a few words on this Bill, as I did not speak on the second reading, understanding that the debate would not take place on that occasion, but on the question of going into Committee. The question was then asked as to the necessity for this Bill, and I propose to answer that question now. In the first place, the Bill now before us is a consolidation measure. In the second place, it has been found desirable to remedy defects in one or two important clauses of the main Act. The first of these occurs in the provision which gives a half-holiday every week to women and young persons. It was found, when the Act had been in force something like eighteen months, that a few words in this provision entirely nullified its effect, and, such is the irony of fate, that it was left to the honorary solicitor of the Wellington Trades Council to find out that defect when defending an employer against a charge brought by the Factories Inspector. This solicitor was Mr. J. W. Poynton; and since that decision was given on the point raised by him there has been in many cases a systematic evasion of the law so far as the half-holiday is concerned. Then, again, the law has been evaded to a certain extent owing to the definition of what a factory is. In the Act now in force any place employing more than three persons is held to be a factory, but there is no provision to meet the case of an establishment kept by one man, who takes orders and distributes his work to various people who do the work at their own residences. This point is not altogether met in the Bill before us, although it is to some extent. It is a matter that I consider requires some attention, and I am sorry it is one so difficult to deal with as completely as I could wish. There is a new provision introduced in the Bill to deal with an objectionable practice that has arisen in consequence—namely, what is known as home work. It has been found that wherever this practice has grown to any extent the most objectionable results have followed. It is one of the most fruitful causes of sweating, for the reason that the people whose necessities are greatest are generally those who take the work home. Again, owing to this practice, it is found that contagious and infectious diseases are readily transmitted; so much so that the London County Council has found it necessary to strictly prohibit home work in their clothing contracts. In the Bill now before us it is proposed to follow the law already in force in the State of Massachusetts, and to cause all these tenement-made goods to be labelled. I should have preferred to have seen the Bill go a little further in that direction, and I think it would have been better to have prohibited home work altogether. I am quite aware that at this time last year I did suggest that this provision of labelling should be adopted; but since then, having read of the evils resulting,—particularly how, in the slums of London, this clothing material is used by the people for bedding and to keep themselves warm, and all the diseases that have followed from the practice,—I should have preferred to have seen a provision to this effect—namely, that all clothing made for sale should be made only in a registered factory. I had some intention of moving a provision to this effect, but I have decided, on thinking it over, to leave it to the gentleman in charge of the Bill to consider whether it is desirable to take this course or not.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Let us get into Committee, and we shall see.

The Hon. Mr. RIGG.—I do not know whether the honourable gentleman wishes me to speak or not, but I have a very few more words to say, and, with his permission, I will say them. In the Bill as it came down there is a provision—and I believe it is also in the Act—that girls employed in type-setting may be allowed two holidays other than the Queen's Birthday and Easter Monday. I do not know why that was put in the Act at all; for the reason that on every newspaper there is a fixed staff, and whenever it is thought desirable to bring out the newspaper it is necessary that the whole staff should be present, and I cannot see how it is possible in such cases to give the girls, who, I understand, are employed in some numbers on some papers in New Zealand, holidays other than those mentioned. It would be just as inconvenient to employers as on the days named in the Act. I trust the Bill will pass in something like the shape in which it has come from the Labour Bills Committee, and then I feel satisfied that, so far as factory legislation is concerned, it is not likely that we shall be troubled for some time to come.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—I think the suggestion made by the honourable gentleman that goods should be manufactured in factories only will act very arbitrarily and cruelly. There are in this colony many women who have to take home work, and at the same time to look after their families; and, if we compelled them to go to factories to work, what would become of their children? Who would look after them and send them to school? I think it would be a very cruel provision, and it seems to me that the more privileges and concessions that are given to a certain class the more they want; and, under the circumstances, I think my honourable friend ought to be perfectly satisfied with the Bill as it stands, without trying to stuff anything more into it, thereby bringing about unnecessary cruelty.

ADJOURNMENT.

3.0. Mr. SEDDON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. G. J. SMITH, with the permission of the House, desired to make a few remarks, and he trusted anything he might say would be considered strictly in order.

Mr. SPEAKER asked if the honourable gentleman was speaking on a private matter or on the public business of the question of the adjournment of the House.

Mr. G. J. SMITH thought the matter affected the conduct of public business.

Mr. SPEAKER said that if the honourable gentleman spoke to public business that was one thing, but a private matter had better be dealt with as a matter of personal explanation.

Mr. G. J. SMITH thought the House would grant him the necessary permission, seeing it affected him personally.

Mr. SEDDON thought it might lead to unnecessary debate.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said that at the time of the election he was returned against the wishes of some of the members of the Ministry, and since then, on various occasions, he had found it very difficult to get information on public subjects from several members of the Ministry. The last thing he had to complain of had occurred the other day, when a meeting of the Liberal party was held of which he did not receive any notice, and, as his exclusion had been notified throughout the colony, he wished to place his position before the House, his constituents, and the colony generally. He had written to Mr. Mills, the senior Whip, as follows:—

"25th September, 1894.

"DEAR MR. MILLS,—I understand there is to be held to-day a caucus of the Liberal party, and that cards have been issued for same. As I have not received a card, I shall be glad to know, at your early convenience, whether this is an oversight, or intentional. — Yours sincerely,

"GEORGE J. SMITH.

"C. H. Mills, Esq., M.H.R."

Later on he saw Mr. Mills, and received from him a verbal answer; but, in case of misunderstanding, he wrote to him again, as follows:—

"25th September, 1894.

"DEAR MR. MILLS,—Referring to our conversation of to-day, I shall be glad if you will favour me with a written reply to my letter of this morning, so that there may not be any misunderstanding on the matter referred to.—

Yours very truly, "GEORGE J. SMITH.

"C. H. Mills, Esq., M.H.R."

To that communication he received a reply as follows:—

"Wellington, 25th September, 1894.

"DEAR MR. SMITH,—Your note of this date to hand, asking if it was an oversight, or if it was intentional, not sending you an invitation to the caucus meeting of the Liberal party held to-day. In reply, I regret to say it was not an oversight, as your actions and attitude to the Government during the session have been such, we could not think you wished to be recognised as one of the true Liberal party.—Yours truly,

"C. H. MILLS (for Whips).

"George J. Smith, Esq., M.H.R."

Now, in connection with that letter, he merely wished to say that the only Government policy Bill which he had not supported had been the Consols Bill. He had voted for the second reading of every policy measure with that exception, but he had had certain objections to that Bill as brought down, the nature of which he had specified. Where the friction first started was in reference to the Land for Settlements Bill. He supported the principle of that Bill, but differed from the tenure given under it. Since then opportunities had been taken on certain occasions with the intention of damaging him in his constituency, by endeavouring to prove that, while he professed to come to the House as a Liberal, he had really come as a Conservative, if such terms were applicable to parties in New Zealand. He wished to place on record that it had been stated that it was the desire of the Ministry to force a few of their supporters over to the Opposition benches—that they would be very glad if they went over. That was the position Ministers were taking up, and not only that, but they would be very glad if some of the troublesome members, who declined to be governed by a domineering autocracy, would go over. He supposed he could take the Minister of Lands as a member of the Liberal party, but all he could say was that, if the members of the Liberal party could not show more courtesy than that honourable gentleman, he was sorry for them.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable member was now reflecting on other members of the House, and he should confine himself to a personal explanation, and not go beyond the fair bounds of such explanation.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said, unfortunately, the forms of the House would not allow him to refer to a previous debate, but when the Hon. the Minister of Lands made use of the expression towards him in the course of the evening which he did—

Mr. SPEAKER said the time to refer to anything said in a debate was when the occurrence took place, and it would be out of order to do so now.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said he was not referring to it; he recognised that the forms of the House precluded him from so doing. He would suppose the honourable gentleman was a member of the Liberal party, and came to that House a Liberal, but he could not see that his action was in consonance with his professions.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable gentleman was exceeding the limit allowed for a personal explanation, and he must request him to confine himself to a personal explanation, and not, by reflecting upon other members, introduce matter tending to create an irregular debate.

Mr. G. J. SMITH said he would abide by the rules of the House; but he only wished to place on record that he himself had been subjected to certain things which, unfortunately, by the forms of the House, he could not refer to. He wished to say, however, to the members of the Liberal party, and also to the members on the other side of the House, that he believed that they had the kindest feelings towards him. While he had come there to support the Liberal party, he was not prepared to sink his own individuality in any way; and, if honourable gentlemen who from time to time showed a certain independence were not careful they would also be treated as he had been. He had nothing more to say. He thanked the House very sincerely for listening to his explanation, and he trusted that, so far as he was concerned, he would even outlive the ill-will of some of the members of the Ministry.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE did not know what the honourable gentleman alluded to as to the Minister of Lands. He did not insult the honourable gentleman. The fact of the matter was, he did not speak to the honourable gentleman, either in the lobby or in the House, and if the honourable gentleman thought that was discourtesy he could not help it, because the honourable gentleman generally passed him and gave him the cold shoulder, and he was certainly not going to run after the honourable gentleman on any occasion. He did not know what the honourable gentleman referred to further than that. If the honourable gentleman would speak to him when the Speaker was not present he would, he thought, be able to explain matters to him. So far as the honourable gentleman was concerned, and as to his being a member of the Liberal party, he for one had never looked upon the honourable gentleman as being a member of the Liberal party. He never thought he was one. The first time he knew the honourable member claimed to be a Liberal was that night.

Sir R. STOUT thought it was very unfair of the Minister of Lands to say that an honourable member was not a member of the Liberal party; and he was glad to think—

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I never looked upon him as such.

Sir R. STOUT said, well, the honourable gentleman's vision had been very short: that was all he could say. The honourable member, as Minister, ought particularly to have read the honourable member's opinions before coming to any conclusion; and he would undertake to say that, so far as Liberalism was concerned, the honourable member for Christchurch City was a Radical, and went far beyond many Liberals, and probably further than the honourable gentleman himself. He could not refer to what had taken place in Committee, and was sorry the forms of the House prevented it.

Mr. HALL-JONES would just like to say, in respect to the honourable member for Christchurch City, that he had known him for many years, and had always known him as a gentleman of extremely Radical views, and when he learned that the honourable member was coming to that House he was pleased to think they would have among them a gentleman who was as good a Liberal as any member of the Liberal party. Since that time nothing had occurred to cause him to alter that opinion.

Mr. COLLINS said, as Mr. G. J. Smith was his colleague, and as he held views upon some questions differing much from that gentleman's, he would like to say that he had known Mr. Smith for a number of years, and he had known him to be a Liberal. He knew Mr. Smith to be a Liberal of pronounced Liberal views. He himself regarded Mr. Smith as a Liberal—in fact, politically speaking, as a Radical. As Mr. Smith's colleague, and holding in many respects views radically opposed to those of the honourable gentleman, he was bound to say that he exceedingly regretted that any friction should have occurred between the honourable gentleman and any one in that House. Mr. Smith had been uniformly courteous to him in spite of some differences of opinion, and he hoped that courtesy which he had always extended to others would be extended to the honourable member himself. He was exceedingly sorry that any friction of that kind should have occurred; and, if the result of the statement the honourable gentleman had made would be to heal any breach which had been made he would be glad, and if it could place him in the position which he ought to occupy before the House and the country—and particularly before his constituents—he would be very glad that Mr. Smith had made the statement. He thought the Minister of Lands—whom he had invariably found as courteous as Mr. Smith—had failed to understand the honourable gentleman. He really thought, if the two honourable gentlemen could be brought face to face, or if Mr. Smith would see the Minister, as the Minister had suggested, and have five minutes' conversation with him, they would settle the whole business, and become as great friends as they ought to be.

Mr. G. W. RUSSELL, speaking as a member of the Liberal party, thought a very much larger question was involved than simply the position of one member of that party. Had the leaders of a party the right to say whether a member should or should not be regarded as belonging to the party? It seemed to him that that was the question that underlay the matter. For his part, he could only say that, while he was a loyal Liberal, he would never place himself in the position of being expected entirely to subordinate every opinion he held. While he supported the general policy of the Government, he should always reserve to himself the right to criticize details, and, where he thought proper, to vote against any measure that came up. He should be very sorry indeed if the time should come that, because he chose to take up that position, he should no longer be regarded as a member of the Liberal party. He thought that, unless some important division had taken place in which the member for Christchurch City had clearly gone over to the Conservative party, and had thus placed himself outside the Liberal party, the party had no right to shut him out from caucuses or from meetings which were recognised as meetings of the party. That was his view of the matter. Speaking of Mr. Smith, the member for Christchurch City, he did not wish to make any complimentary remarks to that honourable gentleman, because he did not need them. The honourable gentleman held an undoubtedly strong position in Christchurch, and was recognised by all the Liberal associations there as a Liberal. He thought it was very unfortunate that the Whips had taken the ill-advised course they had taken to prevent the honourable member from attending the caucus. It was well known that the honourable member for Selwyn, who so often took up a strong position against the Government, was invited to the meeting.

Mr. SEDDON said it was well, perhaps, that the honourable member for Christchurch City had brought the matter forward. The honourable member said, in his opening remarks, as applied to the Ministry, that he was returned to the House against the wishes, at all events, of some of the members of the Ministry. He took it, from that, that the honourable member was alluding to his colleague the Minister of Education. If that was the case, it gave him the key to the whole position.

Mr. G. J. SMITH explained that he had not specified the Minister of Education, and he had better leave it there. He might say that he would exclude the Colonial Treasurer, if he had to specify particular members.

Mr. SEDDON said, then the honourable member made it all the worse for himself. He did not know whether he alluded to him (Mr. Seddon), but if he did he could tell the honourable member he was making a great mistake, and this error might, perhaps, have led the honourable member to form a very erroneous opinion. They all recognised that, whoever was returned to the House as a member of the Liberal party, they should come there as equals, and, no matter what might have occurred during the elections, they were, after election, members of the party and entitled to friendly consideration. Whoever was elected as the choice of the people had been accepted by him (Mr. Seddon), in the position he held, as a member of the party. On the honourable member's arrival in Wellington he was treated by him (Mr. Seddon) cordially, and the honourable gentleman could not say that he had ever treated him discourteously. If there was any difference, and if the honourable gentleman had felt himself aggrieved at the action of any of the Ministers, it was his duty to have spoken to him on the matter. Now, he challenged the honourable member; he could not say that he had done so.

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—Hear, hear.

Mr. SEDDON.—Very well; there the honourable gentleman had made a mistake, for he ought to have spoken to him. Now they came to this question of the exclusion from the caucus the other day. The honourable member had said that he had voted, with one exception, for the Liberal measures. Now, he would refer the honourable gentleman to the fact that up till the 13th September he had on sixty occasions voted against the Government.

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—Would the honourable gentleman say whether on matters of principle or on matters of detail?

Mr. SEDDON said there was no mistaking what he had said—namely, that, according to the division-lists, the honourable gentleman, up till the 13th September, had voted sixty times against the Ministry.

Sir R. STOUT said some of the Ministry had voted against the Government.

Mr. SEDDON said the senior member for Wellington City would like to see that perhaps. At all events, he was only giving the honourable gentleman facts: on sixty different occasions he had voted against the Ministry. How could the Ministry, under such circumstances, look upon him as a supporter? He said it was unreasonable for him to expect it for a moment. Could it be said that the honourable gentleman had any sympathy with a Ministry against which he had voted sixty times? Under the circumstances, they could not take the honourable member for Selwyn and the honourable member for Inangahua and put them in the same category with Mr. Smith, the member for Christchurch City. Some honourable members received occasionally from the honourable member for Selwyn those lectures which did young members good. They got the benefit of his ripe experience. He was the Nestor and the father of the House, and, though they might disagree with a great deal of what he said, still they knew it was well intended, and it sometimes proved beneficial. He did not object to that at all, but he did object to a member like Mr. Smith claiming to be a Government supporter, and yet never missing an opportunity of voting against them. The honourable member for Christchurch City felt himself aggrieved. He said he had heard members of the Ministry say the party was too strong, and that they desired to further strengthen themselves by driving from the party a certain number of members. It was a peculiar way to strengthen a party—reducing its numbers. He must say, as head of the party, he would not take that course to strengthen the party. Far from it. He said the Liberal party was never so strong as it was at present, and it was his duty, in the interests of the party and of Liberalism, and in the interests of the people, to keep it strong. He hoped he had made it so. Whoever had informed the honourable member of what he had stated to the House had informed him of that which was incorrect. He would say this: If it was simply in name that members belonged to the Liberal party of this colony, and they were always voting against the Liberal party, they might go where they liked; but they must not claim to be of the Liberal party, and yet always vote against it. That was what he said to the honourable gentleman. He would say again there was not, as far as he knew, anything whatever personal in this. They were, on the member for Christchurch City admitting the error of his ways, quite prepared—those who were of the party—to kill the fatted calf. There was another point to be considered. He was grieved that the honourable member, when he found what had occurred, when he asked the senior Whip whether it was an oversight or whether it was intentional, did not ask for an explanation. He (Mr. Seddon) would have said, "Well, there are a number of your votes you have given on nearly every occasion against the Government. Surely the Government cannot always be wrong, that you should be always right. If you desire to be of the party and remain with it, there are occasions when it is necessary that you should subordinate yourself; when you must, in the interests of the party and of Liberalism, assist the party, and not always be found against it."

Mr. G. J. SMITH said if the whip had not been used so much it would have been better for the party.

Mr. SEDDON said wherever there was mutiny, and that mutiny was likely to spread, and it had been caused by one who had acted so antagonistically as the honourable gentleman had done, he had no right to complain of the whip.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—Let us go home.

Mr. SEDDON said that was all very well, but he could not allow those remarks to go. A personal explanation had been allowed to the honourable gentleman, and, when a serious accusation had been made against Ministers, he had a perfect right to answer it. An explanation had been given by his honourable colleague the Minister of Lands as to any discourtesy being intended. His colleague was not to the manner gentle born, and he might be a little brusque in manner, but those who knew him the longest must know very well that he was warm-hearted, and that when honourable members went to see him on business or anything connected with his department he was always willing and glad to meet them and discuss matters with them. After this explanation, he thought that probably there would be a reunion; and he hoped himself, as far as regarded the Minister of Education, who had been specially alluded to—

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—I never mentioned the Minister of Education.

Mr. SEDDON said it would have been better if the honourable gentleman had done so. He (Mr. Seddon) knew to whom the honourable gentleman alluded. The honourable gentleman, in saying that he knew that he had come to the House against his (Mr. Seddon's) colleague's will—

Mr. G. J. SMITH.—I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. SEDDON said his colleague was not present to speak for himself. So far as he had known or seen matters affecting the honourable gentleman, there was no feeling at all in the matter. If the matter had come on sooner, and there had been an explanation, it would have removed the impression from the honourable gentleman's mind. It was for the honourable gentleman by his conduct hereafter to prove that he was still a supporter of the Liberal party. He would be judged by his works, but judging by his works hitherto he had not been at all true to that party.

LANDS IMPROVEMENT AND NATIVE LANDS ACQUISITION BILL.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—This Bill, as honourable members will notice from a perusal of it, is divided into three Parts. The Third Part has for its object the providing of the sinews of war, so to speak, for carrying out the objects embraced in Parts I. and II. I need scarcely remind honourable members that it is impossible in a new country like this to carry out the work of colonisation from ordinary revenue, and that the money to the credit of the Public Works Fund has for a long time been a diminishing quantity. The First Part of the Bill has for its object the giving of assistance to settlers who intend to settle down in bush-country, or the upper parts of the country, and, while so engaged, to give them employment, in order that they may ultimately make homes for themselves. The demand made upon the Government for lands of this description is probably greater than honourable members are aware of, and the requirements are very great in order to enable people to settle upon lands of this character, as, of course, it is necessary that there should be roads and bridges and conveniences for them to get to their homes. It was my fortune, a few weeks before the opening of Parliament, to go up to a part of this province which has been settled for about thirty years, and, really, it was only about two years ago that for the first time the settlers were able to attain to what is known as civilisation. During that time they had to hump everything on their backs, and submit to much suffering and hardship, and, owing to the absence of any roads to their lands, some of these settlers had not left the place for two or three years. The Bill provides that any appropriation for roads and bridges, and for other improvements upon the lands to be acquired, must be submitted to Parliament, and that the estimates for carrying out such works must also be submitted to Parliament. So that there shall be no concealment of anything that is going on, Parliament is to have this matter under its control, and is to be able to say whether any work ought or ought not to be carried out. It is proposed by the Bill to give facilities to associations to settle in the upper parts of the country, and to go upon bush-lands to make homes for themselves; and it is also provided that such associations shall have priority over those persons who may become selectors under the Land Act of 1892. The Board is to ascertain the unimproved value, and add to that the value of the improvements paid for by the State, and upon the two values will be estimated the annual rental which these selectors have to pay. That is a fair way of dealing with people of that class who are desirous of settling upon country of that description, and it is becoming a very serious demand indeed upon the Government. Then, the funds accruing to the amount of £250,000 it is provided shall be paid into a separate account, to be known as a "Land Improvement Account." This money it is provided shall not be appropriated for any other purpose. It is provided, however, that local authorities shall have the power of arrangement or agreement with the Minister to expend such money in any particular locality. That is, I think, a very good arrangement, because the local bodies will take great care that not more than is necessary is expended. I now come to the Second Part of the Bill, and I tell honourable members that the acquisition of Native land has become a very important matter. We have at present under negotiation many thousands of acres of land, and we want to get funds—£250,000—for further Native-land-purchasing. When I tell honourable members that there are under negotiation at present large areas of land in several parts of the colony—for instance, in the King-country there are 700,000 to 800,000 acres, in the Gisborne district 500,000 or 600,000, and I may say that some of this is the finest land in the world; in the Awarua Block 130,000 acres beyond that already acquired, and in the Wanganui district some 300,000 acres—they will see that the amount we are asking for for the purpose of the acquisition of land—namely, £250,000—is not a very large amount. These are the features of the Bill which I wish to call attention to. The Third Part is merely the machinery part, to enable the Treasurer to issue the necessary debentures to obtain the money for the purposes mentioned in Parts I. and II. I move, That the Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND.—Sir, this Bill is for purposes that I think all sides of the Council will agree are desirable—that is, the settlement of Native lands, a large portion of which is at present lying idle, and which it is in the interests of the colony to have improved. It appears, however, to me that the Bill would have been very much better if it had been kept distinct—that is to say, if Part II., relating to the purchase, settlement, and improvement of Native lands, had been put in a separate Bill. It would have been more convenient if this had been done. I want to make a few remarks upon the Bill, prefacing them by saying that I agree generally in the purpose for which the Bill is designed. There are some provisions in it, however, which I think will require consideration when we go into Committee, and it is well to point out a few of them which are worth such consideration. Part I. provides funds to the extent of £250,000 for the opening-up of land practically for settlement, and it is provided in the earlier clauses, 2 and 3, that a statement of such work shall be laid before Parliament at the opening of each session. Does my honourable friend the Colonial Secretary mean that we are not going to apply this Bill until after the next session of Parliament?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—No; because it deals with land which is now under contract.

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND.—If the Government wish to take full advantage of this Act it could attain its object by putting in the schedules of the Public Works Statement those works they can see their way to recommend, so that a year shall not be lost in the development of the country. I come now to clause 4, which, to some extent, ought to be read with clause 5. It is defined in that clause that any number of "working-men" may comprise an association; and I want to know why that term should be used in this Bill. Why should not settlers' sons and people of any class who desire to take up land be allowed to come under the Bill and to form associations? This, perhaps, is a Committee objection; but, still, it is objectionable to see a clause of the kind in a Bill of this nature, and I hope it will be amended when we go into Committee. Going on a little further, honourable members will see that in this same clause power is given to these associations to make arrangements with the Minister; and, if honourable members will consider this clause with clauses 5 and 6, they will see that by such an agreement the persons taking up land become entitled to be considered the persons who can get land under the Land Act.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—By priority.

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND.—Yes. I think I am fairly stating the position when I say that the Minister is put in the position, in my opinion, of overriding the Land Act; and we ought to be very careful not to permit that. In the Land Act we have carefully embodied provisions that none shall, by accident, or chance, or favour, get first in these applications; but under this measure it will be quite possible for members of these associations, by private communication with the Minister, to get into a position of advantage which they ought not to have over people having the same right to competition; and I think, therefore, we shall have to look carefully into these provisions when we get into Committee on this Bill. I will illustrate the danger of this provision by pointing out what has happened in a locality in this Provincial District of Wellington, and close to the Hawke's Bay boundaries; and the case I shall refer to will show how necessary it is that every opportunity should be given that land may not be taken or occupied without a full knowledge of the persons who are interested therein. Now, land in the Provincial Districts of Wellington and Hawke's Bay is becoming a minimum quantity—that is, Crown land suitable for settlement. Just on the boundaries of the Wellington Provincial District, between Hawke's Bay and Wellington, there was a large block of land, containing something like eighty thousand acres. It was situated at the back of Akiteo. Those members who are acquainted with the locality will know where I mean. This land was in the neighbourhood of a pastoral district where there have been a large number of men settled for years as shepherds, ploughmen, and in other capacities. These men have been looking forward to forming a settlement on this land. There were about twenty of them, and they had about £200 each, and their intention was to go on the block when it was opened up for settlement.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—When was that?

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND.—About a year ago—perhaps more. These people waited a long time and inquired many times at the Land Office when the land was to be opened up, and they were told it would be thrown open in due course. They waited; and at last, after many applications, they were told in answer to the last application that the land was all gone. Where had it gone to? It had gone to what were called associations; and I am credibly informed that members of these associations are only occupying it here and there, and three-fourths of the members never mean to occupy the land at all. In this case bona fide men had been elbowed out and prevented from becoming settlers. I merely put this case forward to show that we ought to be very careful to guard against people and associations having the right to unduly interfere with settlement, and particularly with the settlement of the class I have just sketched. It appears to me that this Bill is open to that objection, and the case I have mentioned happened under the Land Act. The purpose of the Part is an excellent one, and there is ample scope for it. That is all I have to say about Part I. Part II. deals with Native lands, and provides for two distinct purposes—for the purchase of Native land and for the opening-up of that land for settlement. The amount set aside for the purpose is £250,000. Now, my honourable friend the Colonial Secretary just now gave us information as to the amount of land that the Government at the present moment have under consideration for purchase. I did not exactly follow the honourable gentleman's figures, but they were considerable—five hundred thousand acres in one case, and so on. It is very satisfactory to hear that the Government were in negotiation for land to the extent and of the character the honourable gentleman has described; but there, again, we must remember that the policy of the Government, as indicated in another Bill that will come down to this Council—namely, the Native Land Bill—is for the Government to resume the right of pre-emption over all Native lands in the North Island. Now, I ask my honourable friend, who has just now told us what a large scope there is for settlement, and the amount of land that has been offered—namely, five hundred thousand acres in one block, and two hundred and fifty thousand acres in another block—I am not exaggerating the matter when I say it amounts to something like a million acres—I ask my honourable friend, is this money that is provided in this Bill going to meet the demand which will be put upon it? The appropriation is only £250,000, and half of that is for Native-land-purchasing, and the other half for opening it up.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY. — It is £250,000 for each purpose.

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND. — Not in this Bill, which only provides £250,000 for the two purposes; and if we take away the amount required for the construction of works it will only leave half of that amount available for the purchasing, and under the circumstances I do not think it would be sufficient.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY. — I will ask the honourable gentleman to look at clause 8, and he will see that there is £250,000 in Part I. and £250,000 in Part II. Part I. does not apply to Native land.

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND. — I think my honourable friend misunderstands, and he was not following what I was saying. The Bill provides £250,000 for the purchase and the opening-up of Native lands for settlement, and what I say is that it will be necessary to have a larger vote if this Bill is going to be given effect to. At present it appears that only £250,000 is provided for the two purposes, and I wish to draw my honourable friend's attention to the fact that, under the circumstances which I have explained to the Council, and under this policy, this money will not be sufficient to meet the exigencies of the case, and the demand which will be thrown on the country by the carrying-out of that policy. There is another element in this Part II. which requires attention. The wording of the provision says that the money may be expended for giving access to Native lands purchased under the Bill. That, again, is very significant, and open to very wide interpretation, as it is quite possible that, unless the money is confined entirely to the opening-up of the lands referred to, it might be appropriated to land to which it is not intended that it should be applied. The other Part of the Bill—Part III.—authorises the issue of debentures to the amount of £500,000 at 4 per cent. I have nothing to say about that, except, of course, that it is borrowing, and it appears to me unnecessary that the Government should pay so much as 4 per cent., as, if instead of borrowing in the colony, we borrowed in the London market, we could get this money at 3 per cent. instead of 4 per cent. It appears to me, as a matter of interest to the colony, that it would have been much better, instead of issuing debentures, if we went straightforwardly to the London money-market and said we were going in for a legitimate object: then we would get the money on the best terms.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS. — I apprehend that this Bill will go both to the Waste Lands Committee and to the Native Affairs Committee, in virtue of its having reference to the waste lands of the Crown and also to Native lands. Whether that will be the course adopted I am not certain, but presume this is the right course. The position of the thing appears to me to be this: that the Government have seen reason at last to understand that which I think was understood by most people before: that the self-reliance policy—that is to say, the policy of carrying on public works without the aid of the money of some one else—is an utter impossibility. We have been told for a very considerable period—at least, during the last two or three years—that there would be entire self-reliance, and that we should make our public works of every description out of, I think, surplus revenue, and certainly that on no account were we to have recourse to the English market for money for the purposes in question. Sir, I say at the outset I am exceedingly glad to find that some provision is made for the acquisition of Native lands, in order to supply the great and growing want of land for settlement by the inhabitants. I would submit that the proposal now made is one infinitely better than even the suggestion of such a doctrine as that it is desirable to acquire land from private individuals for the purpose of settlement while there is any land in the hands of the Natives lying idle, and which might be acquired under the provisions of this Bill. This is a Bill which will probably go to the Waste Lands Committee, and I presume my honourable friend, or whoever is in charge of the Bill on that occasion, will provide some definition of the word “working-men,” because, if we are going to leave these words in the Bill, and there is nothing in the interpretation clause defining them, with all submission I would say we should merit some degree of contempt, if not of suspicion. My honourable friend, no doubt, therefore, will be prepared to put in a clause giving a definition of the word “working-men.”

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY. — I will give the honourable gentleman a definition.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS. — Exactly. Perhaps my honourable friend would like to include or to exclude from the term the unemployed. There is a point in the Bill to which I wish to call the attention of my honourable friend, with a view to its explanation. I would say at this stage that there has been very little time to examine the Bill critically by the light of the Land Act; but there is a point I wish to refer to. Under this Bill it appears that members of these associations are to be subject to the provisions of Part III. of the Land Act. Now, I want my honourable friend to explain whether these are to be special-settlement associations or not, because, if they are, they will come under Part IV. of the Land Act as it now exists, and they would, it seems to me, be subject to very different conditions in many important respects from those which the Third Part of the Land Act provides for dealing with Crown lands under what is known as the “optional system.” If they work under the Third Part of the Land Act, they will be put under what is known as the “optional system”; but if they are to be special-settlement associations, which is a term known to the Land Act, then they come under Part IV., and the circumstances of their settlement will be materially different. There is another point with regard to the provision in clause 10. Here is power to pay moneys—moneys appropriated for special roads and bridges under the Bill generally—

The Hon. Mr. ORMOND.—That would be under the appropriation provided in clause 4.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I am aware of that, and of course it does not touch the land which is in preparation for settlement. It is confined to roads and bridges; but I wish my honourable friend to explain either now or to the Committee when it meets the precise method in which this form of agreement will be carried on. It seems to me to be one open to very considerable exception, unless some intelligible explanation of its operation is given to us—that is, the one which enables the Minister, of his own motion, to agree with a local body for the erection of bridges and the construction of roads.

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Clause 10.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Yes. I must also ask attention to the proposed method of raising this money. Is the money which is to be raised—this half-million—to be raised exclusively in the colony, or is it to be raised abroad as well as in the colony? The Bill, it appears to me, is hardly clear upon that point. Judging from the 20th clause, it appears to me as a matter of inference that the loan is to be a local loan raised exclusively in the colony. It does not say anything about the repayment of the principal at the post-offices, or what not, but it makes interest payable there; and it does not seem to me quite plain whether the loan is to be confined to the colony or not. Now, if the loan is to be confined to the colony, that raises the question to which I wish to call the attention of the honourable gentleman. In that case, the question of productiveness to the lenders will arise, and it will be very materially affected by this circumstance: that, inasmuch as it will form part of the income of the person lending the money on these debentures, he would be liable under the Land and Income Assessment Act to pay an income-tax of 1s. in the pound upon that interest; and that will apply equally to the New Zealand Consols Bill, which measure has not reached us, and to any other provision where the loan is, so to speak, domiciled in New Zealand and confined to New Zealand money. It appears impossible to exaggerate the importance of that construction, in view of the difference between the rates of interest which are prevalent in England and the rates of interest in New Zealand. If the person who lends money at 4 per cent. in this country is liable to an income-tax of 1s., or 5 per cent., it materially interferes with the prospect of successfully obtaining a loan of that character in the New Zealand market, and the same remark I have just made would apply to the Bill now under way—the New Zealand Consols Bill. I ask my honourable friend's attention to the question, and I ask him to say if I am wrong in my statement; but I am afraid I am not wrong. I ask any honourable gentleman who has any familiarity with financial affairs, or even with ordinary business matters, what prospect is there for a loan domiciled in New Zealand being successfully raised if the rate of interest payable on it is proposed to be subject to the burden of taxation by way of income-tax on the interest, as I have indicated?

The Hon. Sir P. A. BUCKLEY.—Sir, I have just one or two words to say in reply to the honourable gentleman who has just sat down. I really am not certain whether he is serious or not. On questions of finance I suppose there is no one more serious than the honourable gentleman. My honourable friend puts to me the question, How will the money be raised? I have only to call his attention to the first section of Part III.—section 16. There he will find it; and I have no doubt he has carefully studied the Bill, as he does everything, for no one pays more attention to the work of this Council than does the honourable gentleman. He will there find the manner in which this money is to be raised. He asks me, in the nature of a conundrum, whether the money is to be obtained outside the colony or inside. There is the provision in clause 16 under which the money is to be raised. Then, my honourable friend is facetious enough to ask me what is a working-man. Sir, the Bill had this proviso introduced in another place: and here I would say I have to deal with the Bill as I find it here. Bills are prepared and introduced, and sometimes, perhaps, they are more carefully prepared than honourable gentlemen suppose, but they are so mutilated in another place that almost all intention and object is taken out. The Bill as originally introduced contained these words in clause 7: "Any person," but the word "person" was struck out, and the words "number of working-men, comprising an association formed in accordance with the regulations made under this Act," were substituted. Now, I will tell my honourable friend what a working-man is. I do not suppose there is a harder-working man in New Zealand than the honourable gentleman himself, and I venture to say I am another.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Before you put the question, I should like to say, by way of explanation, that I am quite aware of the process in the clause to which my honourable friend referred—clause 16. The doubt which arose in my mind was in consequence of the wording of clause 20, and I think I had a right to put the question to my honourable friend.

Bill read the second time.

RATING ON UNIMPROVED VALUE BILL.

The Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Sir, this is a new matter, and it is a very important Bill, as honourable members are aware. It is, in point of fact, a Bill to enable the local authorities to declare whether or not the rating shall be upon the unimproved value of land; and the unimproved value means the gross value of land, as defined in the Bill, less the value of all improvements thereon. I will ask the attention of the Council to clause 3, which states that,—

"For the purposes of this Act, section two of 'The Rating Act, 1894,' shall be read subject to the amendments following, that is to say:—

"The definition of the words 'rateable property' shall, except for the purpose of levying water rates or gas rates, be construed as if the words 'without the buildings and improvements thereon' had been enacted therein, in lieu of the words 'with the buildings and improvements thereon,' where the latter occur in the said section."

This clause must be read with the 11th section of the Bill, which reads as follows: "Provided that all water or gas rates fixed by Act or ordinance, and levied within the city, borough, county, or district, shall be levied on the gross value, and not on the unimproved value." There may be, however, another important amendment required which the Law Officer has been consulted on, and it is a matter worth the consideration of honourable members. There is nothing in the Bill which says that drainage rates shall not be levied upon the gross value. In the town I come from—Christchurch—there is a very heavy rate levied for protective work against the River Waimakariri; and if it were levied on the unimproved value it would not be right, and I think it should be provided that the rates shall be levied in such a case on the gross value of property. I mention that matter because I think that honourable members who come from Christchurch would naturally wish to have the matter considered. The 4th clause of the Bill makes provision for ratepayers, by vote, adopting this rating on unimproved value. I will read the clause:—

"Twenty per centum of the ratepayers on the roll where the number of the ratepayers does not exceed one hundred, fifteen per centum where the number of the ratepayers does not exceed three hundred, and ten per centum where the number of the ratepayers exceeds three hundred, by writing under their hands delivered to the Mayor of any city or borough, or the Chairman of any Town Board or county, or to the Chairman of a Town Board or Road Board of a town district or road district in any county where 'The Counties Act, 1886,' is suspended, or in any county wherein the County Council does not levy a general rate, may demand that a proposal to rate property upon the basis of the unimproved value of land be submitted to the ratepayers' vote; and thereupon the votes of the ratepayers shall be taken upon such a proposal on a day to be fixed by the Mayor or Chairman, as the case may be, not less than twenty-one nor more than twenty-eight clear days after the delivery of such demand, and such day shall be forthwith notified in a newspaper published or circulating in the district.

"On such day a poll shall be taken in the manner prescribed by the law for the time being in force in the city or borough, town district, or county, or town and road districts, as the case may be, respectively on a proposal to raise a special loan therein; and all provisions of any such law necessary for this purpose are hereby incorporated with this Act, subject to this difference: that the voting-papers for the purposes of this Act shall be printed in the following form:—

"PROPOSAL that property shall henceforth be rated upon the basis of the unimproved value thereof.

"2. I vote against the above proposal."

"And no such proposal shall be deemed to be carried unless affirmed by a like majority as is required by the law last mentioned to carry a proposal to raise a special loan."

That clause makes a pretty careful provision against the law being altered suddenly unless there is the proper number of votes required. Clause 5 enacts that after a vote is once taken no similar proposal shall be submitted to the vote of the ratepayers before three years. The clause reads as follows:—

"In case any proposal as aforesaid is submitted to the vote of the ratepayers in any district, and is either affirmed or negatived, no similar proposal shall be submitted to the vote of the ratepayers in such district for the period of three years from the date when the first-mentioned proposal was submitted to the said ratepayers and their votes taken thereon:

"Provided that on the expiration of such period the local authority of any of the aforesaid districts may, under the conditions and in the manner prescribed, mutatis mutandis, by section four hereof, determine that the operation of this Act within the district under its jurisdiction shall cease, and thereupon, on and after the first day of April next ensuing, 'The Rating Act, 1894,' shall in its entirety come into force therein; and such last-mentioned determination may again in like manner be reversed."

Under this provision the ratepayers can say whether they will have this rating on the unimproved value or not, and they can at the end of the three years reverse, if they think fit, their first decision to bring the Act into force. If the proposal is carried, the local authority is to give effect to the wish of the ratepayers by a special order, and must forward a copy of such special order to the Government. Then a valuation-roll is to be prepared showing the amount of the rateable property in the city, borough, county, or district on which the rates are to be levied. Clause 7 deals with this matter, but it contains two exemptions. The clause reads,—

"A valuation-roll of the rateable property in the city, borough, county, or district shall, as soon as conveniently may be after the gazetted of such special order, be prepared by such Council or Board in manner as provided by 'The Rating Act, 1894,' in respect of local authorities rating on the capital value; with this exception: that, instead of setting forth the capital value, all notices of assessment and the roll shall set forth the gross value, the value of improvements, and the unimproved value of all rateable property in the city, borough, county, or district for which such roll is prepared; and the rates of such district shall be made and levied on the unimproved value of land, in accordance with 'The Rating Act, 1894,' as amended by this Act."

Then there is provision made for the adjustment of rating-power under the Acts of 1876 and 1882, and this provision is contained in clause 10, subsection (1), as follows:—

"When such rating-power or rate has reference to the annual value of rateable property, a rating-power of one shilling in the pound shall henceforth be exercised or imposed respectively by local authorities rating under this Act, as if it were a rating-power or rate of three-farthings in the pound on the gross value, as defined in section two hereof, and so on a greater or smaller sum in the like proportion for a greater or smaller rating-power or rate than one shilling in the pound on the annual value."

There is a proviso in this clause as to rates that form the security of any loan, as follows:—

"Provided always that, in the case of any fixed rate which forms the whole or any portion of the security for any loan, if the Controller and Auditor-General shall at any time be satisfied that the change above mentioned in the mode of levying rates will have the effect of diminishing the security for such loan, then he may, by order published in the Gazette, fix a rate in accordance with this Act which shall as nearly as may be produce the same amount as the rate levied before the commencement of this Act, and thereafter such rate shall for all purposes whatsoever be the rate which shall be levied in lieu of the rate which would otherwise be leviable before the commencement of this Act."

That very properly provides that sufficient rates shall be levied as security for any loan. Clause 12 makes provision for rating upon the gross value. This clause states,—

"When any local authority, not having power of its own motion to adopt this Act, is compelled under section nine hereof to make, levy, and recover a rate under this Act; and

"In so far as any local authority is authorised to make, levy, and recover a rate on behalf of any other local authority:

"The Chairman of such local authority shall forward to the Commissioner of Taxes a copy of the resolution imposing such rate, together with a declaration under his hand in the Form B in the schedule hereto, or to a like effect."

I have now referred to the important points, and the rest of the Bill is purely machinery matter. The principle of the measure is that, in future, corporate bodies, by an appeal to the ratepayers, may, if the ratepayers so determine, levy rates upon the unimproved value; or the ratepayers may determine not to do so. I move, That the Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—Sir, the honourable member told us that he had called attention to a number of the points of the Bill, and he certainly did so in the way of reading the side-notes. But the honourable gentleman utterly failed to give any reason whatever why this Council should reverse its decision of last year not to pass the Bill which came to it then. This Bill contains practically the remains of the Bill we then amended, and which now appears as the Rating Act of 1893. As the honourable gentleman said, the principle is contained in clause 11, which is controlled by the interpretation contained in clause 2, which reads as follows: "'Unimproved value of land' means the gross value of land, as herein defined, less the value of all improvements thereon." That is the whole meaning of the Bill. There is a clause in this Bill which I think will conflict with the Hospitals and Charitable Institutions Act. I notice, in looking up that Act—namely, "The Hospitals and Charitable Institutions Act, 1885"—that clause 23 provides,—

"Contributions from each of such local authorities shall be proportioned to the rateable value of the rateable property, as defined in 'The Rating Act, 1876,' or 'The Rating Act, 1882,' in the district or subdivision represented by each local authority respectively, as may be provided by resolution of the Board made under the powers herein contained."

The Rating Act of 1876 defines "rateable value" as "the rate at which such property would let from year to year, including improvements"; and, under the Rating Act of 1882, "rateable property" means "all land, tenements, or hereditaments in the colony, with the buildings and improvements thereon, with the following exceptions," amongst others:—

"Lands, not exceeding in each case one hundred acres in extent, and buildings used for a public asylum, a hospital, or lighthouse purposes, and lands used for purposes of public plantations."

Well, it appears to me that if a county adopts this Act it will prevent the contribution to charitable aid being levied upon it, because the terms of the Act are different from the terms of the Bill now before us. Of course, the most important point, apart from the principle of the measure as regards rating on unimproved value, is that it adopts the principle of local option. It says, as the honourable gentleman explained, that each locality may, if it chooses, bring this Act into operation. If a certain resolution is carried,—if the voting is in that direction,—then the rating is to be on the unimproved value of the land in that particular locality for a specified time. Sir, it appears to me that if this principle of rating is the right one—that is, the principle of rating on the unimproved value—it ought to be adopted universally. There is no reason whatever why in some particular locality this species of local rating should apply and in some particular locality the rating should take place on unimproved values, whilst the rating under the present system, including land and everything on it, should be enforced in other localities. I really cannot understand upon what grounds local option is to be allowed in such a case as this. The only result will be that, wherever it appears to be in the interest of the majority of the voters to have the rating in one direction, it will be carried in that way; and where it appears to be in the interest of another party, they will carry it in another direction; but there will be no decision as to whether it is a right or a wrong thing in itself. It will be simply a sort of local fight as to which party should prevail in the district. It appears to me that a principle of this kind ought to be decided by the supreme Legislature, and ought not to be left to localities to deal with as they might choose. You might just as well make criminal-law a matter of local option, and declare that in some parts of the colony sheep-stealing should be an offence while in other parts it should not. No doubt there are many localities in which it may be very convenient for the majority of the voters to declare that sheep-stealing should not be an offence. It is quite possible that might be, but it certainly does not seem any proper ground for making any distinction of that sort where a principle is involved. Sir, what are rates intended for? Surely rates are intended to pay for the general conveniences provided by localities,—for roads, bridges, and so forth,—and the whole principle of rating has been that those who benefit by this expenditure should pay their fair contribution towards it. Roughly speaking, it may fairly be said that the persons who are in occupation and have made improvements, whether in the shape of buildings or agricultural improvements, are probably more benefited by expenditure in rates than persons who hold lands without having made any improvements at all, and who are possibly non-residents. That seems to be a reasonable principle. It may be somewhat rough-and-ready, but still it is a principle that always has been applied, and it appears to me a very fair one. But that which it is now proposed to adopt is a totally different principle. It is proposed to abandon this principle, and to make the rates so as to relieve persons who happen to have improvements, whether in the shape of buildings or agricultural improvements—to relieve them at the expense of those who have not made improvements on their land, possibly because they are unable to do it. Well, Sir, taxation in this form is certainly a very gross kind of class legislation. It is an attempt to specially tax a particular part of the community who very often may be the poorer part of the community. It has not even the excuse of taxing the rich for the benefit of the poor. It seems to me very likely to tax the poor for the benefit of the rich. A man with really good land, occupied and considerably improved, or a man of large means, can improve his property, and he is to pay little, while a man who has very bad land, on which it is impossible to make improvements, or a man whose means may be deficient, may be taxed for the benefit of a person who is better off than himself. We know that the valuations of 1891 for the boroughs amounted to £36,400,000, and the improvements were of the value of £18,400,000, while the land was valued at £18,000,000; while in the counties the land was valued at £86,000,000, and the improvements at £28,000,000, the land without improvements being valued at £58,000,000, in that case showing that the land was of considerably more value than the improvements. The tendency of rating on the unimproved value, therefore, would be to increase the proportionate amount of taxes so far as charitable aid is concerned, which is taken out of the funds of the counties, and to make them pay a higher proportion than they contribute now. Sir, it is rather difficult to know what are the motives which have induced the Government to bring forward this proposal. I suppose there has been a certain amount of agitation in some parts of the country respecting it. It is quite possible that a portion of the ratepayers may desire to shuffle off their obligations on to other people. I can quite understand and believe that people with splendid warehouses and fine buildings may be perfectly willing to have their properties rated upon the mere value of the land, and so throw a large amount of the rates upon persons who have not these buildings, warehouses, and so forth. There, again, it appears to me the tendency will be for the richer ratepayer to escape at the expense of the poorer one. Well, Sir, that of course is a mere piece of selfishness, which I think ought not to be encouraged by legislation in which this Council takes part. It is simply an unfair distribution of the local burdens of the community. But, apart from that, there is, no doubt, an idea that land ought to be treated differently from any other kind of property. Under the various theories of land-nationalisation, single-tax, and so forth, there is a party whose theory is that all taxation ought to fall upon land, and upon land only. No doubt they are also actuated by the notion that if all the taxation is thrown upon the land it will force people to improve it, and to employ labour in consequence. Well, I very much doubt whether it will have that effect at all; but, even if it does, it does not at all follow that even that good ought to be obtained by an unfair system of rating. I am confirmed in this opinion that single-tax notions are very much at the bottom of the theory—if there is a theory—on this question by finding that, in another place, an ardent admirer of the single-tax principle said that, in principle, not even Henry George could have drafted a more logical Bill than this, and he urged that as a reason why the House should adopt this principle. Well, Sir, I am not going into the question of whether Henry George is a prophet or not: he certainly is not a prophet who is honoured in his own country. In America Henry George is considered simply a crank and nothing else; and I remember a friend of mine, an exceptionally able man, who was once master of the Nelson College, who told me that he found Henry George's book one of the most useful books he was acquainted with. He said, "I found it extremely useful for my logic class, as there I have examples of all the fallacies that could possibly be brought together"; and he spoke of the book seriously as useful in this way. It is amusing to find that a person of this sort is now to regulate our legislation in a practical form. It may be just worth while, with reference to my honourable friend opposite, to call attention to the fact that Mr. Henry George's single-tax doctrines have been denounced by the Catholic Church as most immoral and pernicious, and the Rev. Father McGlynn was, I think, made to withdraw from the Anti-Poverty Society in New York, and from connection with Mr. Henry George. Now, whatever we may think of the theology of the Catholic Church, there is no doubt its tendency has always been to advocate the interests of the masses, and certainly not to advocate the interests of the rich; but it has always been actuated by an extreme desire to promote the interests of the great mass of the people in any country where it exercised its power, and it is not likely that the authorities of that Church would have taken such a strong stand as they have taken on this question unless they had seen the mischievous consequences of these doctrines to the masses of the people. Now, so much has been talked about the single-tax principle and the unearned increment, and so forth, that it is really worth while calling public attention to the matter. We constantly hear it said that the principle laid down by Mill of the unearned increment is something which is to be taken as an axiom. Well, gentlemen who take that sort of view seem never to read anything of the later economists, and they pull up at John Stuart Mill, who is a very admirable authority on many points, but certainly not to be considered infallible at the present day. A great many of his propositions have been entirely exploded, and, in fact, the whole theory of economic science has been enormously changed since his time. We have, for instance, first of all, Professor Jevons, who entirely altered the complexion of the whole science by pointing out what was the true theory of value. Then, again, there is Sir Louis Mallet, a very great authority on the question of the single tax, and Professor Marshall, who also repudiates all these unearned-increment ideas; and I think one of the latest writers, in addition to Mallock, who has written very ably on the question, is the Duke of Argyll, who puts the subject in an exceedingly simple form in a paragraph which I will quote, in his "Unseen Foundations of Society." The Duke of Argyll says,—

"This universal fact that value depends upon demand—that is, the number and eagerness of other men who desire to possess themselves of the product, or to share in its use, together with their ability to pay for that possession, and necessity to pay the price demanded if they are to get the article at all—is the best exposure of the Capital Letter fallacy in J. S. Mill's well-known formula of an 'Unearned Increment' in the value of things. There is one answer to it often employed—that it demands an equal consideration to be given to 'Unearned Decrements.' And the rejoinder is just. The decrements of value which arise on all possessions from time to time, and which do often so arise in spite of the most meritorious efforts and sacrifices on the part of those who lose by them, are as common as the corresponding increments. . . . So far, therefore, the retort that Mill's doctrine is unjust and fallacious unless followed to its logical result as to 'decrements' as well as to 'increments' is more than a mere retort, because it reveals the unsoundness of the reasoning, and the typical deceptiveness of the phrase expressing it. But the use of this retort—even the use of the words—involves some concession to a fallacy which ought to be dealt with otherwise. That fallacy ought not to be merely utilised for a rejoinder. It ought to be utilised and exposed.

"Mill's formula counts as 'earned' some undefined portion of the market-value of things—which portion is supposed to represent the special and meritorious work, or labour, of the owners; whilst it counts as 'unearned' some other portion—equally undefined—which is supposed to represent nothing but the value conferred by the increased demand of society. But the truth is obvious the moment we come to think of it—that the lowest scale of value has precisely the same contributory elements in its composition as the highest, no possession being of any value at all except that which arises out of the desires and wants of other men, and the lowest scale of price being just as much due to that demand as the highest. The whole of this doctrine is merely one of the developments of the fundamental fallacy of Ricardo's theory that the value of any article or commodity is to be measured by the quantity of labour or meritorious work bestowed upon it. Ricardo did not push his doctrine to these absurd consequences. And Professor Marshall has made a gallant and not altogether unsuccessful attempt to show that he has been misinterpreted—his ideas ridden to death by his followers. This may be in a measure true; but there is no doubt that Ricardo's own doctrine was one-sided in an extreme degree—vitiated by the neglect of essential elements—and that his idea of the absolute predominance of what he called 'labour' as the determining element of value was essentially erroneous, leading to the most disastrous consequences in English economics. It is easy to see, for example, how it led to the speculative extremes to which it was pushed by J. S. Mill. When the facts of value are obviously seen to be departing widely from the assumed law which ought under the theory to regulate its measure, the natural suggestion which arises in the mind of a dogmatic theorist is that it is 'so much the worse for the facts,' and that natural laws ought to be checked and suspended as far as possible by artificial and arbitrary human action. There is no absurdity of consequence, as we have seen, which will not be faced by men in this frame of mind; and assuredly no consequence could do more violence both to logic and the moral sense than that which would follow, and has actually followed, from the idea which underlies the teaching on this subject of J. S. Mill."

That, Sir, in a very short form, is really the essential reply to the single-tax and unearned-increment argument. Then, it appears that what is objected to is speculation in land, because somehow or other, land being different from anything else, it is supposed there ought to be no value in it which is caused by the action of other people, just as if even the rate of wages is not as much caused by demand over which the labourer may have no control whatever. As to property in land, I really cannot see why there should be all this jealousy about it. After all, what is meant by it? It only means having the sole use of the property bestowed upon the individual who happens to possess it at the time. Sometimes it will rise in value, and sometimes it falls, like any other article which is considered property: this Bill is practically an attempt to destroy land as property. It is not to be treated like any other property. As John Austin defines property, "Property is every right to a thing which is indefinite in point of user": that is, any property a man has he has a perfect right to do what he likes with. There is no definite point at which the law steps in and says, "You have no right to use it for this particular purpose." But now it is proposed under this Bill to say, "You may use land to build upon, to grow things upon, but not for exchange purposes, not for speculation: at least, if you do, it will be specially taxed, and practically you will have it ultimately taken from you by way of taxation." This interference with the right of the free exchange of land is just as bad as interference with the right of free exchange in any other thing. In principle it is part of the Protection policy which has been so injurious to this and to the other colonies, and it has to a certain extent, an intentional result to force men to improve their property when really it does not pay to do so—diverting capital from employment in which it may be used to cases in which it is not advisable to employ it. Take the case of our occupied lands in towns: there is always a certain demand for houses, and a certain demand for shops, stores, and so forth; and under this Act you are to penalise a man who does not make improvements on his land, by taxing him at a greater rate than a person who has built is taxed. You are practically forcing him to produce more in the way of building dwelling-houses or other kinds of buildings than are required at the particular time, thereby diverting capital from the course it would naturally take into a course which is relatively unprofitable, and which will ultimately be injurious to the community as a whole. It is forcing capital and labour into wrong channels; and that is at the bottom of the fallacy and the mischief of protective interference with the free exchange of property, no matter of what kind it may be. Sir, believing this Bill is unjust and mischievous in principle, and if made operative in any district will be especially oppressive to the poorer owners of property, and also believing that there is no demand for it in the country as a whole, I move, That the Bill be read the second time this day six months.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, 27th September, 1894.

First Reading—Government Railways Bill—Shops and Shop-assistants Bill—New Zealand Consols Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Water-supply Bill.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

A message was received from the Legislative Council stating that the Council had passed this Bill, with amendments in which they requested the concurrence of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER desired to draw attention to one amendment which might appear to be an infringement of the privileges of the House—namely, that portion of new clause 10 dealing with salaries, in case the extension of the appointments of Commissioners took place. Such an amendment could not, of course, originate in the Legislative Council; but, as this provision was in the Bill passed by the House, he did not regard the transference of the provision from the 4th clause to the 10th as an infringement of the privileges of the House, but thought it right to mention the matter.

Mr. SEDDON moved, That the amendments made in the Bill be approved of. The only material alteration was a provision giving power to the officers to inflict penalties, and to suspend junior officers or employés, subject to the right of appeal. That power was in the original Act. It was a power which was also in other Acts—for instance, that dealing with the Survey Department—so that he did not think it was out of the way to put such a power in this Bill. Otherwise, the amendments were simply of a technical character, and improved the Bill.

Mr. MITCHELSON would like the Minister to inform the House whether it was the intention of the Government to appoint a Minister of Railways, and, if so, did the Government intend to ask the House to sanction an Act authorising an increase in the number of Ministers; and, if such was intended, what salary, if any, they proposed to pay the new Minister.

Sir R. STOUT wished to point out one amendment in the Bill—the words "All persons now in the service of the Railway Commissioners who were in the Civil Service immediately before the first of January," and so on. Suppose there was a Railway Commissioner who had been in the Civil Service, would he be entitled to any compensation during the time he was a Railway Commissioner? He seemed to be exempted from this Act. He understood, when the Bill was going through the House, that provision would be made for those Commissioners who were in the Civil Service before their appointment as Commissioners. Were they to be entitled to any compensation? He referred to the three old Commissioners. Two of the present Commissioners had also been in the Civil Service: were they to be entitled to any compensation? The way the Bill read they would not be entitled to any—neither the old Commissioners nor the present ones.

Mr. SEDDON said, in reply to the last question, he did not see, himself, why the Commissioners should be differently treated from the workmen.

Sir R. STOUT said they were in the Bill.

Mr. SEDDON said their status, as regarded the Civil Service, was retained, and properly so. It was so under the original Act, and it was quite right to retain it in this Bill. But as to the time they had been acting as Commissioners and receiving large salaries—very much larger than they were receiving when in the Civil Service, or would have received if they had been retained in the Civil Service—he thought those increased salaries compensated them for what they would have obtained as compensation if they had remained the whole time in the Civil Service. If that was not clear he would look into the matter to see that it was carried out.

Sir R. STOUT would like to draw the attention of the honourable member to subsection (5.) That might be held to apply to two of the present Commissioners, and the result would be, for example, that Mr. McKerrow would get his compensation for the whole time, while Mr. Hannay would be deprived of his. He did not think that was fair.

Mr. SEDDON said he would inquire into the matter. He was told that a computation of Mr. Hannay's and Mr. Maxwell's compensation had been made and they had been paid for the time referred to. He might say he was rather surprised at that himself.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—What about the other one?

Mr. SEDDON said there was no other one; Mr. McKerrow had been retained in the service. He understood that compensation had been computed for the time they had been Railway Commissioners. He was going to inquire into that, to see whether it was so or not, because he thought that was not in accordance with the law. The Audit Department was, of course, responsible, if that were so. At all events, he would look into the matter, because he did not desire them to be treated differently from the workmen. He heard the other day of a workman who had been retired, and for the whole time he had been working on the railways for the past five years he had only received three months' compensation; whilst, of course, had he been in the Civil Service he would have received a month for every year. However, he would look into the matter and make it clear. The points raised by the honourable member for Eden were—(1) Whether the Government this session intended to bring down a Bill asking the House to increase the number of Ministers; and (2) if the answer was in the affirmative, what would be the salary of the Minister for Railways? He might say the Government had come to no decision yet upon the subject. Of course, until they had decided as to the appointment of an extra Minister, it would be out of place to mention the question of salary. The Government, at all events, would not take charge until the 1st January next, and, in the meantime, there would be the salaries of the present Commissioners to pay; so that was practically nine months of the year gone. The question then was raised whether, for the three months, it was advisable to appoint another Minister, and put upon the colony the expense of his salary, or whether they might not manage from the 1st January till the House met next session with the present number of Ministers. These were questions which the Government must consider. Efficiency should be maintained in the railway service, and if savings could be effected it would be a proper thing to do. Ministers were very hard worked at present, and there might probably be a readjustment. He had stated that he did not intend to take the position of Minister of Railways, but the Government had come to no final conclusion on the matter. When the Government arrived at a conclusion he would inform honourable members. He did not know that there ever was a time when he had stood up in his place in that House and felt so gratified as he did now at finding that, at last, after a long struggle, the people had had returned to them a property which should never have been taken from them.

Motion agreed to.

SHOPS AND SHOP-ASSISTANTS BILL.

A message was received from the Legislative Council stating that the Council had passed this Bill with amendments, and asking the concurrence of the House in the amendments.

Mr. REEVES moved, That the amendments made by the Legislative Council in clauses 2, 3, new clause 9, and new clause 16A be disagreed with, and that the other amendments be agreed to. The amendment made in clause 2 was a vital amendment. That was an amendment which defined a shop as a place in which a person worked for hire, and it exempted from the Act all shops in which no paid shop-assistant was employed. He need not detain the House by giving a series of arguments why he did not think that amendment should be accepted. The question had been discussed in that House four or five times in as many years. He could point out, for example, that the Bill of 1891 contained that exemption, or something like it; but that exemption was struck out by a considerable majority, of which he formed one himself. In 1892, 1893, and this year the Government had positively refused to accept any such amendment in the Bill. He had already stated that the Government would drop the Bill if such an amendment were carried. Nevertheless they found that the Council carried this amendment, and when the Government recommitted the clause the Council sustained the amendment by a majority of two to one. It must be remembered that this amendment stood on a totally different footing from the exemption of any particular trade from the Act. There might be, and there was, some necessity and fairness in exempting the whole of a certain trade from the operation of the Act. But there could be, from his view, no fairness or reason for exempting, say, one-third of the shops in a particular trade from the Act while bringing the other two-thirds under it. This amendment made it an offence to employ paid labour. He did not think a man should be punished for employing labour and paying it. This was an amendment which gave an advantage to a man employing labour and not paying it. This was an amendment which enabled a man to treat his own flesh and blood very much worse than he would treat hired assistants. He did not think that was right. But, whether it was right or whether it was wrong, the injustice remained that under this amendment a considerable proportion of the shops in each trade would be closed, while a certain proportion would be left open; so that for giving a man a holiday and paying him the employer of labour would be punished and would lose a certain amount of trade. He did not think there was an appreciable number of shops in the colony which depended for their existence

30. and their profit on keeping open on every afternoon in the week. He quite admitted that, when the early-closing Bill was introduced some years ago, under which all these small shops would have been closed every evening except one, there was something in the cry that such a Bill would ruin a considerable number of small shopkeepers. The opposition to the shop-hours regulations on the part of small shopkeepers was in connection with the early-closing movement; but he did not think there was nearly the same amount of feeling with regard to the half-holiday Act, and he did not think an appreciable amount of injury would be done to any shopkeepers by a half-holiday Act. He knew that large numbers of small shopkeepers who did not employ labour were very anxious to have this Act passed—provided, as they expressed it, that they should all shut together. Many of them were just as anxious for a half-holiday for themselves and their families as were any of the employers of labour. Moreover, if this amendment were retained, it would not merely exempt shops worked by families or by widows with their children. This not only exempted shops conducted by families, but it exempted shops in which labour was employed without payment of wages in money; any one who knew anything about the industries in towns must know the large extent to which assistants might be employed who got no money payment in return; and the extent to which such an amendment as this would go caused him to ask that that amendment be not agreed to. It would, of course, be said that small shopkeepers as a class were wholly opposed to the Act without that amendment; but, if that were the case, he could not have possibly come to that House as a representative of Christchurch. A considerable number of those who supported this Act were opposed to the amendment, and they were returned for the suburbs and boroughs, and would not probably otherwise have been returned at the general election, because small shopkeepers in those constituencies might be said to a great extent to have had the power to dominate as a body the elections of that time. And, if they were as a whole opposed to this Act without the amendment, the present representatives would not have been returned, because it was hardly to be supposed that those whom this amendment would ruin would have returned in almost every case a member to that House prepared to support the Bill and oppose that particular amendment. With regard to another point, the Council had done what he thought was most objectionable in regard to fixing the half-holiday by local option. There were some classes of trades that got a great deal of their trade given to them on holidays, and whose shops were kept open on holidays for the convenience of the holiday-making public, and of the public who were not at work on those days. It was obvious that it would be an injury to shut them on the holidays and deprive them of a certain amount of their trade. There was no objection to shut them on some other day; they were prepared to submit to that. But, instead of allowing this clause to remain, under which, for example, if a Saturday half-holiday were made general in Wellington City, hairdressers kept their half-holiday on Thursday and the butchers and photographers on Thursday, the Council had struck that clause out altogether, and it had put in a clause to say that a special day might be appointed for butchers and photographers. It had exempted hairdressers from the Act altogether—a quite unnecessary and improper thing to do, he thought—and it had made no provision whatever for any other holiday except for butchers and photographers. Then, again, the Council had put in a new clause—clause 9—one passage of which was ungrammatical, and another of which did not express what it was meant to express. The Council had also inserted a new and important clause dealing with banks and merchants' offices. Under this clause—

“The closing-hour of all offices shall be not later than five o'clock in the afternoon of each week-day except Saturday, when the closing-hour shall be not later than one o'clock in the afternoon: Provided that cashiers, ledger-keepers, and cash-book keepers in any office shall, before leaving their offices, balance the books in their charge of the day's transactions; and provided, further, that exception shall be made in respect of not exceeding six days in each calendar month, when employes may be required to return to work after seven o'clock in the evening for not exceeding three hours in any one day. It is further provided that this section shall not apply to shipping, tramway, and newspaper offices."

He did not object to the principle of this clause, and he was not asking the House to object to it for any other reason than that he thought it could not be worked unless the qualifications in it were greatly modified. He must therefore ask the House to disagree with that amendment. He moved, That the amendments made by the Legislative Council in clauses 2, 3, new clause 9, and new clause 16a of the Shop and Shop-assistants Bill be disagreed with; that the rest of the amendments be agreed to; and that Mr. Bell, Mr. Tanner, and the mover be appointed Managers to draw up reasons for so disagreeing.

Mr. SAUNDERS said the Hon. the Minister of Labour, in his remarks on this Bill, had failed to tell the House anything about the most important injury that would be inflicted under the Bill as now altered by the Legislative Council, in regard to opening of grog-shops.

Mr. THOMPSON suggested that it would be better to deal with the first amendment by itself, with reference to shops keeping open where no labour was employed, because he intended to take a division on that. To his mind, the Council had improved the Bill by this amendment, notwithstanding all that had been said by the Minister of Labour, and he believed that experience would show that, if this amendment were not retained in the Bill, they would ruin hundreds of small tradespeople in the colony. He knew, from private correspondence he had received, that the very class of people that this was proposed to help were going to be ruined. There was no use in trying to evade this view of the question. If they prevented those workmen whose wives and families were carrying on small businesses from assisting to support their families it would bring that class of people to ruin. There was no question about that. It did not matter what day it was. These people in many instances lived in their own shops, and were endeavouring to earn a little to add to the earnings of their husbands, and it would be a most cruel thing to prevent them from earning an honest living. If the majority of the House were unanimous with regard to this class of legislation, which would simply ruin the small working tradesman, he said that those who supported this class of legislation would have to take the responsibility for it. For his part, he would not take such a responsibility, for he would divide the House on it, and those honourable members who were prepared to support this class of legislation could record their votes in favour of it, and those who thought it would injure a large number of people could vote against it. He begged to move, as an amendment, That this amendment be agreed to.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE thought the Bill ought to be passed as it left that Chamber, or else the legislation on the subject should be repealed altogether. Either one position or the other ought to be taken up.

Mr. Reeves

Sir R. STOUT did not know how the amendment was to be put; but he intended to move, That the amendments moved in lines 22, 23, and 24, clause 2, be disagreed with. They related to the opening of hotel bars. This clause had already been discussed in the House, and affirmed by a considerable majority. What he objected to was this: He thought it was very unfair that the amendment should have been made at the suggestion of the Minister. He understood that he urged the Committee in another place to strike this amendment out, and he did not think it was very fair that the honourable member should go to a Committee of another place to urge them to amend the Bill in that direction. He would only point out that in England, in the Shop Bill, — a totally differently-constructed Bill from this, he admitted, — a publichouse bar was declared to be a shop; and when the honourable member talked about small shopkeepers working their families without payment for long hours, that applied tenfold to hotel bars, which were allowed to be kept open till eleven o'clock in some places, and ten o'clock in others. Was it fair that a barmaid attending at a bar should be differently treated from a shop-girl who had to attend in a shop? The associations in a shop were far better for the shop-girl than were the associations of a bar for a bar-girl. He thought it was entirely unfair that a barmaid or a barman should be put in a different position from a shop-assistant. So far as health was concerned, it could not be said for one moment that people employed in bars had not as much right to be looked after as assistants in shops. He asked the House to look at it from a practical point of view. Was it not an absurdity that a man should be prevented from selling sugar on a Saturday afternoon, when he was allowed to sell whiskey? He was sure that such an argument could have no logical standing in the House. They all knew what the result would be if there was a half-holiday for factories and shop-hands and the bars were kept open. It would be an injury to workmen — a temptation to them to waste their means. He asked the House, so far as this amendment was concerned — the amendment moved by the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. W. Hutchison) — to disagree with its being struck out.

Mr. REEVES wished to make a personal explanation. The honourable gentleman had made a very unfair imputation against him. It would be imagined from what the honourable gentleman said that he (Mr. Reeves) went to the Committee of the Legislative Council to urge that this particular amendment should be struck out. As a matter of fact, he went to the Committee to speak generally on the Bill; and, in the course of dealing with a large number of other subjects, he dealt with this one, and said then what he had said in that House, without any alteration or concealment. Whether they thought it right or not that publichouses should be closed half a day in the week, he was not going to argue that, and he did not do so, either before the Committee or in the House. What he did say was that the Bill was not the right place for it—for such a provision.

Sir R. STOUT.—Why?

Mr. REEVES said because the Licensing Act was the proper place.

Sir R. STOUT.—Why, then, was it not so in England?

Mr. REEVES said because, as the honourable gentleman knew, they did not shut up the publichouses in England on a weekly half-holiday. Now, he said to the Committee of the Legislative Council that it might be said that, if they were to reserve this amendment for the Licensing Bill, the Licensing Bill might not come before them at all—that the House might not pass that Bill this session, and therefore it would not go to the Council, and consequently they would not have an opportunity of making provision for it there. But that was not his idea at all. He said, if the Committee thought that publichouses should be shut up on the half-holiday, and there was no chance of their putting it into the Licensing Bill—he would prefer that, rather than put it in the Shops Bill, they should put it in the Factories Bill, which it was entirely in the Council's power to do. That would be a better place for it, seeing that the factories half-holiday was that observed by the mass of the population. It was an absurdity to put this in the Shop-assistants Bill, when they knew that the shop-assistants did not form the mass of the population, and if there was one class of the population that did not resort to the publichouses for the purpose of procuring drink it was the shopmen and shop-girls.

Mr. HOGG said, with regard to the remarks of the honourable member for Marsden, he hoped the House would not be led away by them. The honourable member had suggested that if the small shops were closed it meant that a very large portion of the business community would be ruined. He thought the honourable gentleman had spoken under a misapprehension of the facts. The experiment of closing both small and large shops had been very well tried during the last year or two in the country districts, and he could speak with regard to tolerably large towns in his own district, and say it had worked remarkably well. The small traders had voluntarily closed their premises in the same way as the larger business people, and he was not aware of a single instance in which this had resulted in ruin. Whenever an innovation of a beneficial character was proposed a class of ruin-mongers were continually predicting misfortune of this kind. To his mind, they resembled very much the miner who on one occasion tumbled into a shaft, and, thinking he was going to eternity, instead of travelling down a very short distance, hung on by his finger-tips till daylight, and then discovered he was only about six inches from the bottom. There was no ruin whatever impending over the heads of the small shopkeepers. He would ask this question: Were those honourable gentlemen that interfered with the Bill in this matter animated by a desire to assist the small shopkeepers, to assist the widows, or those who had families, to obtain a living; or were they not animated by a desire to bring such men as the Chinese traders into active competition with the European employers of labour, who had some little regard for their servants, and wished to give their shop-assistants a reasonable holiday? His impression was that they were less animated by sympathy with the widows and families of shopkeepers, and the small people generally, than by an entire want of sympathy with the very large number of shop-assistants we had in this colony. He contended that if the views which emanated from those honourable gentlemen were not prompted by that spirit they ought to assist in giving protection and relief to the large as well as the small traders. So far as Wellington was concerned, the small traders that would benefit by the Council's proposal consisted very largely of Chinese.

Mr. GUINNESS regretted that when this Bill was in Committee he had not the opportunity, through having to occupy the chair, of expressing his views upon some of the clauses in it. He took this opportunity of warning the Government that the Minister of Labour, by his radical and hasty legislation in the interests of what he called the cause of labour, was doing what would ultimately ruin the Liberal party: that was to say, he was legislating in a direction that was unfair, and would have a most detrimental effect upon the liberty of the subject. And this was one of those important points in the Bill for amending which in the manner they had done he thought every credit should be given to the Legislative Council. The object of the Bill was to give a half-holiday to the shop-assistants—to the persons who were hired and required to work for their masters; but, if the master, whether male or female, chose to carry on business, he or she ought to have free liberty to carry on the business how or in what manner he or she liked. That was the principle which actuated the Legislative Council in making this amendment.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—Because they did not understand it.

Mr. GUINNESS would like to know if the honourable member for Clutha had that experience in business matters that many members of the Council had—men who had grown old in dealing with this and other matters, while the honourable member was quite young and had no experience as to these things. He (Mr. Guinness) certainly took exception to the conduct of the Minister of Labour in what he did in attending a meeting of the Committee of the Legislative Council to advocate the passage of this Bill, or in attending there at all. It was not the duty of any Minister of the Crown to go to a Committee of the Legislative Council for the purpose of trying to advocate, coerce, or dictate to the Council how they should deal with a particular measure. He said this was absolutely improper, and the very fact of that honourable gentleman, of all the Ministers of the Crown, going to the Committee of the Legislative Council and attempting to do such a thing was bound to have the very contrary effect to that which he expected it would have. It was more likely to cause the mutilation by the Council of the Bill sent up from the House than anything else.

Mr. REEVES said it had been done repeatedly.

Mr. GUINNESS said that, then, such conduct ought to be stopped. This House and this Parliament should not for one moment allow any Minister of the Crown or any member of the House, when a Bill had once passed it, to be permitted to go to the other Chamber for the purpose of trying to influence members of that Chamber to give effect to legislation passed in the House. The honourable member might laugh, but he did not think the practice was a sound and proper one, and he believed if such a thing had been done by past Governments it would have been found that the honourable gentleman himself, when he was in opposition, would have been one of the very first to get up and use the most harsh and strong language against the conduct of any Minister who did such a thing. This motion to disagree with the Council's amendments was one he could not support. He hoped a division would be taken upon it, so that they might see what members were in favour of passing the drastic legislation that was now being promoted by the honourable gentleman who was in charge of what were called "the labour Bills," but many of which might be stigmatized as "Bills for the suppression of the liberty of the subject."

Mr. GREEN did not agree at all with the sentiments expressed by the last speaker. A great many times during the present session they had been told—they had all their political failings, the last speaker along with the rest—that they should not legislate for a particular class, but legislate generally for the whole community. He took leave to think this was a right and proper thing to do, and, if this amendment were agreed to, they were legislating for one section in the towns, and they would be legislating directly against the interests of another section. If it was at all a desirable thing—and he presumed it was considered a desirable thing—to establish the principle that there should be a half-holiday observed once a week by the people of business in the towns, he thought it was a most improper thing to allow one set of people to keep their shops open while another set were obliged to close theirs. In fact, there were many cases within his own knowledge where people who did not employ others than members of the family were doing as much business as those who employed outside labour. Was it to be contended for one moment that the person who had to find money to pay those whom he employed should be placed at a greater disadvantage than those who carried on a business with the assistance merely of their own families? It was not in the interest of the community that there should be such legislation as that. The honourable gentleman said it was quite an improper thing for a Minister of the Crown to give evidence before a Committee of the Legislative Council in connection with a measure which had been successfully carried through the House. This was the first time he had heard such an opinion expressed. He had known, in years past, those acting in representative positions as Ministers of the Crown having to change to the opposite side of the House, because one party did not remain in power long, and whatever was done by one party in one Parliament was very often done by the opposite party in the next Parliament; and when a Minister succeeded in carrying his measure through that House, knowing the position of it, and having a particular knowledge of it, he, and also other members who had a special knowledge of the subject going through the House, would naturally wish to appear before the Committee of the other Chamber and give their testimony there. He thought they ought not to agree to the amendment, and he would very heartily support the honourable gentlemen who were in opposition to it.

Dr. NEWMAN wished to appear in the new rôle of speaking in defence of the Minister of Labour. He thought they would do very well if they allowed the Minister who had worked at a Bill to do as a Minister was allowed to do in some European legislative chambers—take charge of it in another place and debate its principles there; and he thought a change might well be made in that direction. He considered that the Minister in charge of a Bill had an entire right to go to the Committee of another Chamber and give evidence there in favour of it. As regarded the clause shutting up shops, he thought there should be one rule only: it should apply to all or none, because all should have the half-holiday or none should have it. He knew several shops in this town which were run by two daughters or two sons of the owner, and would not come under this Bill, while the neighbouring man, who happened not to have daughters, but who had to employ labour, would be compelled to close up his shop. He hoped the House would carry out the principle of shutting up all or none. There was one clause which he thought the House should take into consideration, and that was clause 16, inserted by the Upper House. It legislated for bank-clerks and clerks in offices. These were a class of men who had to work very long hours for very scanty pay, and they had anything but an easy life of it; and, when they were giving all other classes of the community the advantage of a half-holiday, it was right and just for the Legislative Council to insert this clause; and though the Minister did not like the clause—

Mr. REEVES.—I do; I only think some words should be altered.

Dr. NEWMAN was very glad to hear that the Minister approved of the clause. Probably there were other portions of the Bill which required to be amended, but he hoped the amendment with regard to bank and other clerks would be agreed to.

Mr. Guinness

Mr. SEDDON hoped members would see their way clear not to debate the principle of this measure. That was done on the second reading of the Bill. The House, by a large majority, agreed to it, and it was sent to another place. Nothing had occurred since to change the will of the majority on that point. They were asked now to go back to what they did before. That being the case, they should come to the decision to adhere to the Bill as it was sent up. He believed there was underlying this amendment a very dangerous state of things. They had to look to the health and comfort of the children of the country, and, if parents injured their children's health, it was the duty of Parliament to step in and prevent it. Parliament would be inconsistent if it did not insist on parents doing their duty to their children. It was just as right to close shops in which the children of the owners were employed as any others. If this amendment were agreed to, what would they have? They would have a number of Chinese, who would all be partners, and not assistants at all. They would work as partners, and they would keep their shops open while the shops of other people were closed; and then they would have these very shopkeepers coming to Parliament and asking for protection. He thought these were good and potent reasons why they should affirm the Bill as they sent it up to another place in regard to the definition of "shop."

Mr. W. HUTCHISON said the House had agreed to a certain line, and the Premier now asked the House to adhere to it. Generally speaking, he was of the honourable gentleman's opinion; but if they adhered to one portion of this Bill they ought to adhere to the whole of it. The Premier said they had agreed upon a certain line of policy, and he said so too, consequently he did not think they should adhere to one portion and leave out another. He did not at the outset make any remarks about clause 2, because he felt it was absolutely futile, seeing the Legislative Council had, by a large majority, decided against it; but he sympathized with the honourable member for Wellington City, as he thought the conduct of the Minister of Labour was most objectionable in reference to that clause.

Mr. SPEAKER. — Are you discussing the Council's amendment relating to publichouses?

Mr. W. HUTCHISON. — Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER. — That amendment has not yet been proposed from the chair, but will be taken next.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON said, at any rate it was not right in any case that the Minister should seek to lobby and influence the decision of the Legislative Council against what had been agreed to by a majority of that House.

Mr. PINKERTON said the honourable member for Marsden had made the statement that small shopkeepers were going to be ruined by this legislation, but the honourable gentleman had not once told them how that was going to be brought about. He (Mr. Pinkerton) did not think the small shopkeepers were going to be ruined if they shut up their shops one half-day out of six. No shopkeeper was so busy as to be unable to earn a living if he had to close his shop for one half-day in each week. They could do all their business in five and a half days. The honourable member for the Grey complained that the Minister had done wrong in giving evidence before the Legislative Council. Now, was it not a right thing for the Legislative Council or that House to obtain the best information they could? He did not know any one better able to give evidence of circumstances within his own knowledge which affected this principle than the Minister of Labour. They had often heard it stated that widows were going to be ruined, and it was urged that widows who had two or three daughters should be allowed to keep their shops open, else they would be ruined. But what about the widow next door, who, perhaps, had no daughters and was a poorer woman? She would be compelled to close her shop. Why should one be allowed to remain open, while the other was compelled to close her shop because she had no daughters and had to employ one assistant? The liberty of the subject had been one of the questions dealt with by the honourable member for the Grey; but if the liberty of the subject was not to be interfered with in the case of small shopkeepers, what was to be said of the large shopkeepers in a case of this kind, where the employés might volunteer their labour to the large shops and so ruin the system? The shopkeepers themselves, and not the shop-assistants only, wanted this Bill, and surely they could very well allow them to legislate for themselves.

Mr. EARNSHAW said there was one phase of the question that appeared to him to be in great danger if they accepted the Legislative Council amendment with regard to the definition of a shop. If he read this amended Bill correctly it would mean that even shops that employed labour would be able to evade the Act, and employ their own assistants on Saturday nights or on any late nights. They would engage their employés practically paying them for six days and only employing them for five days, with the tacit understanding that unless they volunteered their services for the afternoon on which the shops generally were closed they would have to go without employment. That evasion could be made if the Bill remained as it was now. The position he was stating could be taken up, and he therefore trusted the Minister would absolutely refuse to allow this amendment to his Bill, and, rather than accept it, that he would drop the Bill. That was his strong opinion. He agreed with one of the amendments in subsection (5) of new clause 9, with regard to shops that desired to keep the Saturday half-holiday. In his opinion, the Minister made a retrograde movement when he abandoned the position taken up in last year's Bill, that they should primarily have the half-holiday on Saturday, unless the local bodies chose to alter it. The Minister abandoned that position, and left it entirely to whatever afternoon local bodies chose to fix. If they could not gain anything in advance they should not lose what they already had, for many firms had for years been giving the half-holiday to their employes on Saturday. The first amendment seemed to him to be crucial to the whole Bill, and he hoped the Minister would determine that every shop should be described as coming within this Act for the half-holiday, or would abandon the Bill.

Mr. G. J. SMITH rose to express a hope that the House would not agree to the proposal of the honourable member for Marsden. He was sure the action of the Chairman of Committees, elected as he was with the approval of the Ministry, would cause to the Government some considerable amount of anxiety, speaking as he did from the Opposition benches and in the manner that honourable member had spoken. It was worse than if he were a private member; and he (Mr. Smith) really hoped that when the fatted calf was killed the honourable member for the Grey would be invited to the banquet. He would like to hear from the Minister of Education in reply just one word as to "office." He saw that "office" meant any banking office, insurance office, or office used for commercial purposes.

Mr. SPEAKER said that was not before the House at present.

Mr. REEVES thought the honourable member for Masterton was perfectly right when he said that the effect of this amendment of the Council would be to allow a large majority of the Chinese shops to remain open whilst other shops alongside them were closed.

On the question, That the omission of the words regarding bars of hotels, in clause 2, be agreed to,
Mr. Earnshaw

Sir R. STOUT moved, That the amendment be disagreed with.

Mr. W. HUTCHISON said the Minister of Labour had stated that this provision would be better introduced in the Factories Act. That, he thought, was just the very last Act it should be in. But he wished specially to emphasize what he thought to be the great impropriety, after a majority of the House had agreed to a particular clause in a Bill, of a Minister going behind this majority and endeavouring by the means at his power to counteract what had been done by a majority of the House. The Minister had his argument while the clause was under discussion, to which every one was willing to listen, and, having finished that argument, and the House having come to a decision on the question, it was disloyal to the House that the Minister should go to the Legislative Council and there use his influence to alter that decision. Although the honourable member wished to support the public-house interest, he should remember his position as a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. SEDDON wished to prevent the idea from being laid down that Ministers or members should not go before Committees of another Chamber with a view of furthering measures they promoted in the House. It was done in the case of local Bills by the members who had introduced them. To quote so late an instance as the bank Bills, the Legislative Council appointed a Committee, and asked Ministers to go up before the Committee and go into the question of the necessity for those measures; and it was a most usual occurrence. He held the view himself that this was not the proper Bill for this provision to close public-houses; it should go into the Licensing Bill. They there fixed the time for public-houses to close at night and on certain days, and they should also fix there the afternoon on which they were to close. It had been included in this Bill almost by accident, and, anyhow, it was only carried by the casting vote of the Chairman of Committees—although he must not complain of that. It was to give further opportunity for discussion, and, knowing the time was limited, and that this opened up a large subject, Ministers did not think it desirable to recommit the Bill. For this reason only he should vote against it, as it ought to go into the Licensing Bill.

Mr. GUINNESS wished to reply to the argument which the Premier attempted to lay down that it was a recognised practice for Ministers to go before the Legislative Council to advocate their measures. The Premier instanced the case of local Bills; but that was an entirely different thing. In regard to what was done with local Bills, members went up to give evidence about them; they had local knowledge enabling them to do so. He asked, what evidence or knowledge had the Minister of Labour with regard to whether a bar should be closed on a particular day or not? What evidence did he go to the Legislative Council to give? Did he go to give evidence on other portions of the Bill? Certainly not.

Mr. REEVES.—I did.

Mr. GUINNESS asked what knowledge the Minister had with regard to the conduct of the business of shops—greengrocers' shops, confectioners' shops, lolly-shops—although, he must admit, he might have some knowledge of the last class—butchers' shops, and every other kind of shop mentioned in the Bill. What possible evidence could he give in regard to that question? If the honourable gentleman went up under the pretence of giving evidence, and, once inside the doors of the Council, commenced to advocate the principles of the Bill, he was doing that which was absolutely wrong. And more especially was he wrong, as was well pointed out by the honourable member for Dunedin City (Mr. W. Hutchison), in advocating the rejection of something that the House had passed. That was where he did wrong. He (Mr. Guinness) objected to it, and would always continue to object.

Mr. THOMPSON was amused at the innocence of the honourable member for Dunedin City, who had expressed surprise at the conduct of the Minister of Labour. That honourable gentleman must know that when the Bill was in the House the Minister of Labour did all he could to oppose this clause. It was well known that all these labour Bills were lobbied through the other House, and the Minister was well known to do it. So far as this particular clause was concerned, he failed to see why the bar of a hotel should be kept open while they insisted on every one, small and great, closing his place of business in the afternoon. Were they to understand by the action of the Minister of Labour that he wished to play into the hands of the publicans? That was the only conclusion they could come to. Why the Minister should take such a keen interest in the business of hotelkeepers, while he professed to have a keen interest in the welfare of the workers, was a puzzle to himself and to every one else. He hoped honourable members would do their duty and insist on treating all classes alike. Now that they had determined to close the smallest hucksters' shops, and to compel every one, man or woman, in the community to shut up on an afternoon, no matter what his or her business—if it was only a shirt-maker making a living they compelled her to close—while they were so very careful of the poor people, they should not insist on keeping the bars open to tempt them to spend their money.

Mr. CROWTHER did not rise to continue the severe criticism on the poor Minister of Labour. He believed, with the Premier, that this provision should be in the Bill it belonged to—the Licensing Bill. He had no fear of the great influence that was supposed to have been exercised by the Minister of Labour in another place. It went by inference that that honourable gentleman had not as much influence there as among the week-kneed Liberals here. He thought this was a waste of time. He had made up his mind that the only way to settle this matter was to have one afternoon for every one.

4.0. Mr. BUTTON had no objection to the Premier putting this clause in the Licensing Bill, but he saw no reason why it should not go into the present Bill as well. This was one of those things which you could not have too much of. It was a good thing, and was in harmony with the rest of the Bill. Besides, they had not got the Licensing Bill through yet, and it was quite possible it might not go through.

Mr. SEDDON.—It is just as far ahead as this.
